Consumer Price Outlook Bleak for New Year

By James M. Shevis

American consumers can expect to pay more for retail goods and services well into the new year as the result of steeper interest rates on home mortgages and expected higher prices for food and transportation.

Standing 12.7 percent above the year-earlier level, the government's consumer price index for November seemed to prefigure the probable course of inflation in at least the first part of 1981. Higher prices for food, housing, and transportation accounted for practically all of the month's 1-percent increase in the CPI, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

"THE OUTLOOK over the next few months is for continual worsening of inflation, with food prices continuing to rise sharply, housing further affected by high mortgage interest rates, and oil prices reflecting the newest round of OPEC price changes," observed Rudy Oswald, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research.

"Inflation rates in the 12- to 13-percent range appear to be likely for quite a few more months to come," Oswald said.

Some forecasters see a slight slowdown in the price spiral possible by the end of 1981, with the inflation rate dropping to 10 or 11 percent. But variables in the inflation mix, particularly energy prices and mortgage interest rates, make long-range projections difficult, they acknowledge.

Several key factors that analysts expect to start pumping up the CPI during the next few months began accelerating in November. Gasoline prices, which fell five-tenths of 1 percent in September and rose only three-tenths of 1 percent in October, jumped nine-tenths of 1 percent in November. Beef prices rose eight-tenths of 1 percent after declining six-tenths of 1 percent the month before.

ALSO, MORTGAGE interest rates, which work their way into the CPI with a lag of a few months, rose faster during November than in the previous month. Mortgage rates were up 2.8 percent over the month, compared to a 1.9-percent increase in October, BLS reported.

Regional Meetings Aim to Strengthen Labor's Programs

A series of seven regional conferences will be held by the AFL-CIO early in 1981 to bring together federation leaders, officers of state and local central bodies and national and regional staff to discuss strengthening the federation's structure and programs.

"As we enter the AFL-CIO's centennial year," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a letter announcing the conferences, "it is time once again to re-examine labor's aspirations and challenges. It is time, too, to strengthen and nourish the local roots of our movement."

THE REGIONAL meetings, which begin in March, are an expansion of the area conferences formerly conducted by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. Kirkland said they "will concern all aspects of the AFL-CIO" and are designed "to produce a free flow of ideas, opinions and evaluations of labor programs at all levels."

Kirkland, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and heads of the federation's staff departments will participate in each of the two-day conferences and meet with state and local central body officers and the federation's regional and COPE staff.

ALSO TAKING part will be representatives of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Frontlash, the National Council of Senior Citizens and the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

"The new year brings both opportunities and challenges," Kirkland said. "We mean to take full advantage of the new possibilities by strengthening the structure of the AFL-CIO and the two-way flow of ideas."

The schedule of conferences:

Mar. 5-7, in Philadelphia to include Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Mar. 9-11, in Boston to include Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, Maine and New Hampshire.

Mar. 19-21, in Chicago to include Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Indiana and Minnesota.

Mar. 26-28, in San Francisco to include California, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, Hawaii and Alaska.

Mar. 30-Apr. 1, in Denver to include Colorado, Montana, Utah, New Mexico, South Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho, Arizona, North Dakota and Nebraska.

Apr. 2-4, in Atlanta to include Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Florida, Mississippi, North Carolina and South Carolina.

June 4-6, in New Orleans to include Louisiana, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas, Kansas and Missouri.

Additional details will be provided participants in advance of the meetings.

Senate Shift Reflected In Committee Lineups

By David L. Perlman

Senate committee lineups for the new 97th Congress reflect the tilt to the right that resulted from the switch from a 59-41 Democratic majority to 53-47 Republican control.

Not all of the new Republican committee chairmen are conservatives, but most are. And nearly all committees will have conservative majorities, including those headed by moderate-to-liberal Republicans.

House committee lineups won't be set before mid-January, after the new Congress has convened. But most House changes will be in personalities rather than politics, since Democrats will continue as the majority party in the House.

Here's a capsule summary of major Senate committee changes following party caucuses held in December:

AGRICULTURE — Changes from 10 Democrats, 8 Republicans to 9 Republicans, 8 Democrats. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), with an ultra-conservative voting record of 90 percent "wrong" votes by COPE standards, will take over as chairman. The election defeats of both Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.) and George McGovern (D-S.D.) make Walter Huddleston (D-Ky.) the ranking minority member. The committee has jurisdiction over food stamps as well as farm policies.

APPROPRIATIONS — Changes from 17 Democrats, 11 Republicans to 15 Republicans, 14 Democrats. Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.), a moderate, replaces election victim Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) as chairman. But seven of the eight new Republicans on the committee are clearly conservative. The ranking minority member is William Proxmire (D-Wis.). Funding for nearly all government programs must pass the committee's scrutiny.

ARMED SERVICES — From 10 Democrats, 7 Republicans to 9 Republicans, 8 Democrats. Relatively little change as John Tower (R-Tex.) moves up to chairman and John C. Stennis (D-Miss.) steps down to ranking minority member.

BANKING, HOUSING & URBAN AFFAIRS — From 9 Democrats, 6 Republicans to 8 Republicans, 7 Democrats. The new chairman is the very conservative Jake Garn (R-Utah), no friend of cities or public housing. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), has been designated the ranking minority member, and the committee is closely divided along liberal-conservative lines.

BUDGET — From 12 Democrats, 8 Republicans to 12 Republicans, 10 Demo-

Bargaining Order Slaps Runaway, Boycott Target

A runaway Massachusetts plant, the target of an AFL-CIO-backed consumer boycott, has been slapped with a bargaining and backpay order by a National Labor Relations Board judge.

Administrative Law Judge Sidney Barban ruled that Marine Optical Co. of Massachusetts was guilty of unfair labor practices when it shifted its operations without warning in 1979, tossing aside its longtime bargaining relationship and existing contract with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

BARBAN FOUND that the firm violated the National Labor Relations Act by failing to live up to the terms of its 1977-80 contract with IUE Optical Workers Local 408, unilaterally changing wages and

Reagan Nears Completion Of Cabinet Appointments

President-elect Reagan announced five more choices for Cabinet posts, bringing the Cabinet-selection process to its final stages. Only the Secretary of Education and the Special Trade Representative, a Cabinet-level post, are still to be named.

Reagan designated James Burrow Edwards to head the Dept. of Energy, one of two departments that he has said should be abolished. The other is the Dept. of Education.

EDWARDS SERVED as the first Republican governor in South Carolina's history and returned to the private practice of dentistry last year after his term expired. South Carolina law prohibits two successive terms as governor, but Edwards has been talked about as a gubernatorial candidate in 1982. He is considered a staunch conservative.

Reagan also announced these Cabinet and Cabinet-level nominations, in addition to the selections made earlier and previously reported in the AFL-CIO News:

Secretary of the Interior: James G. Watt, a former Interior Dept. official who now heads the Denver-based Mountain States Legal Foundation. The foundation, established with the financial backing of Joseph Coors, the right-wing brewery magnate, has mounted legal challenges to prevent potential oil lands from being declared wilderness areas and has fought Environmental Protection Agency efforts to enforce auto pollution standards for Colorado. He is 42 and has served as an aide to former Sen. Milward Simpson (R-Wyo.) and on the staff of a U.S. Chamber of Commerce panel on natural resources.

Secretary of Agriculture: John R. Block, who since 1977 has been director of the Illinois Dept. of Agriculture. Block is a 1957 West Point graduate, but since 1980 has been a successful working farmer who expanded his family farm from 300 to 3,000 acres.

Secretary of Housing & Urban Development: Samuel Pierce, a highly successful black lawyer and board member of leading corporations. Pierce, whose law

Economic Ills, Election Top '80 Issues

By Press Associates, Inc.

The year 1980 opened with the death of George Meany, a dominant figure in the labor movement for a quarter-century, and came to a close with the election of Ronald Reagan, the most conservative candidate to seek the White House in modern times.

In between, the American people were buffeted by persistent high-level inflation and a recession that pushed the jobless rate to 7.8 percent. At the same time, long-term problems aggravated by soaring energy costs and uncontrolled imports hit the auto and steel and auto-related industries.

Still, labor could count victories on the organizing and bargaining fronts even while it was adapting to new economic and political realities.

The Steelworkers scored a major victory at the Newport News, Va., shipyard and the Clothing & Textile Workers won a contract at J. P. Stevens after a 17-year struggle. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland established relations that could lead to the reaffiliation of the Auto Workers, Teamsters and Mine Workers.

But as the year came to a close, labor's eyes were on the incoming Reagan Administration, a U.S. Senate under Republican control and a House likely to be dominated by a conservative coalition. Protective labor laws and social programs of the past half-century could well be at stake.

It was an eventful year, summarized through these headlines from the files of Press Associates and the AFL-CIO News.

27 Million Lack Health Insurance

During the first six months of 1977, some 27 million Americans, or about 13 percent of the population, had no form of health insurance coverage, according to data released by the Dept. of Health & Human Services.

Among age groups, people 18 to 24 were most likely to be uninsured, with some 22 percent lacking protection. The age group most likely to have insurance coverage consisted of those over age 65 for whom Medicare is available.

The agency found wide differences in the likelihood of coverage among the races with over 18 percent of nonwhites likely to be uninsured.

The less educated were also least likely to have health insurance with nearly 16 percent of those over 17, but with less than 12 years of education, lacking insurance compared to 12 percent of high school graduates and 8.9 percent of those with 13 or more years of education.

Almost 18 percent of the population in largely rural areas did not enjoy health insurance protection, and coverage by region of the country was lowest in the South and West.

NLRB Order Hits Violations By Runaway

working conditions, and refusing to bargain on a new agreement with the union.

He ordered the company to negotiate with the union, revoke the unilateral changes, and reimburse the affected workers with interest for any loss of earnings or employment benefits they suffered.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council endorsed the IUE's boycott of Marine Optical products at its meeting last May.

Local 408 Business Manager Sebastian J. Rebaldo hailed the NLRB judge's decision as a "tremendous victory," but added: "the battle isn't over yet. We have a way to go."

IUE PRESIDENT David J. Fitzmaurice joined in urging continued support of the boycott until a satisfactory settlement is reached with the firm. The company makes eyeglass frames under the names Bonjour, Givenchy, Voila, Vera, Aviance, Nefertite, Winks, Cotton Candy, and others.

Marine Optical moved its operations to Brockton, Mass., from its Roslindale facility, 17 miles away, over a two-month period in the fall of 1979 after its lease there expired and could not be renewed. Local 408, which had represented the Roslindale workers since 1954, filed charges while the move was taking place, and the Boston NLRB office issued a complaint.

The union sought negotiations of a new agreement to succeed the one that expired in February 1980, but the company refused saying it would not recognize the union at Brockton unless a majority wanted representation. Meanwhile, the firm made numerous changes in benefits and working conditions without consulting the union while the old contract was in effect.

"THESE CHANGES were made without affording the union an opportunity to negotiate," Barban said. He found that Local 408 clearly remained the workers' bargaining agent while the shift in operations occurred, citing an NLRB ruling in another case:

"An existing and effective collective-bargaining relationship remains in effect following (the) relocation, provided operations and equipment remain substantially the same at the new location, and a substantial percentage of the employees at the old plant transfer to the new location."

FOUR FREEDOMS AWARD of the Italian-American Labor Council was given to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at the council's recent meeting in New York City. The award, for service to the ideals of democracy, is presented by E. Howard Molisani, president and executive director of the council and secretary-treasurer of the New York State AFL-CIO.

Italian-American Labor Body Presents Award to Kirkland

New York—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has received the Four Freedoms award of the Italian-American Labor Council, presented for service to the advancement of the ideals of democracy.

In accepting the award, Kirkland called it "the symbol of the devotion of the trade union movement to the aspirations expressed in the Four Freedoms and a symbol of the dedication of Italian-American trade unionists to the principles of the labor movement, to democracy and to economic and social justice for all."

THE ITALIAN-AMERICAN Labor Council was founded in 1941 under the leadership of Luigi Antonini, former Ladies' Garment Workers vice president, to encourage the participation of Italian-American workers in the labor movement and to help counteract fascist, totalitarian ideologies. E. Howard Molisani, is president and executive director of the council.

"From the moment that fascism burst forth upon the world in Italy and Europe," Kirkland told the council's luncheon meeting, "the founders of this council valiantly warned the world of its dangers and fought staunchly to thwart it. Today you are still engaged in the continuing battle against the grip and reach of oppression whether it is found on the political right or among the false prophets of the left."

Kirkland stressed that the trade union movement resists totalitarianism whether in politics or in the economic exploitation of workers. He cited the development of the free labor movement in Poland as evidence of the desire of workers for truly representative unions.

"FEW PEOPLE understand as fully as Italian-American trade unionists the real meaning of the Polish workers movement," Kirkland said, "because few others know so well what it is to stand here where our rights are taken for granted and watch brothers and sisters in Europe confront such risks and odds in the contest for theirs—and what courage and moral strength the challenge of entrenched power requires."

The principles of trade unionism "are the most vital expression of the principles of democracy and human freedom," Kirkland declared.

Case Volume Of Mediation Agency Rises

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service handled 20,414 contract negotiation cases during fiscal year 1979, a slight rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent from the previous year but still the second-highest number of the Seventies.

The total, reported in the agency's current annual report, trailed only the record 23,450 cases in fiscal 1977.

THE NUMBER of joint cases—those requiring the presence of a mediator working with both parties during negotiations—jumped by 5.9 percent. Joint cases increased 6 percent in the private sector and 5 percent in the public sector. Increases in these types of cases occurred in every sector of the economy except construction, where they were down 10.8 percent.

Strike activity for the year was higher, FMCS reported, with walkouts occurring in 14.2 percent of the cases handled by the agency's mediators, up from 13.4 percent the previous year and the highest percentage since 1975.

Contract rejections occurred in 11.9 percent of FMCS-handled cases, the same percentage as in 1978 and the second-highest percentage in the 1970s.

Again, as in previous years, the primary issue in joint meeting cases was wages. This was followed, in order of importance, by pensions, insurance, welfare, contract duration, holidays and vacations.

OF ALL dispute cases handled by federal mediators during the fiscal year, 84.9 percent involved contract renewals, 9.4 percent initial contracts, 4.3 percent reopeners, and 1.4 percent exceptional grievances.

Contract renewals negotiated with FMCS assistance in 1979 were of somewhat shorter duration than in previous years, with agreements of three years or more accounting for 61 percent of the total, down from 64.3 percent in the previous year. Similarly, of initial contracts negotiated with FMCS's help, 43 percent were for three years or longer, down from 46.4 percent the previous year.

Arthur Lebel Dies at 66, Retired Field Staffer

Richmond, Me.—Arthur Lebel, a retired AFL-CIO field representative, died Dec. 19 of cancer. He was 66.

Lebel, a member of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers since 1934, served as a union organizer during the 1940s and '50s before joining the CIO staff in 1954. Following merger, he served on the federation's organizing staff in the New England region. Lebel retired in 1975.

Survivors include his wife Nellie and three children.

Humanities Project Seeks Wider Worker Participation

The Labor Institute for Human Enrichment has announced a new information service to help increase the participation of working people in humanities programs and seminars.

LIFHE, created by the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, will fund the project under a $140,000 contract with the National Endowment for the Humanities. The program will include a newsletter for the labor movement covering activities, seminars and other humanities resources in such areas as labor history, literature, philosophy, political science and contemporary social issues. The first edition of the newsletter is planned for early 1981.

SEMINARS WILL also be held for senior labor officials to explore current issues facing labor and society. Ways of increasing the role of labor in state humanities councils will be examined.

The project will be headed by Harry Matthews, scholar in residence at LIFHE. Matthews previously served as director of public and congressional affairs for the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy and was associate professor of political science at Northern Arizona University.

Matthews pointed out that a major activity of LIFHE's program will be to work closely with state federations of labor to increase their participation in state humanities councils, including the nomination of union members to serve on the councils.

Teachers' President Albert Shanker, who heads both the department and the institute, said the project will be a major step in expanding the availability of a wide variety of humanities programs to workers. Such activities are of interest to many union members, he pointed out, but until now basic information on where, when and how to participate has not been widely available.

"THIS PROJECT is by no means an end in itself," Shanker stressed. "Labor has always been a strong advocate of activities that would enable more working people to enjoy the riches of the arts and humanities. This project represents a continuation of this effort, and we plan to mount an effort to secure—from within the labor movement and from educational and charitable foundations—support for longer-range undertakings in the humanities which will benefit workers, their families and the entire society."

Information on the program is available from the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment, Inc., 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Suite 509, Washington, D.C. 20006, telephone 202/638-5020.

Federal Employees Hit Veto Of Improved Death Benefit

Leaders of two AFL-CIO unions expressed disappointment at President Carter's veto of legislation that would provide special death benefits to the families of federal workers in hazardous jobs killed in the line of duty.

The measure would have increased the death benefit for federal fire fighters and protective officers from $5,000 to $50,000.

THE EXISTING payment of $5,000 is "hardly enough to bury them," said President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the American Federation of Government Employees.

President John A. Gannon of the Fire Fighters noted that this was Carter's second veto of legislation that would have bettered conditions for federal fire fighters. The first came in 1978 when Carter rejected a measure that would have reduced their 72-hour workweek to 56 hours.

In a message to Carter, Gannon pointed out that federal fire fighters "work 32 hours more per week than the average American worker while serving in the most hazardous occupation in America. Yet they are continually denied benefits that are now received by municipal fire fighters."

Blaylock said Carter's action displayed a continuing lack of concern for federal workers.

NOTING THAT the death benefit measure was overwhelmingly approved by Congress—by a 313-to-56 vote in the House and a voice vote in the Senate—Blaylock said Carter "had no valid reason for denying these workers' families the same improved benefits given to the survivors of other federal law enforcement officers."

Carter contended in his veto message that the legislation would have given certain federal workers preferential treatment.

Looking Ahead

THE TURN of the year—any year—is an occasion for self-analysis, for a review of accomplishments and shortcomings and an examination of what needs to be done to preserve one's physical, mental and spiritual well-being.

The AFL-CIO itself will shortly undertake such a review in a series of regional conferences reaching to organized labor's local roots and exploring all aspects of the federation and its programs.

OF COURSE there has never been a shortage of editorial writers, columnists and academicians willing to do the job for us.

As AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland put it in a 1980 Federationist magazine article, "Academic analysts and journalistic pulse-takers who have adopted the decline of the labor movement as their thesis are not exactly treading new ground. Since the founding in 1881 of the national trade union center which has evolved into the AFL-CIO, such observers have alternatively predicted either its imminent demise of its eventual withering away."

Small wonder, then, that labor prefers to make its own analysis. Meanwhile, Kirkland's article offers a capsule prognosis:

"I look for substantial gains in union membership over the next decade," he said, "for continued growth in fields in which unions have been gaining members and for expansion in industries and geographic areas in which progress has been slow.

"THERE ARE MANY reasons for this, few of them readily reducible to statistical analysis, which is not the most useful tool for gauging the way people perceive their own needs, goals and common interests. . . .

"As often in the past, an unstable and deteriorating economy is a powerful incentive to union membership. Workers whose buying power is falling daily in the grip of inflation and whose jobs are jeopardized by growing unemployment awaken in such times from the inertia of the vanished status quo to the value of cost-of-living provisions, seniority in layoffs and job recall rights.

"Government wage guidelines that call attention to normative increases that are achievable only through collective bargaining make unorganized workers more conscious of being out in the cold.

"THE AGING of the workforce and the changing role of women will also encourage union membership. While youngsters without responsibilities tend to change jobs or put up with inferior treatment, older workers with family and community ties are more inclined to try to improve the jobs they have.

"As more women become responsible for others and the second incomes of working wives become more vital to family finances, they, too, can be expected to see that their progress depends on collective action.

"All in all, the prophets of doom have badly misread both the present strength and the future prospects of trade unionism in America, and I think my view is shared by America's business leaders. If unions were dead or dying, they would save their energy and money."

Backlash Feared

Even Bankers Voice Concern Over Interest Rate Eruption

By Gus Tyler

WHEN BANKS begin to complain about high interest rates, then you know that something must be wrong. We expect to hear groans from little folk trying to get a mortgage, from small businessmen trying to stay afloat, even from somewhat bigger businessmen who want to expand. But we normally do not expect the lender of money to complain about how much he is charging for the loan.

But, of late, banks are bitching.

SAYS ALFRED Brittain 3rd, chairman of Bankers Trust: "I very truly believe we're in the death throes of this present interest-rate convulsion." If we go on as we have, he warns, it "would have a very serious impact on the entire economy."

Says Willard C. Butcher, president of Chase Manhattan: "For many people in business, the goal of prosperity has given way to tenuous economic survival."

Says Cengiz Israfil, vice president of Morgan Guaranty Trust: "The rapidity of the climb in interest rates is having a shock effect that the markets cannot ignore."

IT'S GETTING to the banks because it's getting to their clients. Many won't borrow, and if everyone followed Polonius' advice, "neither a borrower nor a lender be," there would be no bankers.

But, even worse, there are borrowers who can't repay. They got a loan with every intention of meeting all charges on interest and principal. But with the need for ready cash that they can no longer afford, these well intentioned borrowers are going bankrupt and leaving the bank holding the bag—the empty bag.

High interest rates, however, are not hurting people in the private sector alone—from buyer to builder to broker to banker; government is also hard hit.

Says Jim Wright, majority whip of the Democrats in the House of Representatives: "Each percentage point in interest rates increases federal spending by about $2 billion for debt service. So the rise between June when rates bottomed out—and the economy began to recover—and today when the prime rate is almost 18 percent could cost the government roughly $12 billion." (With the actual rate having risen to 20 percent, the revised figure should read $16 billion.)

HIGH INTEREST rates, however, add another hidden cost to government. They bring on unemployment—as their special way of "cooling the economy" to hold down buying power. Says Wright: "One point in unemployment cost the government $20 to $25 billion."

High interest rates are forcing the federal government to spend more than it should—to meet the service on debt and to carry the costs of unemployment.

For the federal government to meet its bills it must spend more and, to do that, it must borrow more and must do so at the ever higher rate of interest.

In an outburst of exasperation, Wright exploded in a one-minute oration to the House: "What will it take for the Federal Reserve to realize that high interest rates are not the cure for inflation but the cause of inflation?"

Bargaining Process Is Workers' Shield

Collective bargaining is the logical mechanism for the orderly determination of wages and conditions. It is also an appropriate arena in which to make the case for federal workers in the face of undeserved and demoralizing criticisms.

The integrity of the collective bargaining process, with its proven successes, and the true unity of purpose that working people share through their unions, will serve as our shield and banner over the next few months and years as we face a new Administration and Congress.

Saving 'Big Bucks'

Federal Program Cuts Affect Quality of Life for Everyone

CUTTING GOVERNMENT spending touches not just "them," the poor, but all of us.

Consider for a minute what the federal government buys with the $616 billion or so it will spend this year. About 23 percent goes for our common defense. Another 36 percent goes for social security, federal and other pensions, veterans' benefits and related medical coverage—one or another of which almost all of us will receive. Interest payments to all holders of government bonds and notes take another 11 percent.

Only 1.3 percent of the federal budget goes to what most people mean by "welfare," cash payments to about 3 million needy families, and another 1.6 percent to food stamps for 20 million of the poor.

IN FACT, welfare costs are now such a small part of the federal budget that it would almost be worth cutting them out entirely in order to be rid of this convenient scapegoat—were it not for the likely disastrous effect on the lives of some 7 million children, effects we somehow doubt anyone would really relish.

If big bucks are to be saved, it comes down to cutting out benefits for all of us—not just highways, dams, airport subsidies, agricultural and maritime supports, downtown renovations and so forth—but a lot of things that fall in the category of "social service." These include programs to curb child abuse—a problem far from limited to the poor—and to track down fathers who skip out on their child support and alimony payments—most of these aren't poor at all—and subsidized loans for the children of middle-class parents who forgot somehow to stash away the $10,000 a year it now can take for a college education.

Even the Medicaid program for the needy spends the big bulk of its dollars not on caring for slum kids with runny noses, but on nursing homes and other institutional care, not just for the poor, but for people who find themselves outliving their resources and without relatives delighted to assume the cost and responsibility of their care.

YES, THE COUNTRY can and should run its social programs better. But as OMB director-designate David Stockman has noted, waste-cutting "will hardly make a dent" in the budget problem. And reducing waste will take not only time but willingness to invest up-front money in better managerial controls.

If the public has made a decision to cut public spending and investment, it should be quite clear about what this means: everyone will be giving up things that make the particular world we live in a kinder and more pleasant place.

ACTWU Wouldn't Go Away

Union Solidarity a Vital Factor In Victory of Stevens' Workers

WHAT FINALLY brought the victory (at J. P. Stevens)? What was the straw that at last broke the back of company resistance?

Probably there was no last straw, no single tactic or event. Instead, it was the cumulative weight of a multi-pronged attack, and the steady, even progress made in the courts and before the NLRB; persistent organizing and growing strength among the workers; increasing success and visibility for the boycott; increasing isolation of Stevens because of the corporate campaign.

BUT ONE single event that does stand out came at the 1978 ACTWU convention. It had been 15 years since the first card was signed at a Stevens plant and two years since ACTWU was formed by the merger of the Clothing Workers and the Textile Workers. The union had launched a national boycott in the 1976 merger convention, but still had little to show in the way of progress at J. P. Stevens. Still, at that 1978 convention, the union launched a major step-up in organizing efforts. Undoubtedly, a clear message was passed to Stevens officials that the union would not be worn down and weakened.

The 1,500 elected delegates of 1978 roared support of the beleaguered-Stevens workers and increased their dues by $2 a month to finance the union's massive organizing efforts. In nearly two hours of open debate, ACTWU local union delegates from all over the United States and Canada declared they would devote the necessary resources, no matter how long it would take, to winning at J. P. Stevens and bringing union contracts, wages and benefits into the textile industry in the South.

THE CONVENTION action showed dramatically that the entire union was solidly united behind the Stevens workers. It wasn't just a front office campaign or an organizers' campaign. Roots of support extended deep and ACTWU would be in it for the duration.

There's no way to know for sure, but it seems likely the Stevens management knew then it would have to come to terms with the union eventually. ACTWU just wasn't going to go away.

Poultry Workers Fight for Union

Mass Firings, Abuse of Rights Spur Drive at Perdue Plants

MASS FIRINGS, dangerous working conditions and assaults on workers' rights have firmed up the resolve to win union representation at Perdue chicken plants, Jerry Gordon of the Food & Commercial Workers declared on Labor News Conference.

Gordon, assistant director of UFCW Region 4, said that Perdue's attempts to subvert the drive to form a union have gone far beyond the bounds of fair and lawful activities and spell out a determination to eliminate the union from the poultry business. Gordon said that although much of the industry is non-union, Perdue has mounted a campaign of fear, oppression and reprisals not found among other poultry producers.

"Perdue has declared war on the union," Gordon charged. He said the company's owner, Frank Perdue, who personally promotes his chickens in nationwide radio and TV ads, is not just an open shop employer. Perdue is buying up union plants, closing them down to renovate and modernize, and reopening them with a non-union work force, Gordon said.

He reported that more than 400 production workers were fired at one Perdue plant, and that penalties and discipline for asking to be "relieved from the line to go to the bathroom" are common. He said the union's boycott has been announced in several major East Coast areas.

GORDON SAID the 1.3-million-member UFCW is gearing up a major public education effort on Perdue's oppressive employment practices, the company's serious health and safety law violations, and its refusal to clean up operations that are charged with polluting air and water in several communities.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE SURGEON GENERAL'S report on the nation's health reads like the popular line: there's some good news and some bad news.

First the good news. National lifestyles have changed over the past decade or so, with more people giving up smoking or cutting down on tobacco consumption. Also, more Americans are eating less of certain calorie- and cholesterol-rich foods like eggs, butter and cream, and getting more exercise.

Now the bad news. One exception to the trend towards healthier lifestyles is the rising number of teenage girls who smoke—up 51 percent in a ten-year period.

More good news. Regardless of income, more people have access to medical care. The percent of U.S. population seeing a physician within two years increased in every age and color group, with the greatest rise among the poor.

BUT THE BAD NEWS is that the poor still may not be getting the care they require to meet their health needs. Also, the poor get fewer preventive services and less dental care than the non-poor.

Sec. Patricia Harris of the Health & Human Services Dept. summed up the findings this way: "This report not only shows how far we have come, but also makes clear how far we have yet to go to conquer disease and assure good health to all in the United States."

Here are some highlights:

- Life expectancy at birth continued to rise, reaching a record 73.3 years in 1978.
- From 1970 to 1978, the death rate from heart disease—the nation's number one killer—dropped by 18 percent, the same amount as it did in the 20 years between 1950 and 1970.
- Deaths from stroke—the nation's number three killer—decreased by a greater amount from 1970 to 1978 than it did in the 20 years from 1950 to 1970, 33 percent compared to 25 percent.
- Deaths from cancer—second only to heart disease in the number of lives lost—has continued to decline for people under age 45 and has recently begun to drop for those 45 to 49 years old.
- The United States continues to have one of the highest rates of teenage fertility among industrial nations although the birth rates for this group are not as high as they were in the early 1970s. Numerous health risks—to mother and child—are associated with early childbearing.
- The infant mortality rate in the United States, which is higher than the rates in most advanced nations, was 13 deaths per 1,000 live births in 1979, a 47-percent drop since 1965. The change is attributed largely to improved survival of low birth-weight babies. Smoking is one cause of low birth-weight. Another is inadequate diet, especially in a teenage pregnancy.

THE RISK FACTORS for heart disease and stroke—the nation's other top killers—include smoking, high blood pressure, high serum cholesterol, diabetes, overweight and physical inactivity.

Some factors can be manipulated to help prevent illness and promote good health. The report points out that "some kinds of preventive actions, such as stopping smoking, can be taken only by the individual at risk. . . . Still others, such as the control of toxic agents in the environment, demand the involvement of many sectors of society—private and government."

The direct and indirect costs of certain lifestyle and environmental hazards include about $15.4 billion for alcohol abuse; $27.3 billion for cigarette smoking; $20.7 billion for work-related deaths and injuries, and $4.3 billion for air pollution.

The report estimates that "if preventive actions were successful in cutting direct and indirect cost expenditures by only 10 percent, reductions would still equal billions of dollars."

THE RESOLVE to form a union at Perdue chicken plants has been firmed up by dangerous working conditions and assaults on workers' rights, Jerry Gordon, center, assistant director of Food & Commercial Workers Region 4, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Martha Hamilton of the Washington Post and Patrick Gilbert of the Baltimore Evening Sun. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired weekly on the Mutual network.

NEW HARDSHIPS for the nation's lowest-paid workers are sure to flow from a scheme to set a cut-rate minimum wage for teenagers, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, center, warned. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Rachelle Patterson of the Boston Globe and Drew Von Bergen of United Press International. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast weekly on Mutual radio.

Subminimum Wage Proposal Called Misguided, Simplistic

A cut-rate minimum wage for teenagers is a simplistic idea that would not create more jobs but would mean hardships for the lowest-paid adult workers, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald warned.

Oswald said that "transferring jobs from one person to another at a lower wage rate" would produce "bigger profits for employers," but would provide no incentive for them to put more people to work. He pointed out that while the jobless rate among teenagers is especially high, a far greater number of adults are on the unemployment rolls.

He warned that singling out 18- and 19-year-olds for exception from the basic floor under wages because their unemployment rate is high could open the door for similar exceptions for other groups with higher-than-average unemployment, such as women and elderly workers. Rates of pay, he asserted, should be based on the job that is done, not on age, sex, color or unemployment rates among particular groups.

IN AN APPEARANCE on Labor News Conference, Oswald noted that the law already provides for certification of full-time students to receive less than the minimum for all workers. Job-training and economic stimulus, he said, would be far more effective in cutting back unemployment, which is now at an historically high 7.5 percent.

Oswald pointed out that improvements in the minimum wage have lagged substantially behind the inflation rate, including the Jan. 1 increase to $3.35 an hour—an improvement of only 8.1 percent while inflation is running at 13 percent.

Garment Workers Win Damage Pay For 90 Strikers

Albany, N.Y.—Cotrell & Leonard, Inc., has signed a settlement with the Ladies' Garment Workers to pay $40,000 in damages to some 90 ILGWU members who had been striking the firm for more than a year.

The company, which has been manufacturing academic gowns and caps and religious robes for the past century, also agreed to remedy all labor law violations and unfair labor practices it was charged with.

In endorsing a national boycott of Cotrell & Leonard in August, the AFL-CIO Executive Council pointed out that the company had been cited by the National Labor Relations Board for more than 50 violations of federal labor law.

While welcoming the settlement as a victory for ILGWU Local 163, the union noted that Cotrell & Leonard had made arrangements to sell the firm to Beatrice Food Co., a Chicago-based conglomerate, for reasons unrelated to the dispute.

After the takeover, Beatrice took steps to close the Albany manufacturing facility despite community efforts providing for financial aid to keep the plant open.

The ILGWU local is now negotiating with the company to provide termination benefits for the displaced workers.

Dystrophy Association Elects Gannon, O'Neal

New York—Fire Fighters' President John A. Gannon was elected a corporate board member of the Muscular Dystrophy Association at the association's year-end board meeting here.

Frederick O'Neal, president of the Actors & Artistes and an AFL-CIO vice president, was named secretary of MDA.

Coordinated Effort Sought

Adult Education Report Stresses Worker Needs

By Susan Dunlop

Formal education is not just for children anymore; adults need it too, the National Panel on Worker Education & Training Policy stresses in a report. The changing character of the workplace and the evolving needs of workers are creating a growing interest in practical work-related schooling for adults, the panel agrees.

Labor, industry, government and the education community each have resources to contribute to improving the availability and quality of adult education, but this effort must be a cooperative one, the panel stresses.

ITS REPORT, "Adult Learning and the American Worker," is part of a 48-month project on worker education and training policies being conducted by the National Institute for Work & Learning with funds from the U.S. Dept. of Education.

Panel members included representatives of labor, business, education and government. AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter G. Davis served on the panel along with Albert Shanker, president of the Teachers; J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers; Douglas Fraser, President of the UAW; Jack Otero, vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, and Bayard Rustin, chairman of the board of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

The panel's report concentrates on determining the need for formal adult education, examining its present structure and proposing some means of improving its future usefulness to working people.

WHILE EDUCATION is traditionally associated with youth, the panel said adults need various forms of continuing education for many reasons. As the work place undergoes change—because of technological developments, import displacement or the geographical migration of industry, for example—workers need new and different skills.

Changes in the economy, such as surging inflation of consumer prices, mean that older workers may want to prolong their working lives and need to be prepared to extend their careers or even change them. Social changes such as the influx of women into the workforce are also creating major needs for adult education and training, the panel's report notes.

The report points out that other adult workers have vital needs for education and training—people who were denied normal education as young people, the growing force of immigrant workers, handicapped workers, and workers from severely underprivileged backgrounds.

THE PANEL stresses that programs of adult education, or lifelong learning, must go beyond broad goals to include the specific information, skills and experiences related to work life and the functioning of the economy.

It notes that existing educational institutions and facilities already offer adults a wide variety of opportunities to learn. One important trend has been the growth of adult education opportunities in public schools, community colleges and vocational and technical schools. Off-campus learning centers, "open universities," degree equivalency and academic credit programs, and other projects have offered a variety of "non-traditional programs for non-traditional students," the report points out.

Many educational opportunities are also available through unions, employers, community-based organizations, the military, correspondence courses, home television instruction and agricultural extension services.

ALTHOUGH THESE sources are diverse, so are the needs of the working population, the panel observes, and it stresses the need to build on and improve existing, familiar resources.

It is important, the panel cautions, to watch the ways in which these institutions are meeting adult education needs to determine "the best fit between what people need and what they are being offered. Post-secondary education institutions often don't listen to what working people have to say about what they want to study."

Adults who had the least education when they were young tend to take least advantage of adult education, the panel concluded, and it called for steps to insure that these individuals are not barred from continuing education in the future.

THE PANEL also warns that the rush to serve adults, fed by the drop in enrollments of young people, should not lead to a decline in standards or quality in adult education.

Among the panel's major conclusions is the importance of "forging links" between labor, business and the education community to accomplish educational goals.

It suggests that one area in which such cooperation can be useful is in the expansion of tuition aid programs. Tuition aid is widely and increasingly available, the panel points out, citing as an example the estimated 200 collective bargaining agreements covering about 2 million workers that provide for tuition aid programs in cooperation with management.

PARTICIPATION in such programs remains low, however, and the panel says cooperation among unions, employers and educators can help feed information on such programs to workers, get barriers to participation removed and see to it that the right kinds of courses are offered by the schools.

This kind of cooperation is essential both to give labor and industry a better understanding of the capabilities of learning institutions and to give educators a realistic appraisal of the kind of education workers want and the skill training employers need in real work settings, the report concludes.

Labor Studies Center Lists Schedule for January

Three labor studies programs are being offered by the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Silver Spring, Md., during January for officers and staff members of AFL-CIO unions. Three unions, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and the American Institute for Free Labor Development will also use the campus during the month. The schedule:

Basic Skills for Union Leaders, Jan. 11-16—"How-to" classes on improving reading and comprehension, clearer writing, effective speaking and parliamentary procedures.

Advanced Arbitration, Jan. 11-16—An institute on the successful handling of cases involving management rights, discipline and discharge, seniority and contract interpretation.

Negotiating Techniques for Bargaining with State and Local Agencies, Jan. 18-23—A program on bargaining principles, proper preparation, budget analysis and audits.

Unions using the campus for their own leadership training during January are the Teachers, Jan. 5-9; Communications Workers, Jan. 4-23; Railway & Airline Clerks, Jan. 18-23.

The IUD will conduct a conference on national industrial policy, Jan. 9-10.

AIFLD will bring in 40 trade union leaders from Latin American countries Jan. 26 for six weeks of study.

Candidates for Bachelor of Arts degrees will come to the campus Jan. 25-30 for their semi-annual week in residence to prepare their courses of study for the next six months.

The center's staff will be involved in five off-campus programs during the month. An institute on current economic issues is scheduled Jan. 18-21 at the University of California, Berkeley. An AFL-CIO Pension Fund Investment Briefing is set for Atlanta, Jan. 26 and 27. Three training sessions for the Center's National Project on Transit Technology & Innovation are scheduled at Michigan State University, East Lansing, Jan. 4-9; University of California, Berkeley, Jan. 11-16, and the University of Alabama, Birmingham, Jan. 25-30.

Information on these and other labor studies programs can be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

crats. Despite the virtual collapse of the intricate budget-setting timetable last year, this remains potentially one of the most important committees. The new lineup is Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) as chairman and Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), who succeeded Sec. of State Edmund Muskie as chairman last year, becoming ranking minority member.

COMMERCE, SCIENCE & TRANSPORTATION — From 10 Democrats, 7 Republicans to 9 Republicans, 8 Democrats. A relatively amicable swap at the top makes Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) the new chairman and drops Howard W. Cannon (D-Nev.) to ranking minority member. But committee membership changes are likely to make the body less responsive to consumer concerns.

ENERGY & NATURAL RESOURCES — From 11 Democrats, 7 Republicans to 11 Republicans, 9 Democrats. At the top, James A. McClure (R-Ida.) becomes chairman and Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) drops to ranking minority member. Western influence continues strong.

ENVIRONMENT & PUBLIC WORKS — From 8 Democrats, 6 Republicans to 9 Republicans, 7 Democrats. In a politically compatible switch, Robert T. Stafford (R-Vt.) moves up to chairman and Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.) becomes ranking minority member.

FINANCE — From 12 Democrats, 8 Republicans to 11 Republicans, 9 Democrats. This important committee has been generally conservative even under Democratic control and will become even more so. Its new chairman is Robert Dole (R-Kan.), and Russell B. Long (D-La.) drops to ranking minority member.

FOREIGN RELATIONS — From 9 Democrats, 6 Republicans to 9 Republicans, 8 Democrats. Little change is anticipated as Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.) becomes chairman and Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) takes the ranking minority spot.

GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS—From 9 Democrats, 8 Republicans to 9 Republicans, 8 Democrats. The Chairman will be William V. Roth (R-Del.), and Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) is the senior minority member. The changes are fewer than in most committees.

JUDICIARY — From 10 Democrats, 7 Republicans to 10 Republicans, 8 Democrats. A big switch here as Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), with an 88 percent "wrong" COPE record, becomes chairman. Joseph R. Biden, Jr. (Del.), becomes ranking minority member with Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) electing to shift his seniority to the Labor & Human Resources Committee. Three of the four new Republican members are strong conservatives.

LABOR & HUMAN RESOURCES — From 9 Democrats, 6 Republicans to 9 Republicans, 7 Democrats. The big change, obviously, is the switch from the COPE 93 percent "right" record of Democrat Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (N.J.) to the 7 percent "right" record of the new chairman, Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah). Williams shifted his committee seniority to the Banking Committee and Kennedy becomes the ranking Democrat. Since all seven committee Democrats are liberals, Republican moderates Robert T. Stafford (Vt.) and Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (Conn.) will determine the committee's direction.

Among the lesser ranked Senate committees, Rules & Administration will be headed by Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R-Md.), Veterans Affairs by Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), Ethics by Malcolm Wallop (R-Wyo.), Indian Affairs by William S. Cohen (R-Me.), Intelligence by Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), Small Business by Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (R-Conn.), and Aging by John Heinz (R-Pa.).

Prime Rate Fluctuations Cloud Economy

The outlook on interest rates remained murky in the face of continued strong business credit demand and surprising resilience in the overall economy.

While most major banks kept their prime lending rate at a record 21.5 percent, three of the nation's 20 largest banks lowered their prime rates to 20.5 percent. Whether the downward trend in this key lending rate continued was the subject of intense debate in money-market circles, however.

BUSINESS-LOAN demand jumped $1.5 billion to a record $170.35 billion in the week ended Dec. 17, the Federal Reserve Board announced. And new numbers from the Commerce Dept. reflected a rebounding economy during the third quarter of the year, albeit one with strong inflationary pressures.

In a revised report, the Commerce Dept. said the nation's real gross national product climbed at an annual rate of 2.4 percent in the third quarter, far above the rate of nine-tenths of 1 percent that had been previously reported. Real GNP is the total value—adjusted for inflation—of all the goods and services produced by the nation.

The July-September gain was attributed mainly to final sales, which rose at a 4.1 percent annual rate. The high level of final sales meant that goods were not piling up in warehouses, a sign of optimism since swollen inventories eventually lead to cutbacks in production.

THE DEPARTMENT'S chief economist, Courtenay M. Slater, reported, meanwhile, that preliminary estimates indicated a fourth-quarter gain in real GNP of just under 4 percent.

In other revised figures, Commerce said the sharp recessionary decline of the second quarter of 1980 was even worse than at first reported. Real GNP fell 9.9 percent in the April-June period, rather than 9.6 percent as previously estimated. Also, the government put the first-quarter gain last year at 3.1 percent instead of 1.2 percent.

In other economic reports:

- F. W. Dodge, a McGraw-Hill Inc. subsidiary, reported that the value of construction contracts awarded in November reached $13.3 billion, a gain of 13 percent from the year-earlier period. November's jump in construction activity was attributed, however, to a temporary decline in interest rates last summer. Over the first 11 months of the year, the value of new construction contracts was down 15 percent from the same period of 1979.

- Machine-tool orders rose slightly in November from October to $331.7 million, but lagged 23 percent behind a year earlier. High-interest rates are discouraging some smaller concerns from buying, the National Machine Tool Builders' Association said.

Rozanne Weissman Named To CWA Public Affairs Post

Rozanne Weissman will join the Communications Workers staff Jan. 16 as publice affairs director to succeed Lee M. White, who retired Sept. 30, CWA President Glenn E. Watts announced.

Weissman, media and community relations coordinator for the National Education Association, has been on the NEA staff for the past 13 years.

No Relief in Sight

Outlook Continues Bleak For Consumer Prices

of the CPI are not expected to moderate in the next few months. If anything, many forecasters expect them to accelerate. Recent price increases by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) have not yet shown up at the gasoline pump. Interest rate increases will continue to work their way into the index even after short-term rates begin to peak. And the outlook for beef and other food prices is expected to worsen over the first half of 1981. The Agriculture Dept. last week forecast that overall food prices would rise 10 to 15 percent in 1981.

MEANWHILE, workers' purchasing power continues to trail rising prices. Real spendable earnings, or take-home pay stripped of the impact of inflation increased a slight two-tenths of 1 percent in November. But on a year-to-year basis they were down 5.1 percent. A typical nonfarm worker in private industry who had three dependents grossed $243.57 in current dollars in November. In constant, 1967 dollars, however, this was the equivalent of just $94.92—a drop of $4.11 over the past 12 months.

November's increase in the CPI—the third consecutive monthly rise of 1 percent—made it certain that when the December figure is announced the index will have climbed at a rate of more than 10 percent for the second straight year. The CPI rose 13.3 percent in 1979.

Food and beverage prices rose 1.1 percent in November, after climbing nine-tenths of 1 percent in October. Prices for eggs, beef, pork, fish and other seafood all moved substantially higher, BLS said. Poultry prices decreased by 2 percent after rising for four months.

"The 1.5 percent increase in other foods at home was largely due to a 7.8 percent increase in sugar and artificial sweeteners and higher prices for soft drinks," BLS said. Prices for fresh fruits and vegetables rose eight-tenths of 1 percent, following a 3 percent decline in October.

RISING SHELTER costs accounted for most of the 1 percent jump in the housing component of the CPI, reflecting the renewed surge in mortgage interest rates, which are more than 15 percent in some localities.

Transportation costs were up 1.5 percent over the month, following a rise of seven-tenths of 1 percent in October. Used car prices soared by 5.1 percent, the third consecutive large monthly increase in this category. New car prices increased five-tenths of 1 percent.

After relatively modest increases in some recent months, the energy price picture for November was mixed. Gasoline prices increased eight-tenths of 1 percent while natural gas and electricity charges fell 2 percent. But household fuel oil prices jumped 1.5 percent.

BLS REPORTED that the average nationwide price of a gallon of regular, leaded gasoline was $1.188, unchanged from October. For unleaded gasoline, the average November price was $1.25.

Apparel prices rose a slight one-tenth of 1 percent in November. Medical care costs increased seven-tenths of 1 percent.

Steelworkers Gain Refund Of Dues to Company Union

Newport News, Va.—Steelworkers employed at the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. have won reimbursement of dues the firm continued to deduct from their pay on behalf of a company union after the employees had revoked their dues-checkoff authorizations.

The award by the National Labor Relations Board is another in a series of legal findings emanating from the Steelworkers' Jan. 31, 1978, representation victory over the Peninsula Shipbuilding Association, the company union.

IT TOOK the USWA more than two years to overcome legal maneuverings by the company and win representation rights as the exclusive bargaining agent for the shipyard's 16,000 production and maintenance workers.

Last July, NLRB Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz ordered the shipyard and PSA to reimburse any workers from whose wages union dues were improperly deducted and turned over to the company union. This remedy was upheld by the board in its ruling. The NLRB estimated that about 215 workers were owed approximately $88 each, or a total of about $20,000.

Immediately following the representation election, a number of PSA members who had authorized the shipyard to deduct dues from their wages and remit them to the company union informed the management that they wished to revoke their checkoff authorizations.

PSA refused to honor the requests, however, saying that revocation of such authorization could be effected only on forms furnished by the company union.

PSA THREATENED the company with a suit for breach of contract if it honored the revocation requests. The company complied with PSA's position and continued to deduct the dues. The Steelworkers, which had helped the workers draft the checkoff revocation forms they used, subsequently filed unfair labor practice charges against both the shipyard and PSA.

The NLRB judge found that the company and the PSA were guilty of federal labor law violations in their actions restricting employees from exercising their right to revoke the dues checkoff.

Soccer Players Win Accord Setting Pay Floor, Benefits

Player representatives of the North American Soccer League Players Association have approved a memorandum of agreement with team owners providing for minimum salaries, fringe benefits, and work rules.

Ed Garvey, who headed the union negotiators, said the parties now "must develop actual contract language before the memorandum will become a collective bargaining agreement, but an arbitrator will resolve any differences."

GARVEY ADDED that "management and the union are now governed by the memorandum," thus ending a three-year effort by the union to obtain an agreement.

About 500 players on the NASL's 24 teams are covered by the accord. Player representatives voted 20 to 1 to accept the agreement, which the owners previously had approved. A vote on the memorandum by dues-paying members of the NASLPA is now in progress.

The NASLPA is a branch of the Federation of Professional Athletes chartered by the AFL-CIO in 1979.

Highlights of the agreement include:

- Minimum salaries of $18,000 for rookies, $19,200 for second-year players and $22,800 for third-year players.
- A guarantee of at least the minimum salary once a player has made the team. Players cut during the season will still collect the minimum pay for the remainder of the year.
- An injured player will receive the minimum salary through the following year. If the injury ends his career, the player will receive an additional $25,000.
- All disputes, except those involving on-field conduct, will be resolved by an impartial arbitrator.
- Player fines will be limited to 2 percent of the monthly wage and all fine money will go to a "career counseling and continuing education" fund to which the NASL club owners will contribute an additional $42,000.
- All clubs will provide a program of health, accident, and life insurance under a jointly administered insurance trust. There will also be a post-career insurance plan.
- Players will have free choice of playing indoors or not.

In addition, foreign players now in the United States on work permits will be protected, but there is a commitment by the two sides to develop a reserve league of American players and to increase their number on the field. In 1982 and 1983, no fewer than four North American players must be on the field. This compares with two under the present arrangement.

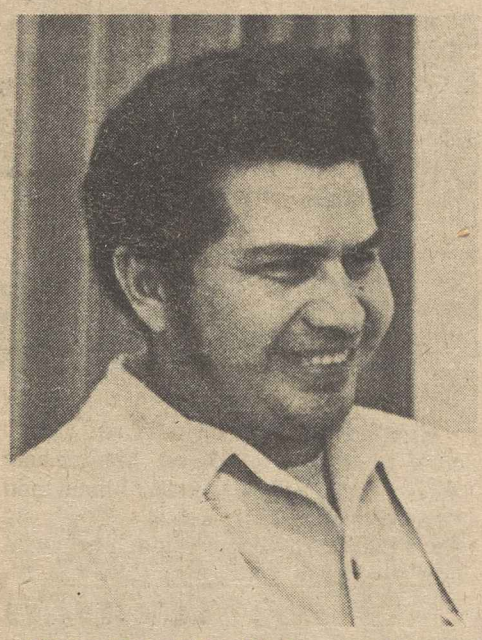
NASL Commissioner Phil Woosnam said the agreement will end the league's immediate immigration problems and issues related to the indoor season, "and we can now proceed to develop a good working relationship between labor and management."

THE SIX CANADIAN clubs in the league will sign the agreement with the union separately and will honor its provisions in all respects, Garvey said.

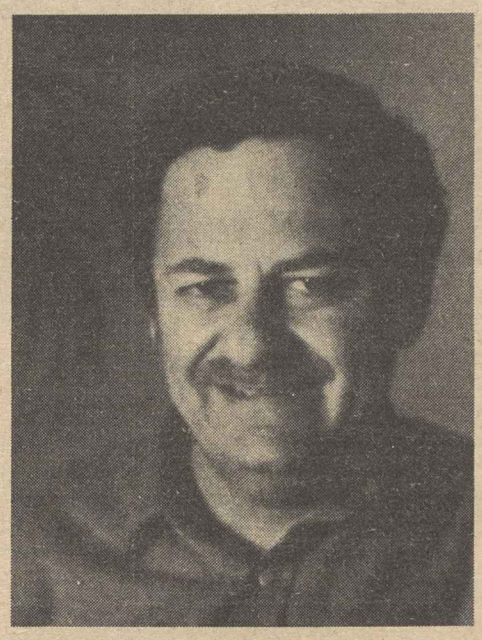
The settlement caps a long struggle by the union to bring the players under a collective bargaining agreement. The NASLPA began its campaign three years ago and won representation rights for U.S. teams by a wide margin, but the owners refused to bargain. The National Labor Relations Board ordered the clubs to negotiate over a year ago, and a court ruling backed up the agency. Talks began last fall at the end of the soccer season.

Reluctant Bid to Strikers Swells Firm's Dinner Tab

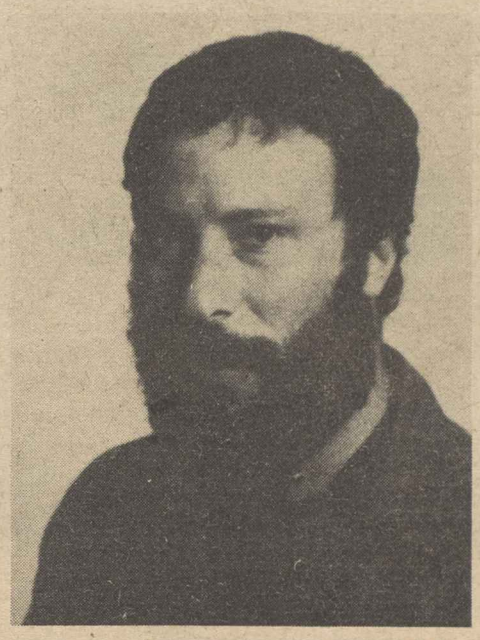
Abingdon, Va.—Dinner for two. On the house. Westinghouse, that is.



That's what some 250 workers at the Westinghouse facility here have won as a result of unfair labor practice charges filed by their union, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.



The IUE went to the National Labor Relations Board after the company sent thank-you notes—along with tickets for dinner at a local steak house—to about 50 non-strikers who worked through the union's seven-week walkout at the Westinghouse plant last year.



Since the strikers did not receive dinner tickets, IUE charged the firm with discrimination on the basis of their union activity, and won. The settlement, part of an NLRB order backed up by an appellate court, requires the company to send $20 checks to each of the 250 striking employees to remedy the "oversight."

Next time, maybe, Westinghouse will remember to invite everyone to dinner.

Labor Affirms Continuing Aid For El Salvador's Land Reform

SHOT TO DEATH while working to bring about a sweeping redistribution of land in El Salvador were Jose Rodolfo Viera, left, a union leader and head of the country's Institute for Agrarian Transformation, and two representatives of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development, Michael P. Hammer, center, and Mark D. Pearlman.

Murders Stir Wide Outcry, New Support

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO will continue to provide technical aid to El Salvadoran unions seeking to better the lot of peasant-farmers through a massive land-redistribution program "so long as they need and desire our help," Federation President Lane Kirkland pledged in the wake of the assassination of two American union advisers and the El Salvadoran union leader who headed the agrarian reform project.

"We call upon the U.S. government to reiterate its support for the land-reform program for which our brave friends gave their lives, and the success of which would be their best memorial," Kirkland said.

THE VICTIMS were Michael P. Hammer, 42, of Potomac, Md., Mark D. Pearlman, 36, of Seattle—both representatives of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development—and Jose Rodolfo Viera, 43, the director of the El Salvadoran government's Institute for Agrarian Transformation. They died in a hail of bullets in a hotel in San Salvador, El Salvador's capital city.

"These good men were in El Salvador to assist that nation's peasant unions to participate in a land-reform program designed to improve the lives of hundreds of thousands of small farmers, and to lay the foundation for a stable, democratic society," Kirkland observed.

He said the AFL-CIO was "outraged and saddened" by the killing of Hammer and Pearlman by terrorists, and equally grieved by the assassination of Viera, "our brother and friend," who also directed the Salvadoran Communal Union, a peasant-farmer group organized with AIFLD's help in 1966.

"THE AFL-CIO calls upon the government of El Salvador to bring those responsible for these brutal murders to justice, and redouble its efforts to bring about agrarian reform for the benefit of El Salvador's impoverished workers," Kirkland said. "Clear title must be granted to the 210,000 poor farmers who have been promised land.

"The forces of extremism, the totalitarian right and left, must not be permitted to destroy the prospects for democratic reform, upon which depend the hopes of farmers and workers for a more peaceful and prosperous life."

The assassinations, which followed with-

Two Labor Board Seats Set for Reagan Choices

President-elect Ronald Reagan will have an opportunity to appoint two new members of the National Labor Relations Board shortly after he assumes office this month.

That prospect developed with John A. Penello's announcement that he plans to resign from the NLRB, effective Jan. 14, seven months before his term would expire. Besides a successor to Penello, Reagan will be able to name a replacement for John C. Truesdale, whose recess appointment by President Carter last summer is good through the first session of the new Congress unless a replacement is chosen sooner.

REAGAN MAY ALSO choose to designate a new chairman of the board since the current chairman, John H. Fanning, is a Democrat. Howard Jenkins, Jr., now the lone Republican on the board, could be named chairman or Reagan could designate one of the two new members he is expected to name to that position. Don A. Zimmerman, a member since last August, is a registered independent. Both Penello and Truesdale are registered Democrats, but Penello has often dissented from board decisions that supported union positions.

While the political makeup of the board is not statutorily dictated, tradition has resulted in a split panel generally reflecting the party of the incumbent President.

In his resignation announcement, Penello said he had submitted a brief letter to President Carter and a longer one to Reagan giving his reasons for leaving at this time. Penello, 71, an NLRB member since 1972 and a career employee since 1937, wrote Reagan that pay levels for top government officials are unfair.

"EXECUTIVE LEVEL salaries have been essentially frozen for active government officials, while retired government officials have been receiving full cost-of-living increases twice a year," Penello observed.

"I have already stayed on active service more than a year beyond the point at which retirement would have been most financially advantageous to me, and I have sacrificed several cost-of-living increases as a result."

Penello added that he would have had to forgo another cost-of-living increase if he did not retire by Jan. 16. He said that he had stayed on this long and "made the sacrifice because I felt that the President (Carter) would most likely choose as my successor someone whose views were philosophically incompatible with mine."

Penello's NLRB service spans more than 43 years. He joined the agency in 1937 as a field examiner in the agency's Baltimore regional office, then served as regional director in its St. Louis, Minneapolis, and Baltimore offices. He also held the post of associate general counsel in charge of field operations.

Budget, Taxes Key Issues in 97th Congress

The 97th Congress moved through its opening ceremonies according to a time-honored script, but put off consideration of any substantive legislation until after Jan. 20, when President-elect Ronald Reagan will take office.

For the first time since the final days of the Hoover Administration, political control of Congress will be split. Republicans captured 53-47 control of the Senate in the November elections, while Democrats held control of the House with a reduced 243-192 majority.

IN BOTH BODIES, conservatives made big gains, and the extent of the tilt to the right is likely to be measured early in the session when Congress faces big battles over budget priorities and tax changes.

President Carter will submit to Congress on Jan. 15—just five days before he leaves office—a proposed budget for the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1, 1981. By all accounts, it will be a tight bare-bones budget. The incoming Administration is expected to propose still further cuts.

A first skirmish came on the opening day of Congress, when House Republicans sought, through an amendment to the rules, to limit federal outlays to percentage of the estimated gross national product for that year—starting at 22.5 percent for

Senate Begins Hearings on Cabinet

The start of Senate confirmation hearings on President-elect Ronald Reagan's Cabinet choices gave the nation its first authentic glimpse of the Administration that will run the government for the next four years.

Reagan completed his Cabinet selections with the appointment of Terrell Bell as Secretary of Education. Bell is state commissioner of education in Utah and was strongly recommended by Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), chairman of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, which will hold hearings on the nomination. Bell was head of the Office of Education in the Ford Administration, when it was under the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

ONLY A FEW of the Cabinet confirmation hearings had been completed when the AFL-CIO News went to press, but they pointed up some of the conflict between campaign rhetoric and economic realities.

Thus, Treasury Sec.-designate Donald T. Regan echoed the Republican contention that federal spending is the chief cause of inflation and tax cuts for business the chief tool of economic recovery.

But he conceded that the new Administration's programs are not likely to quickly turn the economy around.

The best he could anticipate—"if everything goes well"—is a balanced budget in the fourth year of the Administration.

Regan, who headed the big Merrill Lynch chain of stockbrokers, said he considered business failures "just part of capitalism" but didn't rule out further assistance to the Chrysler Corp. The auto and housing industries are "underpinnings" of the economy, he said.

Likewise, Defense Sec.-designate Caspar W. Weinberger agreed with the need to upgrade the nation's military strength, but balked at conservative suggestions for a firm commitment to a 5 percent annual increase in "real" spending for defense, after allowing for inflation. "I don't believe in these fixed percentages," he testified.

FORMER PENNSYLVANIA Sen. Richard S. Schweiker, chosen to head the Dept. of Health & Human Services, warned that a later retirement age or a holddown on benefits may be necessary to keep the social security system solvent.

He voiced opposition to using general tax revenue to supplement the payroll tax financing of the old age, disability and survivor insurance program.

Schweiker said he couldn't support a national health insurance program that would go beyond "catastrophic" and "fill-the-gaps" coverage. Anything more comprehensive "just wouldn't fit" the Administration's position, he said.

Court Upholds NLRB Ruling On Stevens

Richmond, Va.—A federal appellate court declared that J. P. Stevens & Co. "cannot avoid the shadow of its past" and upheld an order by the National Labor Relations Board that included a nationwide remedy for unfair labor practices at its Rocky Mount, Va., plants during a union organizing campaign in 1976.

Since the NLRB ruling, Stevens has reached agreement with the Clothing & Textile Workers (ACTWU) on a contract covering plants already organized by the union and those where workers subsequently vote for union representation.

ACTWU TERMED the agreement a "turning point" in its relations with the Stevens chain, which it had battled for nearly two decades.

The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, however, rejected the textile chain's contention that its past opposition to unionization should not be a factor in the Rocky Mount unfair labor practices case.

The court said the Stevens chain's "heritage of intrasigence" justified remedies that included the reading and posting of notices at all its plants, union access to bulletin broads and the right of union representatives to speak to workers on company time after an election had been scheduled. The remedies, for a two-year period, were in addition to the specific actions required at Rocky Mount.

The appellate court said that the Stevens management can avoid being judged on its past record through "affirmative steps" demonstrating its change of policy "or a sustained period of time without serious violations."

A TRUE STORY is behind "Nine to Five," a new comedy film about the plight of office clerical workers. Service Employees Local 925 in Boston grew out of an organization called "9 to 5" one of the earliest unions born of the women's movement. In a scene from the movie, stars Dolly Parton, Lily Tomlin and Jane Fonda commiserate over unfair treatment at the office.

Labor Backs Medicare Ban On Funds for Union-Busting

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has urged the Health Care Financing Administration to continue to prohibit the use of Medicare funds to finance union-busting programs of hospitals and nursing homes.

The agency, part of the Dept. of Health & Human Services, had invited public comments on its policy regarding expenses related to union activities in determining Medicare reimbursements.

CURRENT POLICY bars reimbursement for costs incurred to influence health care employees for or against union representation, but allows as a normal business expense the cost of negotiating with a union chosen by employees.

A number of hospitals, like other employers, have hired management consultants and have mounted major campaigns to thwart union organizing campaigns. Unions that have been targets of such campaigns have charged that hospitals sometimes get federal funds to subsidize union-busting despite the government's policy.

The existing policy certainly should not be weakened, Kirkland insisted. He noted that Congress in 1974 affirmed the right of health care workers to union organization by eliminating the previous exemption of non-profit hospitals from the National Labor Relations Act.

KIRKLAND POINTED out that the government's policy does not prohibit health care institutions from trying to prevent union organization by legal means.

A provider of health care, as an employer, "is free to oppose employee organization within the limits set by the national labor laws," Kirkland said. But no employer has the right to use federal subsidies for such a purpose, he stressed, just as a union seeking to organize the workers has no right to federal funding of its organizing campaign.

By contrast, Kirkland noted, legitimate collective bargaining expenses are valid costs since federal law requires an employer to negotiate in good faith with a union chosen by a majority of workers.

Radio Union Merges With Deck Officers

New York—Members of the American Radio Association have voted overwhelmingly to approve a "consolidation agreement" that joined their union to the Masters, Mates & Pilots, the 100-year-old organization of licensed deck officers. The MM&P, in turn, is an affiliate of the International Longshoremen's Association.

News of the ratification vote, fittingly, was transmitted to all U.S. merchant ships at sea through the ARA Free Press, the weekly radio news report the union provides for its members and "all our shipmates."

THE JAN. 5 transmittal carried a welcome from the president of the expanded Masters-Mates union, Capt. Robert J. Lowen, and a report on the merger by ARA President William R. Steinberg, who now also is a vice president of the MM&P.

In a mail referendum of the more than 500 ARA members, 93 percent approved the consolidation agreement. The pact had already been approved by the MM&P, in a vote taken at the union's convention last July.

Steinberg will represent the new Communications & Electronics Group on the MM&P executive board and the ARA group will continue to negotiate and administer its own contracts.

His report to ARA members at sea stressed that "we shall continue to do all things that we formerly did. . . . The big difference is that we now do all these things as ARA-MM&P, part of a larger, united organization."

The MM&P executive board meeting that welcomed the ARA also formally installed union officers elected and re-elected in a mail referendum conducted by the American Arbitration Association.

LOWEN, WHO WAS elected president of the MM&P in 1978 after having served as secretary-treasurer, won re-election by a 3-1 margin over Charles A. Hemming. Others on his slate also won by big margins or were unopposed.

Allen C. Scott was re-elected executive vice president and Lloyd M. Martin was unopposed for secretary-treasurer.

Five vice presidents were re-elected and Francis Elwood Kyser, former union agent in the Port of Mobile, Ala., was elected vice president for Gulf Ports to succeed Richard M. Casselberry, who retired.

Senate Hearings Continue On Reagan Cabinet Picks

Reagan's choice for Secretary of the Interior, James G. Watt, has thus far proved the most controversial of the Cabinet choices.

WATT HAD headed the Moutain States Legal Foundation that was largely financed by Joseph Coors, the right-wing Colorado brewer, to counter the efforts of conservation groups. Former Wisconsin Sen. Gaylord Nelson testified on behalf of the Wilderness Society in opposition to Watt.

At the Senate hearings, Watt defended his record and said he favored "a balance between the development and protection of our natural resources."

Agriculture Sec.-designate John R. Block said he favored maximum export of agricultural products, even if it boosted consumer prices at home, and opposed food embargoes except as "a last resort." He said he thought the food stamp program could be cut but didn't have any "specific plans" on how it could be done.

TRANSPORTATION Sec.-designate Andrew Lindsay Lewis, Jr., said the decision on further aid for the nation's ailing automobile industry will be made by Reagan. But he doesn't think the President-elect would "just stand by and watch something go belly up if there was something he could do about it."

Lewis said he personally favors the 55-mile-an-hour speed limit but thinks the decision on whether to retain it should be left to the states.

Commerce Sec.-designate Malcolm Baldrige said he saw his role in the Reagan Cabinet as "aggressively" representing the views of businessmen.

HE FAVORS "top to bottom" deregulation of business. Consumers should have protections, but it would be "inflationary" to live in a "no-risk society," he testified.

He told the Senate committee that his 30 years of leadership of a multinational corporation gave him the background to be "a good Secretary of Commerce."

Confirmation hearings were scheduled or being held for the other Reagan Cabinet selections. The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee scheduled hearings on Labor Sec.-designate Raymond J. Donovan for Jan. 12. Donovan, meanwhile, visited the AFL-CIO building for a get-acquainted meeting with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

REAGAN WAS expected to continue the post of special trade representative as a Cabinet-level office and then turn to the appointment of the key sub-Cabinet officials—the deputies, assistant secretaries and agency heads who will in effect "run the government" for the next four years.

The key White House appointments that in all recent administrations have been at least as important as Cabinet selections do not require Senate confirmation. Most of the top staff positions have now been filled, but in some cases the division of duties has only been broadly indicated.

Allan L. Swim Dies at 69, Publicity Director for CIO

Daytona Beach, Fla.—Allan L. Swim, publicity director of the CIO during the 1940s and a retired Foreign Service officer, died of cancer Jan. 1 at Halifax Hospital here.

Swim, who was 69, had been a member of the Newspaper Guild since 1937 and served as president of the Memphis, Tenn., local. He was publicity director of the CIO from 1946 until beginning his government career in 1951. Swim was chief of publications for the old U.S. Information Agency from 1964 to 1969. He retired from government service in 1970.

Irving Abramson Dies at 75, Labor Activist for 4 Decades

Essex Fells, N.J.—Irving Abramson, who served a number of AFL-CIO unions as an organizer, legal counsel and consultant over four decades dating back to the 1930s, died of leukemia Jan. 6 at his home here. He was 75.

Abramson also had been president of the New Jersey CIO in the early 1940s and played a key role in the merger of the Clothing Workers and Textile Workers in 1976 to form ACTWU. He also was on the legal team that won the long court battle for Darlington mill workers against Milliken Corp.

IN A MESSAGE to his wife Miriam, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said Abramson's life and work "were a blessing to all of the working men and women whose rights he defended with skill and wisdom in a thousand courtroom battles."

Kirkland said Abramson was admired and respected by his friends at the AFL-CIO and that "countless others who never knew his name are better off because he lived."

After graduating from St. John's School of Law in New York, Abramson began his trade union career with the CIO's Textile Workers Organizing Committee in the mid-1930s. He later was with the Clothing Workers, TWUA, Insurance Workers, Jewelry Workers and the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

ABRAMSON SERVED as legal counsel for the New York-New Jersey district of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in the 1950s. He was appointed general counsel of the IUE in 1965, serving until his retirement in 1971. During that period, he also was an adviser to the 13-union AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee for General Electric and Westinghouse workers.

In addition to his wife, he is survived by two children and five grandchildren. Services were held Jan. 8 at Temple Sholom in Cedar Grove, N.J.

Nurses at 2 Hospitals Choose District 1199

New York—Registered nurses at two hospitals here have voted in separate elections for representation by District 1199, the hospital and health care division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Over 580 nurses will be represented at Lenox Hill Hospital where the vote for the union was 243 to 223. The union won by a margin of 47-31 at Manhattan Eye, Ear & Throat Hospital where 89 nurses will be in the bargaining unit. The union already represents service and maintenance employees at both facilities.

Major issues in both campaigns were understaffing, forced overtime, lack of grievance procedures, and the need for greater recognition of nurses' professional skills.

Assassination of Unionists Stirs Widespread Outrage

in weeks the slaying of Felipe Zaldivar, president of the major democratic urban labor center, "are further proof of the determination of the extremists to destroy democratic institutions," Kirkland declared.

Zaldivar headed the Federacion de Sindicatos de la Industria de la Construccion, Similares, Transporte y de Otras Actividades. He was gunned down in front of the organization's headquarters building in San Salvador just as he was about to embark on a visit to the United States.

In a letter to Kirkland, President Carter said that the land-reform work of Hammer, Pearlman, and Viera "has not only served the cause of social justice; it has also been an effective instrument to counter the radical Marxism that would replace an old tyranny with a new one.

"In their memory, we must all rededicate ourselves to put an end to the senseless terrorism of both right and left, and to implement the agrarian reform."

Carter added that the sacrificial effort of Hammer and Pearlman in behalf of the El Salvadoran reform project was "a tribute to the courage and idealism of the AFL-CIO and of the free labor movement in this hemisphere."

AIFLD EXECUTIVE Director William C. Doherty, Jr., said he believed that Hammer and Pearlman were the first American trade unionists killed in Latin America—possibly in the world—while carrying out their official duties overseas.

Their assassination came as "a complete and total shock," he said, adding: "We don't know who did the killing. It could have been people either from the extreme right or extreme left. Both have killed many thousands of people down there."

The slayings occurred a month after the U.S. government officially protested the murder of four American missionaries in El Salvador and temporarily withheld financial aid from that country, a Central American republic about the size of Massachusetts. The missionaries—three Roman Catholic nuns and a lay worker—were found shot to death southeast of the capital. Another American, a private security adviser to the El Salvadoran police, was killed on Dec. 17.

PRESSURE FROM poor farm workers and sharecroppers for land ownership has been a major source of political violence in El Salvador during the past year. The agrarian reform program, under which large plantations have been expropriated, with compensation, by the government and turned over to peasant-farmers, has been under attack from both left-wing, communist-inspired guerrilla forces intent on destabilizing the country and a relatively small number of large landholders who want to hang on to the status quo. More than 9,000 people died last year in the most ferocious campaign of violence El Salvador has seen in a half-century.

The U.S.-backed junta, a coalition of civilian and military leaders that came into power in October 1979, has pledged a full investigation into the killings of Hammer, Pearlman, and Viera, but El Salvadoran police say they have no leads. President Jose Napoleon Duarte, the head of the junta, said, however, that "in my opinion, it was almost certainly an action by the extreme right."

JULIO ALFREDO Samayoa, El Salvador's minister of labor and social security, condemned the killing of the three men, saying they were "executed by extremists who oppose the process of agrarian transformation, which is being put into effect for the benefit of hundreds of thousands of campesinos (peasant-farmers)."

Others also condemned the murders, including free trade union leaders around the world. Otto Kersten of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels said in a wire to Kirkland that the ICFTU "learned with horror and indignation of the vile assassination of your representatives in El Salvador." Nicholas Redondo and Manuel Simon, general secretary and international affairs secretary, respectively, of Spain's Union General de Trabajadores, also expressed aversion over the deaths, and extended sympathies.

Hammer had been with AIFLD for 17 years. Jesse A. Friedman, assistant director of AIFLD, knew the Paris-born agricultural adviser throughout his long and varied career with the institute, one of three arms through which the AFL-CIO maintains an active and extensive trade-union foreign service.

Friedman said that Hammer started work at AIFLD on a part-time basis while a student at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service in Washington. He received a degree there in 1964, and later studied in Switzerland. He spoke five languages fluently.

HAMMER SERVED with AIFLD in Honduras, Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, Brazil, and elsewhere in Latin America as well as in El Salvador. AIFLD holds contracts with the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID), assisting trade unions in Central and South America and in the Caribbean area. Hammer was in El Salvador to help the ruling junta carry out the land-reform program, which it decreed last March.

ASSASSINATED AGRARIAN CHIEF Jose Rodolfo Viera of El Salvador is shown as he conferred with AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue during his visit to federation headquarters following last November's U.S. elections. Viera, who was also president of the Salvadoran Communal Union, directed the massive land-reform program aimed at stabilizing El Salvador by transferring thousands of acres of farmland to the country's restive poor.

About two years ago, Hammer was put in charge of AIFLD's Agrarian Union Development Service in Washington. The agency provides technical assistance in establishing credit cooperatives for peasant-farmers, organizing peasant unions, advising workers on their legal rights, and on obtaining credit for the purchase of seed and harvesting equipment.

Hammer had arrived in El Salvador on the morning of the day on which he and his companions were gunned down by two unidentified men at San Salvador's Sheraton Hotel, where AID has an office.

He is survived by his wife, Magdalena; a 17-year-old son, Michael Jr.; his father, Edward Hammer of Switzerland; his mother, Lilly Gunther, who lives in New Jersey, and a brother, Frank, in Michigan.

Pearlman joined AIFLD last May as a part-time consultant, and went immediately to El Salvador to work on new regulations for implementing the government's land-redistribution program. He became a full-time staff member on Sept. 1.

A graduate of the University of Washington Law School, he had spent three years as president of the Navarro Ranch Association in California, facilitating the subdivision and development of the 2,000-acre ranch into parcels averaging 40 acres, before he went to El Salvador. His career also included a two-year stint in the Philippines as a Peace Corps volunteer specializing in agricultural extension work.

He is survived by his mother, Mary Pearlman, and a sister, Ann Morton, both of Seattle.

Viera, the target of at least four previous assassination attempts, visited Washington in mid-November, briefing members of President-elect Ronald Reagan's transition team, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, and AIFLD officials on El Salvador's deepening political crisis and expressing his concern over the implementation of the agrarian reform plan.

Friedman said that Richard Oulahan, AIFLD's country program director in El Salvador, quite possibly escaped assassination by returning to the capital several hours late from a trip to nearby Honduras, missing the dinner that he was to have attended with his colleagues. Viera and Hammer died almost instantly. Pearlman died on the way to a hospital.

Pearlman's body was flown to Seattle for burial Jan. 8. Hammer was buried Jan. 9 at Arlington National Cemetery, just outside Washington in neighboring Virginia. An open memorial mass for Hammer is scheduled at Georgetown University's Dahlgren Chapel on Jan. 16 at 11 a.m. Msgr. George C. Higgins will deliver the eulogy.

El Salvador's Land Reform Cultivated Hope

El Salvador's "Land to the Tiller" agrarian reform program in which Michael Hammer, Mark Pearlman, and Jose Rodolfo Viera were so inextricably caught up and sacrificed their lives, offered that country's peasant-farmers more than just a slice of land to call their own.

The land-reform program held out a golden opportunity for the country's mostly poor inhabitants to latch onto freedom and a more prosperous life. Even more, the U.S.-backed program — the biggest non-communist land reform in Latin American history — was seen as a model for achieving some semblance of stability, pre-empting a Cuban-supported revolution that still threatens to throw El Salvador into chaos.

CONCEPTUALLY, the reform program is quite simple and fair to all parties. Starting last March, the government expropriated the large sugar, cotton, and coffee plantations in the country and turned the land over to 60,000 farm families who had been cultivating it. A month later, 7,500 medium-sized holdings were transferred to 150,000 families of tenant farmers and sharecroppers.

In return for the land, the former owners were to receive cash and bonds from the government which, in turn, would receive annual payments over 30 years from the new, present landowners that would total the amount that the government paid the former owners.

The program stalled, however, as leftist guerrillas and Marxist elements saw the land redistribution as a threat to their own support and did everything they could to disrupt it. Conservatives, including former landholders who resented the wholesale turnover of prime farmland to the peasantry, also opposed the plan—the cornerstone of the governing American-supported junta's efforts to liberalize the social and economic structure of the country.

Viera had been designated by the government to head the reform program, and the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development, under a contract with the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID), provided the much needed technical assistance in carrying it out. As AID Director Douglas Bennet, Jr., put it, AIFLD's mission was to support the agrarian reform program in every possible way.

"If we could get land distributed to the farmers, there would be a much better chance of a moderate outcome to the tense political situation," Bennet said in a Washington Post interview. "We were in the middle of an extremely difficult process tried many times in many different countries unsuccessfully. We had high hopes" for El Salvador.

The task presented formidable obstacles. El Salvador's campesinos (peasant-farmers), who make up nearly 40 percent of the country's 5 million inhabitants, have lived for centuries as virtual serfs. The land-redistribution program offered them a chance to gain equity in the land they till, creating a stabilizing, middle-class constituency.

AIFLD EXECUTIVE Director William C. Doherty, Jr., drew a parallel between the agrarian reform plan and the Homestead Act, which in an earlier era helped set up family farms in the American Midwest.

The expropriated estates have been kept intact and farmed cooperatively by campesinos who now own as much as 17 acres each, Doherty observed. The hitch is, however, that many of the sharecroppers have not received clear title to the property. Some former landowners this summer swooped down on the peasants and seized their crops because of the lack of titling.

"That's where the government was dragging its feet," said Doherty, "and that's where Hammer and Pearlman came in." Hammer, described by colleagues as one of the foremost experts on agrarian affairs in Latin America, flew to San Salvador to see what he could do to insure the continuance of the land-reform project. Pearlman had been there seven months, running seminars for employees of Viera's Institute for Agrarian Transformation on interpreting the junta's March land-redistribution decree.

There was an air of despair and disillusionment over the program which Hammer and Pearlman were attempting to dispel when they were cut down by automatic-pistol fire.

'These Good Men'

THE AFL-CIO is outraged and saddened by the cold-blooded murders of American Institute for Free Labor Development representatives Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman by extremist forces in El Salvador.

These good men were in El Salvador to assist that nation's peasant unions to participate in a land-reform program designed to improve the lives of hundreds of thousands of small farmers and to lay the foundation for a stable, democratic society.

We are equally grieved by the assassination of our brother and friend Rodolfo Viera, president of the Union Comunal Salvadorena, the largest democratic peasant organization in the country.

The AFL-CIO calls upon the government of El Salvador to bring those responsible for these brutal murders to justice, and to redouble its efforts to bring about agrarian reform for the benefit of El Salvador's impoverished workers. Clear title must be granted to the 210,000 poor farmers who have been promised land.

THE FORCES of extremism, the totalitarian right and left, must not be permitted to destroy the prospects for democratic reform, upon which depend the hopes of farmers and workers for a more peaceful and prosperous life. These brutal assassinations, coming within weeks of the similar cold-blooded killing of Felipe Zaldivar, president of the major democratic urban trade union center, are further proof of the determination of the extremists to destroy democratic institutions.

The AFL-CIO will continue its support to the rural and urban trade unions of El Salvador so long as they need and desire our help. We call upon the U.S. government to reiterate its support for the land-reform program for which our brave friends gave their lives, and the success of which would be their best memorial.

We extend our deepest, heartfelt condolences to the families of Brothers Hammer, Pearlman and Viera.

—Statement by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

The Only Fitting Memorial

LAND REFORM is the only sensible course for heading off a brutal civil war, but it cannot succeed as long as the "death squads" are able to roam at will. The arrest of the land reformers' assassins could alter the political climate in El Salvador. As a step in this direction, the FBI agents who have been allowed to investigate the recent murder of American nuns might be instructed to extend their inquiry.

The land reform also needs to be pressed forward. About 60,000 peasant families have been established as clear owners of land expropriated, with compensation, from 300 estates. But land titles are still awaited by 150,000 former sharecroppers on 7,500 other farms.

Perseverance in the effort is the only fitting memorial to the many who have now died for it.

Jobs-Productivity Crisis Looms With Computerized Robots

By Gus Tyler

HE SPOKE with awesome authority. The audience, made up mainly of business executives, was tensely attentive, as he spoke of the need to educate the American people about the economy.

"Sixty percent of those we interviewed," he declared, "mistakenly believe that America leads the world in productivity."

I looked around the hall; heads were wagging in despair at this abysmal ignorance of the people.

"They have to be informed, educated, told the truth," declaimed our speaker.

The audience applauded.

YET, TO TELL the truth, it is the would-be educator, not the people, who needs education. The fact is that America does lead the world in productivity, turning out more per person per hour than any other nation.

The misinformation of the educator—who is responsible for a multimillion dollar campaign to "educate" the American people on economics—is but one of the bits of falsity presently circulating on the subject of productivity.

The word is that other countries are catching up with or surpassing us. A simple non-fact!

We are told that not enough money is going into fixed capital investment nowadays. The truth is that in 1979 we invested as much as at any time in the last 30 years.

IT IS SUGGESTED that unions, by their restraining presence, cause productivity to lag. The fact is that productivity is higher in union plants than in comparable non-union plants.

All these explanations are being propagated on the assumption that something is wrong with our productive machine at precisely the moment when the problem we are about to face is precisely the opposite of the problem we are propounding. Before 1990—within ten years—we will face a crisis: not too little, but too much, productivity.

We are at the verge of a new era, as revolutionary in its implications as the Industrial Revolution itself, the age of the robot moved by the microelectronic computer. The robot will supply the physical substitute for humans, with its hands, feet, fingers, eyes, ears; the computer will supply the mental substitute for people with its vast memory banks, its speedy calculations, its ability to make decisions based on millions of permutations and combinations researched in seconds.

THIS REVOLUTION was foreshadowed by the automation of the post World War II years. But the developments of those years were just an inkling of what is to come.

The computerized robot, the inhuman human, cannot be halted. He (she) is fated to dominate our economy: factory or store, office or warehouse, perhaps even teaching and transport.

Like other discoveries and inventions of man—like fire, for instance—the mechanical man can be a blessing or a bane, depending how society uses the marvelous machine.

The danger is that when the magical being enters our lives we will be unprepared, in large part because we will be talking about how unproductive we are at a moment when each of us is too productive—or just permanently unemployed.

Earthquake in Italy Left Trail of Disaster

I have recently returned from a disheartening tour of the Italian earthquake area.

The agony of Italian families, towns, orphans and widows was a stomach-wrenching scene. A disaster like the Italian earthquake, covering some 10,000 square miles, is incomprehensible in its vastness and terrifying in its random unpredictability.

While we have been able to send the Italians some earthquake relief aid, clearly our rich and sympathetic country is in a position to do even more. While the world owes the Italian people a tremendous debt for their contributions to civilization, art and culture, our strong feelings of sympathy and our desire to help now is clearly based on shared humanity.

Only 3 Nations 'Free'

Human Rights Urged as Focus Of U.S. Policy Toward Africa

By Bayard Rustin

IT IS 30 YEARS since Africa began to emerge from the shadows of European colonialism. The overwhelming majority of African states have had national independence for nearly two decades. Enough time has passed for drawing up a balance sheet on Africa and the state of African democracy.

A brief survey of the extent of human rights and freedoms on that large continent reveals a disturbing state of affairs. By the reckoning of Freedom House, a respected monitor of human rights throughout the world and an organization on whose board I serve, of the 46 nations in Africa, only three are assessed to be free. A total of 17 are judged by Freedom House as partly free, and 26 are rated "not free."

THE MOST RECENT annual report of Amnesty International, a human rights organization which monitors the treatment of political prisoners, is a virtual catalogue of tortures and atrocities in Africa.

The world is well aware of the carnage committed in the Central African Republic by the deposed tyrant and self-styled "emperor" Bokassa and in Uganda by deposed dictator Idi Amin. But the Amnesty report singles out many other African states for flagrant human rights violations. The Cuban-backed Leninist regime in Angola continues to ruthlessly suppress dissidents and to execute political opponents.

Ethiopia, another Soviet and Cuban-backed regime, has had a succession of "Red Terror" campaigns against political opponents. These campaigns have involved, according to Amnesty International, "political arrests, mass killings, the exposure in public of the bodies of those summarily executed, and systematic torture." According to informed estimates, by early 1979, the Ethiopian regime held over 8,000 political prisoners. And, as a consequence of unrelenting warfare between Ethiopia and Somalia, 1.3 million refugees have fled Ethiopia, creating a refugee problem rivaled only by Cambodia's.

SOUTH AFRICA, meanwhile, continues to imprison black political leaders, many of whom have died in police custody, and to make use of "banning orders" to exile democratic political opponents to isolated parts of that country. Additionally, there appears to be little lessening of the racist policy of apartheid, although that policy is now opposed by significant portions of the white population as well as by blacks and other non-whites.

In North Africa, the Tunisian government of Habib Bourguiba has been engaged in a relentless campaign of harassment and imprisonment against independent trade union leaders.

The list of victims of African regimes of both the left and the right mounts daily. Yet the discussion of the state of human rights in Africa receives scant attention in the western press, and was ignored by President-elect Reagan in his campaign.

MOREOVER, Reagan's victory has been greeted with skepticism by many Africans. For this reason, the new Administration must act with regard to Africa in an intelligent and comprehensive manner. It is crucial that a Reagan Africa policy promote democratic and anti-racist principles, while protecting America's vital interests. And it is equally crucial that it be a policy which seeks to pressure governments into abolishing torture of political prisoners and prohibiting the execution of political opponents.

The road toward such a policy lies in a strategy that is opposed to apartheid and which simultaneously highlights and opposes the alarming escalation of the Soviet and Cuban presence on that continent.

Such a policy would have the endorsement not only of many of Africa's political leaders, but it would also enjoy the support of broad segments of African society.

THE QUESTION of democracy and human rights in Africa, however, must not be left to governments alone. It is equally the responsibility of those who have struggled for civil rights in this country. I hesitate to issue the call for a new campaign. Such declarations, if unsupported by organizational commitment, ring hollow and are without lasting significance.

However, the time is more than ripe for American blacks and other civil rights advocates to begin a discussion of how to help those Africans who are committed to democratic ideals and social justice.

In the wake of the controversies surrounding the resignation of Andrew Young as United Nations Ambassador, a number of black leaders voiced the opinion that it was time for blacks to play a leading role in shaping American foreign policy. The question of African human rights and the presence of Cuban forces in Africa present the opportunity for playing such a leading role.

Crimp on Low-Income Housing

Reagan's Tight Money Pledge Dims Outlook for Construction

THE INCOMING Reagan Administration is pledged to support the tight money and high interest rate policies that are putting a hard squeeze on housing and construction, AFL-CIO housing analyst Henry Schechter said on Labor News Conference.

A series of such tight money policies since World War II has produced a "predictable, painful course to high unemployment, loss of national product, income and savings that leaves the entire economy weaker," Schechter declared. He said that coupling those policies with "drastic hold-backs of budgetary expenditures" and across-the-board tax cuts will have a severe impact on low-income Americans.

THIS IS the same course that the Thatcher government in Britain has been following with "abysmal failure"—continued high interest rates, increased unemployment and no curb on inflation, Schechter observed.

Schechter, director of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, renewed the call for credit regulations to stem "escalating and wildly fluctuating interest rates." He said that the brief use last spring of such authority under the Credit Control Act—the first use since the law was adopted in 1969—brought "a dramatic reduction in interest rates over a few months," cutting the prime rate from 20 percent to about 10 percent, and the mortgage rate from 16 percent to 11 percent.

But the economic recovery stalled when the controls were lifted in July, Schechter pointed out, adding that "we're now back where we were about this time last year."

Reporters questioning Schechter on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Calvin Zon of Press Associates, Inc., and Alan E. Adams of Employment Relations Report. Labor News Conference is broadcast weekly on Mutual radio.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

A DEBATE IS SHAPING UP that will illuminate America's commitment to helping the poor and needy make their way out of poverty and build more self-reliant and self-respecting lives.

Since the "war on poverty" began in 1964, federal income transfer and anti-poverty programs have helped 11 million people leave the poverty population and kept additional millions from falling below the poverty line, according to a recent report by a presidential advisory panel.

UNFORTUNATELY, nearly 25 million Americans still live in poverty. According to AFL-CIO estimates, the poverty line for an urban family is about $8,729 a year as of November 1980.

The National Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity recently issued a report, "Critical Choices for the '80s," that addressed the problems of unemployment, inflation, job creation and welfare reform. The report also discussed the fate of human needs programs aimed at alleviating these problems.

Council Chairman Arthur Blaustein pointed out that from 1965 through 1969, "real gains were made in our efforts to reduce poverty, but these trends were reversed dramatically in 1970. In 1975 alone, there was an increase of 2.5 million poor, the largest single-year increase since 1959; and the 1974-75 recession increased the poverty population by 3 million people."

THE REPORT also cites a "frightening pattern" of recent shifts in the status of the poverty population that "bodes ill for the future." Certain trends define the pattern of an increasing portion of the poverty population represented by women, youth and minorities who, the council stresses, are beyond the reach of most of the benefits of private sector growth. Among these trends are:

● The "feminization of poverty." Almost one of every three female-headed families is poor; about one in 18 families headed by a man is poor. At the present rate, the council says, "the poverty population would be composed solely of women and their children by about the year 2000."

● Growth in poverty among the very young. From 1969 to 1978, the number of poor children under 18 rose nearly 250,000. Their rate of poverty rose by about 14 percent in that time. More than one in four Hispanic children and about two in five black children were poor in 1978.

● Growing poverty among racial minorities. In 1967, the rate of poverty among black family heads was about 3.75 times that of whites. By 1977, it had reached four times that of the white population.

● Geographical changes. The rate of poverty has risen in the North and West while falling in the South. The greatest increases in poverty rates were among central-city minorities.

● The elderly are in trouble. They account for much of the decrease in official poverty rates during the 1970s—largely due to greater social security benefits—but most of the elderly who have 'moved out' of poverty merely moved from a few hundred dollars below the poverty line to a few hundred dollars above it.

THE COUNCIL'S evaluation of the unemployment situation revealed similar severe problems and troublesome trends. The group reviewed the social costs of recession, inflation and energy shortages that have characterized much of the 1970s. It found increasing numbers of the unemployed were not nearly as well protected by unemployment insurance and other income support programs as has been generally thought.

In fact, the council noted that only about half of the jobless receive unemployment compensation, and large numbers of unemployed persons receive no food stamps or welfare benefits at all.

IN RELEASING the council report, Blaustein said: "Those so-called new conservatives who have gained national recognition by attacking government efforts to help the poor should have the honesty to admit that any proposed cuts in the human services budget will undo the substantial progress of the past 15 years and tumble millions of Americans back below the poverty line."

TIGHT MONEY and high interest rate policies that are squeezing housing and construction are likely to continue with a vengeance under the Reagan Administration, Director Henry Schechter, center, of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Alan Adams, left, of Employment Relations Report and Calvin Zon of Press Associates, Inc.

Payback Differentials

Rating Labels on Refrigerators Aid Buyers on Energy Savings

By Esther Margolius

IF YOU ARE refrigerator shopping, be prepared to check out the ESP rating of the model you select. Aiding you in your calculations —and you would be well advised to take pencil and paper or calculator—will be a black and gold energy guide label which is now government mandated for all models manufactured since May 19, 1980.

ESP stands for "Energy Savings Payback." When you decide to pay more initially for an energy efficient refrigerator, the low operating costs are expected to pay back the differential in price between the high efficiency and the standard models. The payback period can be spread over five years, but is more likely to be realized within two or three years.

For example, one Sears "high efficiency" refrigerator/freezer with an annual operating cost of $45 projects an energy savings of $110 over five years. All estimates are based on a national average rate of 4.97 cents per kilowatt hour. The "high efficiency" model price is $50 higher than a comparable standard model. So at $22 a year energy savings, the payback differential would be returned in slightly over two years.

THE GOVERNMENT energy guide labeling program applies to 13 major household appliances. It is mandated under the 1978 amendment to the Energy Act of 1975.

This labeling is supposed to tell consumers how much it will cost to operate the appliance and how this cost compares to operating costs of all brands of the appliance of similar capacity.

It should be noted that the differential in operating costs between standard and efficiency models would remain even if, as expected, utility rates continue to climb. And the Dept. of Energy is counting on the ESP factor to sell consumers on buying new efficient models and retiring old ones.

Refrigerator buyers in the past generally have ignored operating cost information. For example, less costly to operate manual defrost models have been bypassed in favor of frost-free models.

MANY TWO-WORKER families have selected large capacity side-by-side combinations. Such families favor prepared frozen foods and TV dinners, and usually select models which offer the most freezer capacity along with refrigerator storage together in one compact unit.

Cost-wise, side by sides are the most expensive to buy and operate. However, space restrictions in apartments or small kitchens may be a primary consideration. Often, two separate units, one freezer and one refrigerator, offer both more storage and lower operating costs for the two than for the side by side.

If future Dept. of Energy standards prevail, the continuance of the side by side may be in doubt. Also likely to be cut are the small four- to five-cubic-foot models, as well as single-door and less expensive standard models in the 10- to 13-cubic-foot range. Such extras as icemakers and door ice and water dispensers may have to be dropped.

CURRENT RESEARCH studies conducted by private and government researchers both in Canada and the United States recommend the double door, top freezer/bottom refrigerator combination as the most efficient choice. And the overall size range selected by most manufacturers is the government standard from 16.5- to 18.4-cubic-feet models.

Energy guide labels for high efficiency freezer top refrigerators show the operating cost range for the above capacity to be from $45 to $88 annually. All models examined were frost-free. Retail sale prices ranged from a low of $422 to a high of $860.

There can be confusion as to which energy label gives an accurate appraisal of savings. Because many models also feature manufacturer's labels claiming energy savings, consumers could be misled into believing such represented "high efficiency" models.

BUYERS ALSO should understand what "power saver" switches mean. These switches turn off the heating element which helps to defrost frost-free units. The elements are not essential in cool dry weather as they would be in hot humid conditions. When there is little likelihood of frost build-up, they can be turned off. When off, operating costs can be cut up to 9 percent. Models which utilize heat from condensers instead of heaters for defrosting obviously would not feature such switches. Ask your dealer which type is involved.

Another item to check out is whether the dealer charges for delivery. We found most department stores and catalogue stores do, and such charges can add from $10 to $40 more to the advertised sale price. But there are many appliance stores, including discounters, who do not charge for delivery and this represents additional savings.

Our research also found that the price differential between a standard model and a high efficiency model could be as low as $30. Prices quoted for high efficiency refrigerators varied as much as $100 for the same models in different stores. So careful comparison shopping is advisable.

Soup to Nonsense

Split-Second or Eon—There's No Easy Way to Measure Time

By Jane Goodsell

A MONTH: What the first day you give up smoking seems like.

A slight delay: A maitre d's computation of a 45-minute wait for a reserved table.

An instant: A dentist's estimate of how long the drilling will hurt.

Forever: What that instant feels like to the patient.

One-90th of a second: The interval between the time the traffic light turns green, and the driver of the car behind you starts honking his horn.

A JIFFY: A wife's estimate of the time it will take her to get ready "so you might as well get the car out of the garage, Henry," during which interval she changes her dress, recombs her hair, decides she needs more eye makeup, puts a pound of split peas on to soak, writes instructions to the baby sitter and makes a phone call to her mother.

An hour: A husband's appraisal of the interlude between 5 o'clock and 5:15 which he spent driving around the block because his wife wasn't waiting for him at the corner of 5th and Main as she was supposed to be.

A couple of minutes: What, according to her, she couldn't have been later than.

A CENTURY: A child's evaluation of the time gap between one Christmas and another.

Barely time to turn around: An adult's appraisal of the same time span.

Only yesterday: When it seems to the mother of the bride that her daughter was a tiny gurgling baby in pink booties.

A little while: A doctor's receptionist's evaluation of the time between a 10 o'clock appointment and the 11:55 summons into the doctor's presence.

Agriculture Yearbook

Fuel Conservation Tied to Home Usage

By Goody L. Solomon

THE TENDENCY IN January and February is to rein in family budgets to accommodate the incoming bills, and thrifty use of fuel looms ever more sensible.

Enter with unexpectedly good timing, "Cutting Energy Costs," the Yearbook of Agriculture.

After last year's venture into a colorful and controversial publication for children ("What's to Eat?") the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture has returned to its traditional format using black and white text and illustrations. The latest yearbook—the 81st, by the way—is also characteristically thorough. It offers energy saving tips for farmers, foresters, food manufacturers and consumers. "Every American should find something worthwhile in this volume," says Agriculture Sec. Bob Bergland.

INDEED, THE BOOK makes plain that food activities provide substantial opportunities for fuel conservation. The food system overall consumes 16.5 percent of the country's total energy, with 2.9 percent going for farm production, 4.8 percent for food processing and manufacture, 0.5 percent for wholesaling, 0.8 percent for retailing, 2.8 percent for out-of-home food storage and preparation and 4.3 percent for in-home storage and preparation.

The hard-covered, 408-page book, divided into four major sections, has 48 chapters on topics such as better ways to raise poultry, cheaper ways to move irrigation water, the do's and don't's of home insulation, the energy-efficient home of the future, landscaping to reduce year-round energy bills and tips for home appliances.

To help conserve home use of fuel for food purchasing and cooking, here are some tidbits culled from the chapter by Fern Hunt, professor of home economics at Ohio State University:

- Substituting some grains and field crops (soybeans, oats, wheat and corn) for high quality animal protein can help lower the national energy appetite since animals aren't efficient in converting the plants they eat into body mass.

- As an illustration of the high energy requirements of processing packaging and refrigeration, consider that to slaughter beef and pork takes roughly 910 and 1750 BTUs per pound of live weight. Making wieners, bologna, ham and such increases energy use by 7,000 BTUs per pound of processed meat—or up to 10 times more. That may be partially offset, of course, when the processed meat needs no further heating or cooking before consumption.

- When it comes to home cooking, which accounts for 1.1 percent of the national fuel bill, work habits make for big differences. Writes Hunt: "Energy usage has been shown to vary by as much as 50 percent among women doing identical tasks with the same kitchen range."

How to be efficient? For one suggestion, the pot should be the same size as the stovetop burner; vessels too small or too large dissipate a lot of heat. For another, when cooking potatoes on an electric burner, use a covered saucepan; bring the water to a boil on a high setting; then transfer to a low-setting—not a medium low setting which will use double the amount of electricity for that particular job. When cooking with liquids, use very little of it and a utensil with a fitted cover; you not only save energy but also nutrients and flavor.

Free copies of "Cutting Energy Costs" are available from U.S. senators and representatives who, together, receive 233,450 copies for distribution to constituents. Copies can also be purchased (price: $9.50) at government bookstores in major cities or by sending a check or money order to the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, D.C. 20402. (PAI)

Spurred by Union Efforts

Schools Broaden Study Of Labor's Role, History

By Susan Dunlop

California students will be taking a closer look at the place of organized labor in American society, thanks to an updated economics curriculum adopted by the state's board of education.

In Maryland, a new law passed by the general assembly mandates the teaching of labor history in the state's schools.

And in Detroit and New York, teachers are being provided with lesson plans, classroom materials, guest speakers and other aids to help them teach labor studies.

NATIONALLY, more than half a million members of the American Federation of Teachers are getting supplies of a colorful new classroom aid, developed by the union, for teaching labor history.

These are a sample of organized labor's active national, state and local efforts to encourage positive teaching of labor studies in the nation's school systems.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education is stepping up its own activities in this area in 1981 with programs already under way to provide leadership, technical help and resource materials to a variety of "labor-in-the-schools" programs around the country.

The department's director, Dorothy Shields, emphasizes the federation's interest in working with state and local leaders, with the Teachers' union and with support groups to correct the "neglect" of fair, balanced treatment of the role of organized labor in society.

"THE INDISPENSABLE key to a successful labor-in-the-schools program," Shields stresses, "is the knowledge and motivation provided by officers and union members on the state and local level, and the AFL-CIO's own efforts are deliberately flexible to help or to complement their work.

"We want to be as supportive as possible in all areas in which we are working, and rather than hold up any one approach as the model, we are encouraging an array of unique efforts.

In the California case, the state board of education's curriculum development commission designed its new social science framework to include a positive approach to the role of trade unions and collective bargaining in modern society. The framework is a written guide used for teaching and for textbook selection at all grade levels.

FORMER AFL-CIO Regional Director William L. Gilbert, a member of the state education board, was instrumental in having the improved curriculum adopted.

The effort has already borne fruit in a new textbook on California history that contains a full chapter on the history of workers and their unions in the state. The text, approved for use by fourth-grade students, stresses the ways unions helped California workers achieve rights and a better standard of living.

Organized labor is also participating in a curriculum review program in Maryland where the efforts of the State AFL-CIO and interested students led to passage of a state law calling for coverage of labor history in the schools.

THE AFL-CIO jointly sponsored an education conference with the University of Maryland to introduce the subject to the state's educators.

The federation's Dept. of Education is also working with Frontlash, the organization that encourages youth participation in labor issues. And a joint program is under way in Detroit schools to stimulate the interest of high school students in labor studies and to provide teachers with information, materials and speakers on labor topics.

The Teachers' union has been active on the national and local level to encourage increased study of labor issues. In 1981, the AFT is publishing a special five-part photo essay series, "Working in America," highlighting labor history. The series, which is appearing first in the union's journal, the American Teacher, will be converted to a set of colorful posters available free to teachers for classroom use, primarily at the high school level.

THE POSTERS will contain additional text, guides for teachers, and lists of books and resources for further study. The project's chief goal, the union emphasizes, is to inspire as many teachers as possible to include in their lessons materials on labor history and the role of organized labor in a democratic society.

Local Teachers' unions and individual members have also worked hard on curriculum development, AFT points out. Some locals, as part of their collective bargaining agreements, have negotiated commitments from school boards to locate texts that provide a balanced account of labor's roles.

The union's New York City affiliate, the United Federation of Teachers, developed its own source book of materials on organized labor so that it can be used by any teacher whether or not he or she has a personal background in labor.

WHILE MANY labor-in-the-schools projects are directed at the elementary and secondary school levels, the AFL-CIO is also active in promoting improved curriculum development in colleges and universities, Shields said. The federation is a member of several advisory councils on secondary and higher education where part of the focus is on expanding labor studies.

"It is only fair that young people come away from school with a full and honest picture of our history, our society, and our economy," Shields said. "Organized labor has played a role in the development of each of those elements and continues to do so, and whether a young person is destined for a career as a worker or in management, he or she deserves to get the whole story."

Utility Workers Elect James Joy New President

James Joy, Jr., 53, has been elected president of the Utility Workers by the union's executive board to succeed Valentine P. Murphy.

Murphy resigned the office he held since 1979 to assume lighter duties. Joy will fill the unexpired four-year term of the presidency, and Murphy was elected by the board as national executive vice president.

That post had been held by Joy since 1975. He has also been business manager of the union's Local 1-2 in New York City since 1971.

Joy is a vice president of the New York State AFL-CIO and a member of the executive council of the New York City AFL-CIO where he served as chairman of the community services committee. He has been chairman of the New York State Utility Labor Council and is a vice president of New York State United Way.

HRDI Job Placement Total Mounts to 90,000 Since '72

Nearly 90,000 unemployed, underemployed or disadvantaged workers have been placed directly in jobs by the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute since 1972, according to a report prepared for HRDI's board of trustees.

The report was presented to the board by HRDI Executive Director Michael Arnold who reviewed the institute's activities and services during the board's recent meeting.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland was elected chairman of the 19-member board. Alan Kistler, director of the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services, was re-elected president and AFL-CIO Comptroller William T. Collins was re-elected secretary-treasurer of the institute, the federation's employment and training arm.

Arnold discussed HRDI's programs over the past year, which, in addition to its job training and placement activities, included a broad range of services to labor organizations to help them participate in federal training and employment programs established under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act.

Arnold stressed the importance of HRDI's role in maintaining a voice for organized labor in the shaping of federal policy on employment and training and its efforts to encourage union participation in these programs.

IN ADDITION to the training and placement achievements of HRDI's 59 area offices in 36 states, Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia, the institute is continuing seven special programs intended to assist disadvantaged workers in securing "a brighter economic future."

These programs include 26 Targeted Outreach programs to help women and minorities participate in apprenticeship programs, two construction and apprenticeship-related programs for native Americans, placement and service programs for handicapped workers and veterans, a demonstration program to provide summer jobs for young workers, and a Houston-based Apprenticeship Opportunity Center that offers apprenticeship information, placement and referral.

Over the next five years, the report said, HRDI will continue to provide training, develop job opportunities, and provide job placement while increasing its services and technical assistance to the labor movement, community agencies, schools, employers and CETA program operators.

ARNOLD OUTLINED the institute's five-year plan for expanding its services which will include preparation and distribution of technical information to national and international unions and state and local central bodies "to help them keep pace with the growing CETA system."

HRDI will expand its efforts to provide direct, local help to the labor movement and CETA officials "to assure labor's total involvement in local programs," and it will expand its training programs for labor officials and CETA staff to demonstrate their common goals, the report said.

In addition, HRDI will continue its training programs for its own staff to improve their ability to serve not only jobless and disadvantaged workers, but also union members who may be laid-off, disabled or in need of new skills.

Judge Refuses to Prohibit ILA Cargo Container Rule

Newark, N.J.—A U.S. District Court judge here refused to block implementation of disputed work rules between the Longshoremen and several shipping associations over the handling of cargo containers.

In denying a request by the National Labor Relations Board's general counsel for a temporary order restraining the ILA and five major shipping groups from putting the work rules in effect, Judge Herbert J. Stern said:

"THIS IS not the case of a union standing with a gun to the employer's head. Rather, the court is being asked to apply the pressure."

The action stems from a decision by the parties last month to begin implementing the rules, which have been a source of legal controversy for a decade. The union's contract provisions with the shippers require that stripping and stuffing of containers within 50 miles of all Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports be performed by ILA members.

NLRB General Counsel William A. Lubbers said that he sought the injunction in response to unfair labor practice charges by consolidators and truckers. The board had held that the work rules violated the National Labor Relations Act, but last June the Supreme Court set aside the decision, remanding the proceeding to the board for further study.

THE ILA AND the shippers agreed last month to begin enforcing the rules on Jan. 1. Under their agreement, the union is free to strike on 60 days' notice if a court issues an injunction against the containerization rules.

The dispute involves the transportation of cargo in container vans, which can be sent by ship and loaded on a truck or train at the port.

Congressional Coalition Study

Job-Linked Investments Urged on Pension Funds

A new study released by the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition shows that pension funds are usually invested without regard for the interests of the workers who contribute, accelerating the loss of jobs in regions already hit hard by plant closings and high unemployment.

"In effect," the study says, "workers may be assisting in their own future unemployment and loss of pension rights."

PENSION FUNDS are the greatest single source of investment capital in the United States, with assets worth 27 percent of the gross national product.

The Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition is a bipartisan organization of 213 members of Congress from 18 Northern states. The study, "Pension Power for Economic Development," was prepared at the coalition's request by the Northeast-Midwest Institute, an independent research group based in Washington.

Sen. John H. Chafee (R-R.I.), incoming chairman of the Senate Finance subcommittee on saving, pension and investment policy, said he will hold hearings in 1981 to investigate how pension funds are invested.

"THE WORKERS in our part of the country who participate in pension plans could receive substantial long-term benefits, including greater job security, if more of their pension funds were directed to local investments," he said. Chaffee is co-chairman of the Northeast-Midwest Senate Coalition.

The 500,000 pension plans in the United States own enough stock to control the 1,000 largest corporations in America, the study says.

The Labor Dept. predicts that the wealth of all pension funds—which the AFL-CIO estimates exceed $600 billion—could grow to $3 trillion by 1995.

This vast economic power, the study says, could be targeted to communities where investments are needed to create jobs. But the opposite is happening. Pension fund managers, seeking the highest possible rate of return, are strongly biased against firms in the economically troubled Northeast and Midwest, accelerating the drain of investment capital from areas of high unemployment.

ACCORDING TO the study, state and local pension funds for public employees often neglect the communities where most of their members are employed. Of the top 15 public pension plans in the Northeast-Midwest region, managing a total of $69 billion, only three have any policy to promote investments in their state.

For example, only 10 percent of the $3 billion controlled by the Ohio Public Employees Retirement System is invested in the state. Another plan, the fund for public school teachers in Chicago, manages $758 million but invests 84 percent of its assets outside the city.

Pension fund managers, the report says, almost always invest in large corporations and neglect the small businesses that create most of the new jobs in the United States. Between 1960 and 1976, small firms provided 66 percent of new employment, including virtually all of the new jobs in the Northeast

Rep. Robert Edgar (D-Pa.), chairman of the congressional coalition, said that pension plans should seek a high rate of return but not at the expense of the workers who contribute to the funds. "We can no longer tolerate a pattern of pension investments that diverts capital from areas of high unemployment," he said. "The irony of these investments is that they force workers to finance their own unemployment, leading to the loss of their pension rights."

The study recommends changes in federal policy, but concludes that most of the realistic opportunities to target investments can be found in the funds controlled by state and local governments.

High Prime Rate Seen Continuing Inflation Squeeze

One major New York bank, Chemical, lowered its prime lending rate to 19.5 percent from 20.5 percent, but other big banks held to the 20.5 percent level that became the industry standard for all practical purposes a week earlier.

With the cost of money holding at such a high level—the prime tends to influence all other short-term rates—the immediate outlook was for continued inflationary pressures on the nation's economy.

Meanwhile, a government barometer of future economic activity showed surprising strength remains in the economy. The Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators for November rose a healthy 1.2 percent, the sixth consecutive monthly rise. Eight of the 10 indicators available for November beamed positive signals, the strongest coming from new contracts for plant and equipment—up 16.7 percent in real terms.

The November rise in the indicators compared with an October increase of seven-tenths of 1 percent, originally reported as an increase of nine-tenths of 1 percent.

Other components of the index that were favorable were stock prices, vendor performance, building permits, the change in sensitive raw materials prices, and change in total liquid assets. Money supply in 1972 dollars and new orders in 1972 dollars made negative contributions to the November index.

Budget, Rules Votes Mark Opening of 97th Congress

fiscal 1982 and dropping each year to a ceiling of 20 percent in fiscal 1985.

REP. JIM JONES (D-Okla.), the new chairman of the House Budget Committee, had proposed such a formula last year. He termed the GOP proposal put forth on the opening day "a partisan exercise" to embarrass the Democrats and urged its rejection. The concept of a spending limit formula has to be further "refined" before it can be made "workable," he told the House.

The key vote was on a procedural issue, and only three Democrats broke ranks to vote with the Republican bloc.

All other opening day votes followed party lines, with the Democratic majority in the House rejecting Republican attempts to gain more representation on the tax-writing Ways & Means Committee.

PARTY RATIOS on most House committees were changed to reflect Republican election gains, but the Democratic leadership insisted on a 23-12 ratio on Ways & Means, a 33-22 majority on the Appropriations Committee and continued 11-5 control of the Rules Committee, which clears legislation for the House floor.

In other traditional party-line voting, Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.) was re-elected Speaker of the House, and the Senate chose Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) to the largely honorary post of president pro tempore, which normally goes to the most senior senator of the majority party. O'Neill is second in the line of succession to the presidency after Vice President Bush, and Thurmond is now next in line.

The big Senate change, however, was the switch that made Howard H. Baker, Jr. (R-Tenn.) the majority leader, with strong control over the scheduling and pace of legislation, while Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) dropped to minority leader.

HOUSE AND SENATE members met in a brief ceremonial session on Jan. 6 to hear Vice President Walter F. Mondale, in his constitutional role as presiding officer of the Senate, announce the count of electoral ballots from each state.

There have been occasional "faithless electors" in the past, but this year there were no surprises. The count of 489 electoral votes for the Reagan-Bush ticket and 89 for the Democratic incumbents mirrored the November election verdict.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald is the new president of the Industrial Relations Research Association, succeeding Jack Barbash, professor of economics at the University of Wisconsin, Jan. 1.

Booklet Focuses on Pension Investment

The AFL-CIO has published a new booklet, "Investment of Union Pension Funds," designed to help workers gain a larger voice in influencing investment decisions.

In the foreword to the publication, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland points out that pension funds, with current assets exceeding $600 billion, are the largest source of external capital for American corporations.

HE NOTES that since only a few plans are jointly administered, "most investment decisions are made unilaterally without workers or their representatives having any voice."

"The primary purpose of pension funds is, with prudent investments, to secure retirement benefits for workers," Kirkland observes. "Without jeopardizing this primary objective, pension funds should invest to improve the life and conditions of working men and women. Unions should be in a position to influence the investment of pension funds to better serve the interests of workers. . . .

"The AFL-CIO will work for the implementation of this program in terms of its own members and all American workers in the national interest for a strong expanding economy," Kirkland stresses.

FEDERATION VICE President John H. Lyons, chairman of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's committee on pension fund investments, notes in the introduction that pension funds too often are invested in companies that are anti-union, export workers' jobs, ignore safety and health protections or otherwise opposed workers' goals.

Along with the statement and recommendations adopted by the council at its August 1980 meeting, the report contains the text of a detailed study that grew out of pension resolutions adopted at the past two AFL-CIO conventions. The study explores pension fund operations and investment practices in the United States and several other industrialized countries. It was prepared for the committee by the economic consulting firm of Ruttenberg, Friedman, Kilgallon, Gutchess & Associates.

Four basic objectives outlined in the council's report stress the need to:

- Increase employment through revitalization of major industries
- Spur development of worker housing and health centers.
- Improve the ability of workers to exercise their rights as shareholders.
- Exclude from union pension nivestment portfolios companies whose policies are hostile to workers' rights.

ONE SECTION of the study distills the views of top officials of 28 international unions as well as those of experts in pension policy and management.

Serving with Lyons on the Executive Council committee are AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Murray H. Finley, David J. Fitzmaurice, Angelo Fosco, John J. O'Donnell, Charles H. Pillard and William W. Winpisinger. Retired Vice President George Hardy and the late Paul Hall also took part in developing the report.

Copies of the report are available for $2 each from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division.

Budget Skimps Nation's Needs

Disappointed At Cuts, Caps, Kirkland Says

By David L. Perlman

President Carter has submitted to Congress a federal budget that the AFL-CIO said fails to meet "the federal government's obligation to strengthen the economy and to protect those citizens who need protection the most."

The budget was drawn up on the grim assumption that unemployment and high inflation will continue to plague the nation's economy. But AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said labor "is disappointed" that it proposes a retreat from programs to deal with these problems.

"RATHER THAN cutting back such programs as extended unemployment compensation benefits, cost-of-living adjustments for retirees and pay increases for federal workers," Kirkland said, "the proposed budget should have made the case for equity, fairness and full employment."

Its fastest-growing component is interest payments, he noted, which have soared 43 percent in two years.

Except for defense spending, where there has been substantial bipartisan support for an increase, most government programs not involving payments required by law would be held below present levels after allowance for inflation.

In fact, to hold the deficit to the $27.5 billion projected for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, 1981, Congress will have to pass legislation that would have the effect of reducing future cost-of-living adjustments for retirees and food stamp recipients and rewrite other laws involving payments to the needy and jobless.

THE BUDGET would move swiftly into surplus with any substantial reduction of unemployment or inflation, Kirkland noted. Thus, "if unemployment were one million less in 1982, the proposed budget would be in balance."

But the budget assumption is that the unemployment rate will climb from December's 7.4 percent to 7.7 percent in the final quarter of this year, and that the inflation rate will be relatively unchanged.

Carter's budget message recommended against the type of stimulus programs that have spurred economic growth during past recoveries from recessions. The inflationary dangers are too great, he said.

The proposed budget calls for outlays of $739 billion, a real increase of about 1 percent after inflation adjustment. The projected deficit would be about half the estimated deficit for the current fiscal year.

DEFENSE SPENDING outlays would rise more than 4 percent in constant dollars—to $184.4 billion, and the projection for future years is for annual increases of 5 percent.

Industrial Revival Tied To Coordinated Plans

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland renewed labor's call for a massive reindustrialization program for the United States —to be fueled by carefully targeted incentives rather than indiscriminate tax cuts for business.

Two million manufacturing jobs have been wiped out during a decade of erosion of the nation's industrial base, Kirkland said. Yet there is still no "coherent national policy" designed to reverse "this ominous trend."

Kirkland and other participants in a two-day conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. challenged the "supply-side" economic theory that prosperity and industrial rebirth will stem from investment funds generated by across-the-board income and business tax cuts.

THIS TAX CUT prescription, Kirkland noted, is coupled with insistence on a reduced role for government. The fate of industries and regions that are experiencing economic difficulties would be determined by a supposedly competitive marketplace.

The trade union movement sharply dissents from such reasoning, Kirkland stressed.

"We just don't believe that you can write off major industries in this country without paying for it dearly in the future," he said.

"Nor do we believe that whole cities and regions of America can be allowed to decay, while other regions prosper like Arab sheikdoms, without serious social and economic consequences."

AMERICA NEEDS a diversified industrial base, Kirkland insisted, and that requires a coordinated national policy shaped with the involvement of labor, industry and the public. Such targeted economic planning, he said, is "a common thread" of nations with the most impressive industrial growth.

Kirkland challenged the conservative contention that burdensome taxes have caused a long-term slowdown in U.S. economic growth.

In fact, he retorted, U.S. taxes are proportionately less than in most countries with higher growth rates.

Untargeted tax cuts, such as proposed changes in depreciation writeoffs, can be counter-productive as well as wasteful, Kirkland warned. One "perverse" outcome of such a step could "accelerate the movement of industries and jobs away from older regions of the nation."

TAX INCENTIVES must be designed to achieve specific objectives that fit into

Year-End Tally Puts Jobless Rate At 7.4 Percent

At the end of 1980, 7,785,000 Americans were unemployed—1.5 million more than in December 1979, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Adult men accounted for two-thirds of the increase.

The December jobless rate of 7.4 percent was one-tenth of 1 percent below the November level. In December 1979, the unemployment rate was 6 percent.

The total labor force, 105 million, was down 218,000 in December from the previous month, and total employment was down 57,000 to 97.2 million while unemployment was down 161,000. Thus, the slight improvement in the unemployment situation was due mainly to a drop in the labor force.

Unemployment for the year averaged 7.1 percent, about one out of every 14 American workers, compared with the 5.8

AFL-CIO Urges Congress to Act On Auto Crisis

The AFL-CIO asked the new 97th Congress to move swiftly on legislation to assist the import-battered automobile industry and broaden trade adjustment assistance for workers.

Both measures passed the House in the last Congress but died with adjournment. They should be revived as part of a "package of remedies," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald urged at Senate hearings.

THE HEARINGS, by a Senate Finance subcommittee, stem from a promise made last December after an end-of-the-session filibuster threat kept the Senate from acting on a House-passed resolution authorizing negotiations with Japan for a temporary limit on automobiles exported to the United States.

Labor, Nation Join Tribute To Slain AIFLD Workers

By James M. Shevis

The nation and its labor movement bade sad farewell to Michael P. Hammer and Mark D. Pearlman, and resolved to continue their struggle to improve the welfare of El Salvador's impoverished campesinos.

"We will not forget this sacrifice. We will not abandon their work," Secretary of State Edmund S. Muskie told mourners at a funeral mass for Hammer at Fort Myer, Va., just outside Washington. Hammer, an Air Force veteran, was buried with full military honors at Arlington National Cemetery, less than a mile from the State Dept. and AFL-CIO headquarters with which he worked.

Hammer, 42, and Pearlman, 36, were staff representatives of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, an international arm of the AFL-CIO. The two were gunned down, along with the head of El Salvador's agrarian-reform program, as they sat in a hotel cafe in San Salvador,

When the measure was sidetracked despite a test vote that showed it would easily have passed, Sen. John C. Danforth (R-Mo.) promised that the trade subcommittee he would head in the new Congress would hold hearings before Inauguration Day. And Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.), the new chairman of the full Finance Committee, said he would try to clear any legislation the panel approved for Senate floor action by mid-February.

Both Oswald and Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel stressed the extent to which a cutback in auto production ripples through the entire U.S. economy.

IN ADDITION to the auto workers on the assembly lines, Samuel noted, auto-related job losses have hit hundreds of thousands of workers "who produce the steel, rubber, fabrics, wiring, electrical equipment, glass, aluminum and other materials and components that go into finished automobiles and trucks."

The lost jobs mean less tax revenues, Oswald added, along with higher unemployment compensation outlays and eventually greater welfare costs. "The impact also spreads to the rest of the community," he said. Thus, Michigan had to furlough 1,800 state employees because of a severe revenue drop "directly related to the auto crisis."

The union witnesses pointed to both import restrictions and domestic content requirements imposed by much of the world to benefit their domestic auto industries.

But the United States has "virtually no tariff on cars," Oswald noted, and U.S. auto producers are expanding operations abroad rather than in the United States to comply with requirements imposed by other nations.

Samuel welcomed a new interpretation by the Justice Dept. that the President does in fact have the constitutional authority to enter into negotiations with a foreign government to seek import restraints, apparently reversing the department's earlier concern that this might violate antitrust laws unless Congress specifically allowed it. And he noted the apparent support expressed by Commerce Sec.-designate Malcolm Baldrige earlier this month.

SUPPORT FOR negotiations with Japan also came from outgoing Transportation Sec. Neil Goldschmidt, who on Jan. 14 released a study by his department concluding that continued inroads by foreign cars in the U.S. market will mean the loss of an additional 500,000 manufacturing jobs over the next 10 years.

Oswald told the Senate panel that the AFL-CIO considers the adjustment assistance program a necessary part of overall trade policy but not as the answer to import problems.

The best step, he stressed, is to prevent the loss of jobs in the first place.

But because jobs have been lost and are being lost, Oswald said, the adjustment assistance program must be made more adequate and more equitable. A key grievance has been the failure of the current program to cover job losses among workers who make components or who provide related services.

OSWALD URGED revival of legislation the House passed in the last Congress in "an attempt to correct some obvious injustices in the law."

The legislation is needed and should be quickly enacted, he urged. And Congress should further "direct the President to negotiate immediate import quotas for the importation of automobiles and of auto parts."

Public Broadcast Stations Pressed On Programming

The AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees has urged that public broadcasting be required to use the money it receives from tax revenues to "support innovative types of programming which are unlikely to be underwritten by corporate sponsors."

The DPE board, meeting under the chairmanship of Dept. President Al Shanker, also recommended that officers and members of AFL-CIO unions be actively encouraged to join the governing and advisory boards of public broadcasting stations "so that the views of labor will be considered in the formation of policies for those stations."

The board, which meets quarterly, also received a report on various projects administered by the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment, Inc., a non-profit foundation created by the department. The institute now spends $1 million a year on programs linking working people and their families to arts activities, adult education and professional training.

IN ADDITION, the department adopted a statement on immigration policy proposing reforms in the existing system of admitting non-immigrant aliens into the United States for professional and technical employment. Too often, the statement said, such aliens are admitted for work that could be performed by American workers. The department's proposals are being presented to the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy, which is beginning to draft its recommendations to the President and Congress.

Several board members, who recently visited Europe under department auspices, described how unions in Sweden, England and West Germany are coping with the effect of rapid technological change on employment and the workplace. The trip was co-funded by the German Marshall Fund of the United States. DPE Director Jack Golodner said the department plans a major conference next year on international experiences with technological change.

Flight Attendants Win Key Gains in Braniff Contract

The Flight Attendants ratified a new two-year agreement with Braniff International providing for a wage increase of about 25 percent over the duration of the contract.

The pact provides for three salary hikes over the next two years as well as two cost-of-living adjustments. Differential pay for extra duties such as night and galley work also is included. Pay for special qualifications, such as speaking a foreign language, is increased substantially.

The new contract also provides for extra pay on holidays, a trend established by the union with United Air Lines. The agreement also provides for company-paid personal time off.

The pact, reached 23 days before expiration of the old agreement, improves the retirement outlook for the 2,900 Braniff flight attendants affected by its terms. The contract maintains the existing savings plan, in which both flight attendants and the company contribute, and establishes a company-paid, defined benefit plan. Braniff thus becomes the first major carrier in the industry with two retirement plans to which the company contributes and which are not offset by the other.

Another provision in the contract binds any successor or merged company to the agreement. AFA President Linda A. Puchala pointed out: "With many changes occurring within Braniff, as well as the possibility of a merger with Eastern Airlines, the flight attendants can be assured their rights will be completely protected."

Prices in '80 11.7% Above Year Earlier

Wholesale prices rose six-tenths of 1 percent in December, the same as in November, pushing the government's producer price index for finished goods up 11.7 percent from a year earlier.

The over-the-year change was slightly less than the 12.6 percent rise posted in 1979, Commissioner Janet L. Norwood of the Bureau of Labor Statistics told the congressional Joint Economic Committee, because the rates of price increase for finished energy goods and consumer foods decelerated. However, she noted that non-energy items increased more in 1980 than in the previous year.

ENERGY PRICES rose 1.6 percent last month, with gasoline prices up 1.5 percent and heating oil up 1.9 percent, BLS reported, the second month in a row that they have increased by more than 1 percent. Some economists have predicted that rising energy prices will be the key inflationary problem this year, and Norwood told the congressional panel:

"The fact that energy prices have accelerated significantly in recent months, after several months of moderation, bears watching. Although these prices are not now increasing at the levels registered late last year and early in 1980, the magnitude and duration of changes in energy prices in the coming months will be an important factor in the inflationary climate for 1981."

The rather moderate December rise in wholesale prices was assisted by a decline of four-tenths of 1 percent in food prices, including an 18.5-percent plunge in sugar prices. Prices for meat, poultry, and fish also dropped—by amounts ranging from 6.8 percent for pork to one-tenth of 1 percent for beef and veal—and fresh fruit prices dropped 4 percent.

But there were large increases for fresh and dried vegetables, up 4.7 percent; eggs, up 2.6 percent, and milled rice, up 4 percent.

THE INCREASE in food prices that the Agriculture Dept. has predicted has not yet begun to show up in the producer price index. The department expects food prices to rise about 1 percent a month this year.

Food prices declined in December at all three stages of processing—finished, intermediate, and crude. But prices for non-food finished items rose nine-tenths of 1 percent, after rising seven-tenths of 1 percent the month before.

OSHA Issues Revised Policy On Cotton Dust Respirators

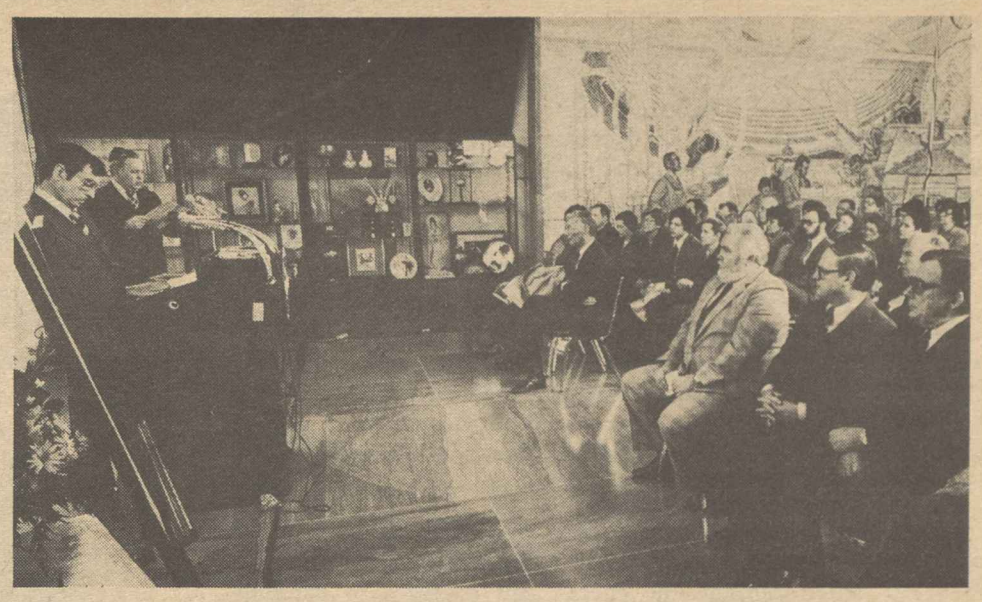
The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has issued a new cotton dust respirator policy that requires workers to wear respirators only for as much time each workday as is necessary to keep their exposure within federal limits.

The new policy replaces an earlier respirator provision in OSHA's cotton dust standard, which was vacated after a 75-day administrative stay that ended Dec. 15.

OSHA SAID the stay became necessary after widespread misunderstanding developed in the textile industry on how the respirator regulation should be implemented. Agency officials said many workers were being burdened with unnecessary respirator wear while others were not being fully protected against the cotton dust hazard—the debilitating brown lung disease and related respiratory illnesses.

The new respirator policy resulted from a series of meetings involving officials of OSHA and the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health as well as union and industry representatives.

After issuing the new policy, OSHA extended the stay an additional 30 days to allow workers and employers in the textile industry to become familiar with the policy's provisions by the end of January.



IN EXPLAINING the provision, Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham noted that workers may only have to wear respirators part-time during an eight-hour shift depending on the volume of cotton dust in the workplace atmosphere.

Respirator use will be required until Mar. 27, 1984, when employers must have fully effective engineering and work practice controls in place.

Bingham, who heads OSHA, said that respirators "are not the solution to the dangers posed by cotton dust." But until employers meet the workplace air quality provisions through the installation of engineering controls, "respirators currently offer the best alternative protection," she said.

THE FEDERAL cotton dust standard provides for graduated exposure limits in various segments of the cotton processing and textile industry. Over an eight-hour workday, it limits exposure to 200 micrograms of lint-free respirable cotton dust per cubic meter of air in yarn manufacturing processes; 500 micrograms in non-textile industries, and 750 micrograms for slashing and weaving.

FINAL HONORS for two representatives of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development murdered in El Salvador drew hundreds of their friends, colleagues, and sympathizers at separate services for them. At left, Vice President Walter Mondale and Secretary of State Edmund Muskie were among those who crowded into Memorial Chapel at Fort Myer, Va. for a funeral mass for Michael Hammer of Potomac, Md. At a memorial service at AFL-CIO headquarters for Mark Pearlman of Seattle, officials included AIFLD Executive-Director William C. Doherty, Jr., seated next to Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, and Federation President Lane Kirkland. Muskie declared renewed U.S. support for AIFLD's land-reform efforts in El Salvador in remarks at the Hammer service.

Nation, Labor Mourn Slain AIFLD Workers

Rodolfo Viera, 43, director of the El Salvadoran government's Institute for Agrarian Transformation.

Viera, who also headed the Salvadoran Communal Union, a peasant-farmer group organized with AIFLD's help, sought to carry out a sweeping land-reform project designed to give stability to El Salvador by turning over farmland to the country's landless poor.

At the funeral mass for Hammer, Secretary of State Muskie observed that "Mike gave his life for his country and the service of the American labor movement. He was making solidarity a reality by helping workers in other countries build stronger institutions and better lives. Our government supported his work, and we commit ourselves to it once again in his memory."

AT A MEMORIAL service for Pearlman at AFL-CIO headquarters, AIFLD's Doherty declared that the three murdered men had not died in vain.

"Despite all the problems in El Salvador, there are today thousands of campesinos (peasant-farmers) living just a little bit better" because of the efforts of Hammer, Pearlman, and Viera to help them get their own plots of land, Doherty observed.

"When they get clear title to the land—as surely they will in the near future—this will be a fitting memorial" for the three, he said. As AIFLD's representatives, Hammer and Pearlman advised the El Salvadoran government on new regulations to implement its land-reform program, particularly the thorny legal problems involved in conveying titles to the peasants.

Pearlman, whose family requested that he be buried in his home city of Seattle, was an "amiable, affable, dedicated, and brilliant young man," who could have chosen the life of a comfortable lawyer in California, where he worked before going to El Salvador, Doherty said. Instead, he opted for a life of involvement in behalf of the poor, the AIFLD official said.

Turning to Rabbi Morton Kanter, who officiated at the service, Doherty declared: "Mark was a man, a real man. I believe, rabbi, in Yiddish you have an expression that summarizes such a person. He was a mensch."

TRIBUTES TO Pearlman and Hammer poured in to AFL-CIO headquarters from trade unionists around the world. Histadrut's Sec. Gen. Yerucham Meshel's message was typical. "We are deeply shocked by the brutal, senseless assassination of your two good people," the Israeli labor leader wired. "We know how committed Hammer and Pearlman were to promoting development and reform in Latin America."

Attending the service for Pearlman were AFL-CIO President Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, Sec.-Gen. Alejandro Orfila of the Organization of American States, U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador Robert E. White, and representatives of the international labor and diplomatic community.

More than 300 friends, relatives, and sympathizers crowded into Fort Myer's Memorial Chapel, just across the Potomac River from the Lincoln Memorial, for the funeral mass that preceded Hammer's burial.

IN A EULOGY delivered in both English and Spanish, Rev. John M. McCormick described Hammer as "a martyr who died for the cause of the poor and the oppressed." A close friend of the Hammer family, the homilist added:

"He gave his blood because he loved people, and that is why the reforms he brought about avoided all extremisms. His land reforms were truly moderate and democratic. He loved the simple, humble campesinos of Latin and Central America and especially, in the more recent years of his life, of El Salvador."

Hammer, born in Paris of German parents, spent his early youth in Ecuador. He served four years in the U.S. Air Force after becoming a naturalized American citizen, and for a time was stationed in Spain, where he met his wife, Magdalena. A graduate of Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service, he spoke five languages and had spent much of his 17-year AIFLD career in Latin America promoting land reform.

Archbishop James A. Hickey of the Washington archdiocese officiated at the Hammer funeral service, assisted by eight concelebrants, including Msgr. George C. Higgins.

Representatives of the Carter and incoming Reagan Administrations joined Kirkland, Donahue, other Executive Council members, and representatives of the international labor and diplomatic worlds in paying homage to Hammer.

Vice President Walter Mondale; Pat Derian, assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights & Humanitarian Affairs; William G. Bowdler, assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, and Ambassador White represented the Carter Administration.

Representing the new Administration were Georgetown Prof. Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, Reagan's nominee as ambassador to the United Nations, and Richard V. Allen, foreign policy adviser to President-elect Reagan.

THE LARGE delegation of international labor leaders included Frank G. Walcott, president of the Barbados Workers Union; Helcio Maghenzani of Brazil, Inter-American representative of the Postal, Telephone & Telegraph International; Jose Vargas, president of the Venezuelan Confederation of Workers; Sec.-Gen. Dean Butcher of the Panamanian Confederation of Workers, and Juan Jose Del Pino, general secretary of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers.

Also attending were OAS Sec.-Gen. Orfila; Henry Geyelin, president of the Council of the Americas, and Peter Grace, president of Grace Co., and chairman of AIFLD's board of trustees.

A memorial mass for Hammer was held Jan. 15 at Georgetown University's Dahlgren Chapel. Timothy S. Healy, S.J., president of the university, was the principal celebrant.

Study Refutes Cost Criticism Of Prevailing Wage Laws

State prevailing wage laws do not inflate the cost of public construction, a study by the Center to Protect Workers' Rights concludes.

The study examines the costs of new school construction in states with and without prevailing wage laws.

Some 39 states currently have "little Davis-Bacon" laws in force that require workers on state-funded construction projects be paid no less than locally prevailing wage rates. The state laws are patterned after the Davis-Bacon Act that provides payment of prevailing wages on federally funded construction.

THE STUDY used separate construction cost data for elementary and secondary schools, ranking the 48 contiguous states in order of cost per classroom of new secondary school buildings. These costs were adjusted for inflation and the averages for each state were also adjusted by a state price index to compensate for the general effects of interstate price differences.

Of the 20 states with the lowest per classroom average costs, ten have fully applicable prevailing wage laws. Of the 20 states with the highest costs, nine have wage laws which only partially cover or are not all applicable to school construction. The study used additional statistical techniques to analyze school cost factors.

THESE FACTORS included the general level of costs and prices in each state, the degree of urbanization in each state, climate and the presence or absence of a state prevailing wage law.

The additional analysis confirmed that the factor of prevailing wage laws had no significant effect on costs, but that the first three factors were statistically significant.

This finding refutes a previous study prepared under the auspices of the Associated Builders & Contractors, an organizations of non-union contractors.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said in a preface to the report that "state prevailing wage laws continue to perform important functions in protecting the interests of workers, contractors and taxpayers. . . . They ensure that the economic power of the government is not used to undermine the labor standards of the local community."

Georgine, who also is president of the center, pointed out that contractors benefit from prevailing wage laws which help eliminate cut-throat competition based on substandard wages.

Copies of the study are available from the Center to Protect Workers' Rights, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Room 603, Washington, D.C. 20006, at $2.50 each.

Court to Review Bargaining on Closing Case

The Supreme Court has agreed to examine whether an employer's decision to close a supposedly unprofitable operation is a mandatory subject for collective bargaining.

The court said it will consider a new standard announced by the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals last July. The appeals court held that the bargaining duty extends to a company's decision to close part of its operations if such bargaining "could reasonably be expected to modify or reverse" management's decision to close.

THE CASE involves the First National Maintenance Corp., a Brooklyn, N.Y., company that supplies housekeeping and maintenance services and workers to nursing homes, and District 1199, the health care division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

When First National closed its unprofitable operations at the Greenpark Care Center nursing home in 1977, the union charged that it had not been notified of the layoffs. District 1199 had been certified as bargaining agent only two months before the July 31 closing

THE ONLY conversation with a union representative over the decision was on July 28, when a union officer called the company, and asked it to "stay on" at Greenpark. The employer said that there was "nothing to discuss."

The National Labor Relations Board ruled in favor of the union, and ordered the company to reinstate 35 affected workers. It also ordered the employer to bargain about the decision to close, and if no agreement to resume operations is reached, to bargain over the effects of the closing and establish preferential hiring for the terminated employees at other operations. It also granted back pay for the discharged workers.

When First National appealed, the 2nd Circuit Court affirmed the NLRB order. Over the objections of the NLRB, the Supreme Court now has agreed to hear the case.

In affirming the NLRB order, the appeals court ruled that the closing was a mandatory subject of bargaining, affecting the employees' terms and conditions of employment.

Essence of Democracy

ALL AMERICANS can take pride in the inauguration of Ronald Reagan as the 40th President of the United States, including the nearly 35 million who cast their ballots for Jimmy Carter last November.

The invariably moving ceremony at the Capitol symbolizes the essence of democracy—the peaceful transfer of power following a free election.

Some of the trappings of democracy have been borrowed by countries where political succession is handed down by a small clique and political changes come from the barrel of a gun. But the people in those countries know the difference. It is not just for its material prosperity that the United States has been a beacon for the oppressed people of the world.

IN OUR INAUGURAL ceremony, participation by the legislative and judicial branches of our government reminds us that power is shared through the checks and balances so carefully drawn up by the nation's founders. But while a president may not always be able to get a bill through Congress and may have to bow to a court order, his actions can touch off world-shaking events.

It is this awesome responsibility that will pass from President Carter to President Reagan at noon on the 20th of January.

May he bear it well, in the best traditions of his predecessors as President of the United States.

And whether it be in the next presidential election or in some subsequent election, a new Administration will take office and the reins of government will again be handed over.

As President Ford said four years ago in a graceful final message to Congress, "The people have spoken; they have chosen a new President and a new Congress to work their will." And to his successor, he wished "the very best in all that is good for our country."

A First Priority

IF THE economic assumptions of the budget submitted by President Carter hold up, it is grim news for America's workers and for the millions of young people who will be entering the workforce in the years to come.

The unemployment rate, now 7.4 percent, is projected to climb to 7.7 percent by the final quarter of this year and to average 7.5 percent for the whole of 1982. Not until the end of 1986 would the jobless rate even dip below 6 percent.

These are projections, but they do not have to take place and should not be allowed to come about.

AS THE BUDGET itself explains: "The economy and the budget are interrelated. . . . Both budget outlays and the tax structure have substantial effects on national output, employment and inflation."

The unemployment rate can and must be brought down. That should be a first priority for a new Administration and a new Congress.

Poor-Mouthing Corporations Shift Burden to Taxpayers

By Gus Tyler

IN THEIR continuing campaign to have their taxes reduced, American corporations have been pleading poverty. They cite the low level of investment in factories and equipment as proof that American business is not sufficiently affluent to do its job as the nation's employer and innovator.

To make their case, corporate advocates have regularly quoted the figures issued by the Commerce Dept.'s Bureau of Economic Analysis in publications referring to "Expenditures for New Plant and Equipment."

It now appears that these highly authoritative 'facts" are not facts at all. They are only part of the truth that, standing by itself, becomes a total untruth. For instance:

IN 1972, the bureau declared that $88.4 billion had been spent for investment in plant and equipment. It now turns out that a more accurate reading shows that, for the same year, the investment figure should read $120.2 billion, an error of 36 percent.

The source of the new information is—believe it or not—the Bureau of Economic Analysis itself. It is now updating its data—not by uncovering new facts but by a reinterpretation of old facts.

But 1972 was not the only year of error. Every year since has followed the pattern. The only difference between 1972 and 1977 (the last year on which we have statistics) is that as time went by the error got bigger.

In 1972, the error was 36 percent; in 1973, 38 percent; in 1974, 40 percent; in 1975, 40 percent; in 1976, 42 percent; and in 1977, a whopping 46 percent.

ALL THE ERRORS are one-sided: they all understate the sums put into plant and equipment. The reason is that through all those years there were certain categories of investment in businesses that just were not included.

About one-third of the sum omitted from the calculations was money that went into commercial real estate, so that if a company bought land on which to build a factory, the purchase of the land was not included as an investment.

The other two-thirds of the error, however, was the omission of investments that went very clearly both for factories and for equipment. These plants and machinery were bought by banks and then leased to companies, with neither the banks nor the companies reporting them as investments in production.

The banks did not include these investments as "investments" because they were merely renting them to others—like a car rental company. The corporations did not report these investments as "investments" because the companies were merely leasing from the banks. And so between the two of them, neither recorded any investment although, as a simple matter of fact, more than $100 billion a year was being invested in plant and equipment through the joint efforts of these financiers and their "renters."

Based on these original errors, corporations have been able to persuade Congress that they deserve tax breaks—which they have been getting over the years in ever greater chunks. And as a result of that, you—the individual taxpayer—have been paying more in taxes.

Human Rights Battle Seen 'Far From Over'

The struggle for human rights overrides all differences of color, nation or language.

Those who hunger for freedom, who thirst for human dignity, and who suffer for the sake of justice are the patriots of this cause.

The battle for human rights—at home and abroad—is far from over.

If we are to serve as a beacon for human rights, we must continue to perfect here at home the rights and values which we espouse around the world: A decent education for our children, adequate care for all Americans, an end to discrimination against minorities and women, a job for all those able to work, and freedom from injustice.

I intend to work as a citizen, as I have worked as President, for the values this nation was founded to secure.

—From President Carter's farewell address to the American people, Jan. 14, 1981.

Attacking Joblessness, Inflation

Full Employment Goals Keyed To Effective Economic Policy

The following is excerpted from testimony by AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald to the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing & Urban Affairs, Jan. 8, 1981.

THE AFL-CIO is deeply concerned about the effect of current economic conditions on workers and their families who are among the chief victims of unemployment and inflation.

The unemployment situation is serious—and it is likely to get worse. Approximately 8 million people are unemployed by the official count. Another 1 million "discouraged workers" have stopped looking for work and therefore don't appear in the official unemployment count. And another 4 million workers are on part-time schedules because of the recession.

The U.S. economy began to deteriorate seriously a year ago in January of 1980. However, since the recession of 1973-75, unemployment never got below 5.7 percent—compared to unemployment rates of less than 5 percent prior to the recession and of less than 4 percent in the 1960s. Since January a year ago unemployment has gone up by 1.3 percentage points, representing an additional 1.5 million workers without jobs.

For the full year 1981, many economists are forecasting an unemployment rate of 8-8.5 percent—and such an average means that unemployment will be even higher in the course of the year, perhaps up to 9 percent or even higher during 1981.

WORSE YET, the total number of people hit by unemployment in the course of a year is substantially higher—in contrast to the number unemployed in one particular month. Since 1959, the total number of workers experiencing unemployment during a year has been 2.7 to 4.2 times the number who are unemployed at any given monthly survey date.

With more unemployment and with shorter hours for those who have jobs, with little more than three-fourths of the nation's industrial capacity in use, America is wasting huge amounts of its human and natural resources, and America is losing hundreds of billions of dollars worth of unproduced goods and services.

Inflation continues to wash away a substantial part of the buying power of workers' paychecks. Workers and their families have suffered dramatically during this current inflation. The buying power of each hour's work has deteriorated.

Today, the average American worker is worse off than a year ago, and nearly 10 percent worse off than two years ago. This loss in consumer buying power and the resulting slowdown in consumer buying adds further downward pressure on the economy.

Inflation is not the result of excess demand. Food, energy, medical care, housing and interest rates are the key sources of our persistent inflation. They account for 60 percent of the average family's spending. And these are areas where labor costs have little or no impact on prices.

Over the 12-month November period, the consumer price index rose 12.7 percent with a 21 percent increase in gasoline prices. Food and beverage prices were up 12.6 percent, reflecting a poor crop year and large export sales. And housing was up 13.7 percent, reflecting a short supply and rising interest rates.

Unfortunately, the outlook over the next few months is for continual worsening of inflation, with food prices continuing to rise sharply, housing further affected by high mortgage interest rates, and oil prices reflecting the newest round of OPEC price changes.

THE AMERICAN ECONOMY has too often been weakened over the past quarter of a century by excessive, repeated, and misguided reliance upon tight money and high interest rates to combat inflation. These restrictive monetary policies have been followed again and again by declines in homebuilding and by economic slowdown or recessions in 1959-60, 1969-70, 1973-74 and most recently 1980.

The Federal Reserve policy bears a large part of responsibility for these policies, but Congress and the Executive Branch have also failed to define clearly and to speak out forcefully on the monetary policies of the nation's central bank. And the tragic result of these restrictive monetary policies has been more and longer unemployment for America's working people and the loss of hundreds of billion of dollars in GNP.

The best way to deal with unemployment in a non-inflationary way is by targeted job stimulation programs, rather than by general tax cuts or tax incentives. Each dollar of federal funds used on direct government employment programs has two-to-four times more job-creating potential than a dollar of tax cuts, and direct job creation programs can be directed to the areas and the individuals where the need is greatest.

The AFL-CIO opposes tax cuts which would waste needed revenue by rewarding those sectors of the economy not suffering from high unemployment and tax cuts which could stimulate speculative excesses and imbalances that contribute to inflation problems.

The AFL-CIO believes a totally new reindustrialization program would provide the new direction for effective governmental relations with the private sector.

The AFL-CIO has recommended economic policies that would directly attack the basic causes of inflation. Full employment would minimize the loss of national product, income and savings.

Instead of resorting to tight money-high interest rates policies leading to high unemployment, selective credit regulation should be used at appropriate times to hold down interest rates.

Key Strike Issue

Performers Share Revenues In Landmark Film-TV Contract

COMPENSATION for on-the-air performances that are resold for the pay television and home video market is a landmark gain in the new three-year contract between the unions representing the performers and the TV industry.

Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff of the Television & Radio Artists said that resolution of the issue was critical to settlement in the recent negotiations because new technology has opened the breakthrough to pay television and home video. He pointed out that the new contract also assures that performers will be fairly paid for performances produced on discs and cassettes for use on home playback equipment.

Agreement on those points, Wolff said, was the key to ending the three-month strike by AFTRA and the Screen Actors Guild which had delayed production of 1980-81 prime time programs.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Wolff said that without the new guarantees, performers "would find themselves in competition with themselves," and that "repeated use of material would stultify new employment."

WOLFF said that the new contract, which also produced substantial improvements in health, dental and other areas, is well within the financial range of the broadcasting industry. He noted that entertainment is not as heavily affected as production and service industries by the sluggish economy because of the stiff competition for audiences.

Unemployment is almost "a way of life" among performers, he said, and only a little more than half of the 100,000 members of SAG and AFTRA are able to make their entire living as professional performers, without other jobs to supplement their incomes.

THE ABILITY to imprint tens of thousands of electronic components and complex circuits on chips of silicon the size of a cornflake has been quietly ushering in a second industrial revolution.

The microelectronic revolution—comparable to the invention of the wheel and the steam engine—carries the potential for both great progress and great peril. On the one hand, it offers the promise of higher productivity, cheaper and better products, and more leisure time. On the other hand, it threatens to create large-scale, permanent unemployment, degradation of skills and new work hazards.

WORKING PEOPLE and their unions, along with government, will be faced increasingly with choices regarding how the new technology is used—whether for private profit and competitive advantage or to benefit society as a whole.

Whatever direction it takes, microelectronics are here to stay, as noted by two recently published studies—one sponsored by the International Labor Organization and the other by Worldwatch, a private research organization.

The new technology began with the birth of the transistor in 1947, followed by the transistorized computer, or semiconductor, in 1959. It came of age with the development of the silicon integrated circuit computer in 1964.

Only in the past five years, however, has the technology really begun to take off—its pervasiveness transforming electronics "into a convergence industry, playing a role similar to that of the machine tool in the 19th Century," writes J. Rada, author of the 109-page ILO study.

Both studies predict that microelectronics will eliminate more jobs than it creates during the 1980s. Some jobs will be created in the industries that manufacture and program computers and other electronic goods, but jobs are likely to disappear in industries subject to computer-based automation.

Jobs also will be lost in firms that switch from the manufacture of mechanical goods to products based on electronics because electronic goods have fewer moving parts to produce and assemble. Colin Norman, author of the 63-page Worldwatch study, notes that 46,000 jobs were lost in the mid-70s as consumers began buying electronic timepieces made in the United States and Japan.

Workers in offices and service occupations will be the most "profoundly affected in the short run," warns Rada.

IN THE EARLY 1980s, states Rada, "office automation will start to accelerate and is likely to cause major labor displacement. The workers displaced will be mainly women, at a time of increasing female and general white-collar militancy." He adds that "the question of job satisfaction will be crucial precisely when automation of the office becomes possible."

In the long run, Rada predicts "jobless growth." He suggests various remedies including reducing the workweek, early retirement, or even "a more radical work-sharing scheme" in which the usual sequence of education, work and retirement could be alternated or combined. Other remedies include creating public employment in social services, health and education.

Norman puts top priority on "a need for advance warning, consultation and retraining of displaced workers when the new technologies are introduced."

He concludes that "a combination of revitalized employment policies, greater industrial democracy and new ways of distributing both the hours of work and the fruits of technological change are essential if the benefits of the microelectronic revolution are to be equitably shared."

KEY GAINS for the Television & Radio Artists and the Screen Actors Guild in their new pact with the television industry is the first-ever compensation for performances that are resold for the pay television and home video market, Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff, center, of AFTRA, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Doug Harbrecht, left, of the Pittsburgh Press and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced network interview is aired weekly over the Mutual radio network.

Curbs Proposed on Noise, Chemical, Electrical Hazards

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has announced a series of rules and proposals upgrading worker protections on noise, electrical hazards and toxic chemicals.

OSHA's new hearing conservation program was issued as an amendment to the old 1974 noise standard that limited worker exposure to 90 decibels, but which was seldom enforced.

The new program calls for hearing protectors, exposure monitoring, audiometric testing and training of some 5.2 million workers who are exposed to occupational noise levels exceeding 85 decibels. Construction and agriculture workers will not be covered by the program.

UNIONS HAVE been pressing for an improved standard to reduce noise levels to 85 decibels—and lower with the installation of engineering controls—since the mid-1960s.

AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor noted that the hearing conservation program is a step toward labor's goals, but termed it "only a partial solution to the problem." He said an effective and enforceable standard is still needed.

Even so, Taylor said that employer groups will likely file court challenges in an attempt to block implementation of the hearing conservation program.

Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham, OSHA's out-going chief administrator, said the program will substantially reduce hearing impairment caused by excessive workplace noise.

She said the program will provide additional benefits by improving workplace safety, lowering absenteeism, reducing medical costs and workers' compensation claims, as well as bringing a possible reduction in cardiovascular illness.

BINGHAM STRESSED that the costs of the program would be fully justified by the "range of health, safety and financial benefits, and the magnitude of their impact on the quality of life for U.S. workers."

An OSHA study concluded that the cost of compliance would amount to about $53 per year for each of the 5 million workers covered by the program.

OSHA estimates that 2.9 million U.S. production workers are exposed to noise levels in the 90-decibel range and about 2.3 million are exposed above the 85-decibel level.

The federal safety agency said the final workplace standard covering electrical hazards is designed to "greatly simplify compliance by employers without reducing employee protection."

It calls for:

- Substituting detailed specification requirements of the National Electrical Code (NEC) with more general performance language.
- Deleting provisions of the NEC that do not apply to worker protections.
- Incorporating all other revelant NEC provisions into the OSHA standard.

Both the hearing conservation program and the electrical hazards regulation are scheduled to take effect in mid-April.

OSHA's PROPOSED toxic labeling standard would provide precise chemical identification and warnings on hazardous substances found in some 328,000 manufacturing facilities that employ more than 20 million workers.

"Workers have the right to know what substances they work with on the job, and today, many of them don't," Bingham said in announcing the proposal.

She noted that nearly 60 percent of the recorded occupational illnesses are traced to chemical exposure in manufacturing where a large segment of the workforce is employed.

The proposal would require manufacturers and importers of chemicals to evaluate their products to determine if they meet criteria for 17 physical and health hazards. If they are found hazardous, they must be appropriately labeled.

At AFL-CIO Reception

Ray Marshall Praised As Ally of Workers

Organized labor honored out-going Labor Sec. Ray Marshall for his efforts on behalf of America's workers and wished him well as he prepared to leave the government.

"Ray Marshall has been a man who has stood with us on every basic and important objective of the trade-union movement," Federation President Lane Kirkland said at a reception for the Secretary of Labor at AFL-CIO headquarters.

"He's fought with us. He's been our friend and our co-worker, come fair weather or foul. And we in the trade union movement have a tradition that we do not forget our friends."

Several hundred friends of Marshall in both government and the labor movement listened as he thanked them for their support during the past four years. He said that he intends to continue to "work for the things that we fought for" during the Carter Administration, whose labor record he called the best of any administration since Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal.

Vice President Walter Mondale, who also addressed the gathering, said that "the measure of a government that cares and responds to the needs of working men and women will be the record left by Ray Marshall."

Marshall, who plans to rejoin the University of Texas faculty in September, received a plaque from the federation acknowledging the "lasting debt" of American workers to the nation's 16th Secretary of Labor.

Marshall was an economics professor at the University of Texas from 1962 until he joined the Carter Administration in 1977. Between Jan. 20 and the time he resumes teaching, he plans to remain in Washington as a consultant to labor and union-supported research groups.

At a farewell news conference with reporters at the Labor Dept., Marshall summarized the Carter Administration's labor record, and talked about his expectations for the incoming Reagan Administration.

"My greatest accomplishment was in selecting an outstanding personal staff and making good subcabinet appointments," he said. About half of his subcabinet appointments went to Labor Dept. careerists, he said.

"My major disappointments were our failure to get legislation to control illegal immigration, to reform the National Labor Relations Act and the welfare system, and to improve our youth programs."

An early problem facing his successor, Labor Sec.-designate Raymond J. Donovan, will be the economy, Marshall said.

"That's going to be the toughest one. He'll have to become actively involved in the nation's economic problems as soon as he can. Inflation and unemployment are the most important, immediate problems," he said.

Marshall said that his biggest fears over the next four years focus on the President-elect's plans for massive tax cuts, introduction of a subminimum wage for youths, and efforts to weaken enforcement of some basic labor programs such as the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

"The attitude I'm taking on all this is wait and see," Marshall said. "I learned long ago not to pay attention to what people say but what they do."

On charges that some federal job expansion efforts such as the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act are "failed programs," Marshall registered strong disagreement.

CETA is "a complex system and it ought to be allowed to continue to evolve," he said. "I'm absolutely convinced that CETA is a good investment for the country."

Film Made Available On Youth Job Projects

A film on successful youth employment projects is available free from the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees.

The production, which was underwritten by the National Football League Players Association, an affiliate of the Professional Athletes, shows how cooperative efforts between communities, schools and government have helped young workers complete schooling, gain job skills and find work.

Oil Union-Paperworker Merger Explored

The executive boards of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Paperworkers are holding separate special meetings during January to discuss a proposed merger.

The OCAW board, which met Jan. 12-13 in Denver, agreed to submit the merger plans to a special convention of the union's membership expected to be held in April.

The executive board of the UPIU will meet Jan. 29-30 to consider the proposals, which, if approved by the board, will also be submitted to the membership at a special convention.

NAACP Service Award Presented to Pollard

New York—Director William E. Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights was given the NAACP's Outstanding Service Award.

Pollard, a member of the NAACP board of directors since 1972, was honored for his service to the association, including formation of a national ad hoc labor committee to raise funds for the organization. He was also active in the NAACP 1980 voter registration campaign.

Milwaukee OPEIU Local Wins Key Wage Gains

Milwaukee—More than 1,200 members of Office & Professional Employees Local 9 employed by Blue Cross/Blue Shield United here have ratified a three-year agreement prividing substantial wage gains.

The contract covering clerical and customer service employees, computer operators and senior trainers guarantees an 11 percent across-the-board increase retroactive to November 1980, 11 percent in 1981 and 10 percent in 1982, as well as 3-percent boosts every six months.

Mandatory overtime was abolished, and other contract gains included improved leave provisions, additional paid vacation and vision care benefits.

Labor News In Brief

Training Classes Open For Dock Workers

New York—A new program to upgrade the skills of long-term unemployed longshoremen and ease the shortage of operators of specialized pierside equipment has been started here by the Longshoremen and the New York Shipping Association. The jointly sponsored program is part of the ILA-NYSA collective bargaining agreement.

Some 30 ILA workers began classes in early January to learn to operate three types of special machinery widely used at container ship terminals to shift and handle large units of freight. The program is expected to affect a total of 560 union dockworkers in the port who are generally unemployed and are covered by a full-year guaranteed annual income provision under the contract.

The training program, the first of its kind here, is also expected to ease a portwide shortage of qualified drivers of pierside machinery. Previously, most training for drivers and other waterfront workers was done exclusively by stevedoring companies at their own facilities.

Memphis Union Revived At Nylon Net Plant

Memphis, Tenn.—The Furniture Workers won representation rights for some 300 employees of the Nylon Net Co., a firm that had forced out another union a couple of years earlier.

"These workers—almost 90 percent of them women—have come back into the trade-union family," UFWA President Carl Scarbrough observed. The Clothing & Textile Workers, which at one time had represented the workers, gave its blessing to UFWA in the campaign, Scarbrough said.

"It took a lot of courage for the people to withstand some of the vicious propaganda the company used," he said. "The company's tactics didn't work because these people remember what it was like to have union representation, and they're eager to gain those rights again."

Kirkland 'Disappointed'

Carter Budget Proposal Termed Short of Needs

"There will be advocates for higher defense levels," Carter acknowledged, "but after careful review I do not believe that higher spending would add significantly to our national security."

Carter's most controversial domestic proposals involve changing the method of calculating cost-of-living adjustments for social security, government retirement and food stamp benefits.

He asked Congress to direct that the cost-of-living escalator for these programs be linked to an "alternative" consumer price index that downgrades the cost of housing and thus would show a lower rate of increase during periods when home-buying costs are soaring.

Further, federal retirees would receive only one cost-of-living adjustment a year, down from the twice-a-year adjustment now required by law. Congress last year rejected a proposal to change to a single adjustment.

The budget also proposes that Congress change the "trigger" for extended unemployment compensation during periods of high unemployment. The Administration last year sought to accomplish the change by administrative action, but a federal court upheld a challenge brought by the AFL-CIO and the UAW. The court agreed that the change usurped the legislative function.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES, who have been regularly shortchanged on the "comparability" salary increases they are supposed to get each year, would be doubly hit by the budget proposal. First, the President asked that the comparability formula be rewritten to take into account "total compensation," including fringe benefits. Such a revision, he said, would reduce the comparability adjustment from a projected 13.5 percent to 8.6 percent for civilian employees. But in addition, he proposed that the increase be further cut back to 5.5 percent.

On taxes, Carter cautioned against "large inflationary individual income tax cuts." But he repeated earlier proposals for more generous depreciation allowances and investment credits for business, an income tax credit to offset the higher social security payroll taxes that took effect this year, and a "working spouse" tax deduction to lessen the so-called "marriage penalty."

However, business tax cuts would be retroactive to Jan. 1, 1981 while the individual tax cuts would not take effect until next year.

OBVIOUSLY, the key tax and budget decisions will be made by Congress and will inevitably differ from the specifics proposed by both the outgoing Carter Administration and the new Reagan Administration.

But the Carter budget, with its voluminous documentations and special analyses, will be the basic working document for congressional committees and the Congressional Budget Office.

It includes projections of the cost of government if present federal services and programs were continued unchanged. This is known as the "current services budget." And from that, it estimates the changes that would result from proposed legislation or from administrative action.

But all its figures are based on economic assumptions which the budget-writers readily concede "are subject to substantial margins of error."

THE UNCERTAINTY of economic projections has rendered virtually meaningless congressional attempts to mandate a balanced budget. Thus, last spring with Democrats and Republicans vying for credit, Congress adopted what was loudly proclaimed as a balanced budget for the current fiscal year, which began Oct. 1, 1980.

The latest projection is that the fiscal year will end with a deficit of over $55 billion—and the final tally in all probability will be at least several billion dollars different from even this late estimate.

Kirkland Ties Industrial Aid To Target Plans

an overall reindustrialization policy, Kirkland urged. "Investment credits should only be available for increases in investment levels, and tax subsidies should be clearly targeted to needed industrial sectors and regions."

Kirkland stressed the importance of a National Reindustrialization Board, with labor, business and government representation, which would both set national goals and direct the activities of a financing agency empowered to make and guarantee loans. Also, "private pension funds should be permitted and encouraged" to participate in such financing arrangements "to support and expand industrial employment."

In contrast to targeted tax policies, Kirkland warned, "the only assured result of across-the-board tax cuts is that corporate cash flows will increase. Instead of undertaking greater rates of investment here in the United States, businesses may raise dividends, invest abroad or purchase other companies."

Jobless Rate 7.4 Percent For Final Month of 1980

percent average of the preceding year.

Not counted in the jobless rate calculations is the number of so-called "discouraged workers" who take themselves out of the work force because they feel there are no jobs for them. Their number jumped to 1.1 million in the fourth quarter of 1980, up 100,000 from the previous quarter and nearly 300,000 over the year. A large proportion of these discouraged workers are women and teenagers, BLS said.

THE GOVERNMENT also revised its seasonal adjustment factors for 1980, placing the year's peak jobless rate at 7.6 percent, rather than a previously reported 7.8 percent in July. The 7.6 percent rate first occurred in May, and reappeared in July and October.

Since May, the unemployment rate has fluctuated between 7.6 and 7.4 percent.

"Overall, job gains in the latter half of 1980 have nearly recouped losses earlier in the year," BLS said in its December report, "although employment was still sharply down in manufacturing and construction."

THERE WAS little change in the jobless rates for major demographic groups in December. The rate for adult men fell to 6.2 percent from 6.4 percent the month before. For adult women, unemployment rose from 6.7 to 6.8 percent. For blacks, the rate remained unchanged at 14 percent. For black teenagers, however, joblessness went up from 36.6 percent to 37.5 percent.

While manufacturing employment increased by 65,000 in December, factory employment was still 780,000 short of its June 1979 high. Construction employment rose by 30,000 last month but was 250,000 below its January 1980 peak.

First Apprentice Standards Developed for Stage Actors

The first-ever apprenticeship standards for an occupation in the arts and entertainment industry have been developed by the National Joint Apprenticeship & Training Committee for Stage Actors.

The standards are the product of a joint effort of the JACT under a Comprehensive Employment & Training Act contract and the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment (LIFHE), the employment and training arm of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees. The committee includes representatives of labor and management in the entertainment industry.

With the development of the new standard, stage acting has become the first occupation in the entertainment field to be federally certified as apprenticeable, DPE Executive Director Jack Golodner pointed out.

THE APPRENTICESHIP standards "are designed to meet the needs of the entry-level professional, that is, the man or woman who has already received some training at the student or amateur level and who is now taking his or her first step in a professional work environment," Golodner said.

Labor Sec. Ray Marshall called the new standards a "breakthrough for apprenticeship and a model for other occupations in the performing arts, or in any industry, where training is a vital job requirement."

Committee members formally presented the standards to Marshall after registering them with the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

The standards include guidelines for selection, qualifications and responsibilities of apprentices; terms of apprenticeship; apprenticeship agreements; wages, hours and conditions of work; work processes and schedules; orientation to collective bargaining agreements; supervision and evaluation of apprentices; and other processes and requirements governing apprenticeship.

At the presentation ceremony, Frederick O'Neal, president of the Actors & Artistes and an AFL-CIO vice president, and Actors' Equity Executive Sec. Willard Swire praised the apprenticeship standards as a means of providing young actors a chance to receive adequate training. Actors' Equity is now working on putting the standards into active use, Swire emphasized.

LIFHE Apprenticeship Coordinator Patricia Porter pointed out that the institute is working to develop and register standards for other occupations in the arts, entertainment and the media.

STANDARDS have already been submitted to the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training for the occupations of motion picture screen cartoonist and television graphics designer. Other committees will work on standards for optical effects camera operators and layout specialists, wardrobe supervisors and script supervisors.

The members of the Stage Actor JATC include Actors' Equity President Theodore Bikel, Swire, and Equity members Ruby Dee, Burt Reynolds, Jean Stapleton and Eli Wallach; Donald Grody, assistant director of the National Football League Players Association, and former executive secretary of Actors' Equity; Lloyd Richards, dean, and Earl Gister, associate dean of the Yale School of Drama; Michael Price, executive director, Goodspeed Opera House; William Putch, president, Council of Resident Theaters; and W. Duncan Ross, drama division chairman of the University of Southern California.

Steelworker Film Gives Picture of Union in Action

A new Steelworkers film about union democracy in action had its premiere at a special showing at the Motion Picture Association of America in Washington, D.C.

The 28-minute color film, titled "The Faces of a Union," shows collective bargaining, job safety committees, grievance processing, labor education programs and political action activities.

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride said the film is intended "to reflect a realistic view of how working people, through their union, have improved their standard of living and solved workplace problems."

It shows also, he said, some of the difficult problems faced by union members and their communities that call on the combined efforts of labor, government and industry for solution.

Newsreel footage introduces the union's early organizing history. The film features Steelworkers on their jobs or involved in community and union activities in both the United States and Canada.

The film was jointly produced with Washington-based MFZA films in four weeks of on-location shooting at plants, union halls, a job health clinic, mines, and union education centers.

"The Faces of a Union" is available on a free loan basis to local unions, secondary schools and local television stations from the USWA Public Relations Dept., Five Gateway Center, Pittsburgh, Pa. 15222.

Senate Panel Screens Donovan's Nomination As Secretary of Labor

Raymond J. Donovan told a Senate confirmation hearing that he would seek to "build bridges" between workers and management as Secretary of Labor in the Reagan Cabinet.

Donovan outlined his views on a number of labor-related issues in response to questions by senators. But most of the questioning centered on his role as a top executive of a New Jersey construction company that had been mentioned—but never charged—in the course of a probe of political corruption in Newark.

The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee put off an immediate vote on Donovan's nomination. But Senate leaders were still hoping to complete action on Cabinet confirmations within a few days of the presidential inauguration.

During an all-day committee hearing on his nomination, Donovan promised "even-handed" administration of the laws Congress has enacted and "sensitivity" to the needs of the people affected by Labor Dept. programs. These range from job training for the disadvantaged to workplace safety and health inspections.

IN RESPONSE to questions, Donovan told the Senate committee that he has seen conflicting reports on the desirability of a youth subminimum wage and still has "an open mind" on the issue.

He would not object to a youth subminimum, he said, "if it could be proved to my satisfaction" that a lower youth wage would open up new job opportunities for young people "without affecting existing wage earners."

On "right-to-work" laws that ban union shop agreements, Donovan said he agrees with Reagan that the decision should be left to the states—as it now is under Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

DONOVAN VOICED a strong personal commitment to job safety and equal employment opportunity but complained of what he termed "overregulation" of business and an "adversarial" approach by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

He said he favors policies to achieve "full employment through economic growth" and opposes the concept of allowing unemployment to rise in order to curb inflation. "I don't agree with that at all," he testified.

Most of the Senate hearing focused on the business operations of the Schiavone Construction Co. of Secaucus, N.J., which Donovan helped build from small beginnings to a still-expanding company with $700 million in outstanding contracts.

Donovan is executive vice president and one of the two principal stockholders of the firm, and questioning centered on his knowledge of a $13,000 company check that was deposited in 1967 in a bank account described in a Newark political corruption trial as a device to "launder" political payoffs.

Donovan told the committee that the check was a routine payment for dumping rights and that an exhaustive examination of the company books at the time by both the U.S. attorney's office and the Internal Revenue Service found no wrongdoing and no taxes due.

SENATORS ALSO raised questions stemming from a continuing grand jury investigation of the business agent of a New York City Teamsters local, Harry Gross. The Justice Dept. reported than an official of the Schiavone firm had testified that the business agent's chauffeur had been put on the payroll during a construction job "as a price for labor peace."

Donovan said he had no prior knowledge of the episode. He said a Teamsters agreement with the regional contractors' association gives the union the right to name anyone it chooses as a working shift foreman.

Donovan was formally presented to the committee by his home-state senator, Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), who was chairman of the committee until the Republicans gained control of the Senate in this Congress. Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) is the new chairman, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) is the ranking minority member.

AT CONFIRMATION HEARING on his selection as Secretary of Labor, Raymond J. Donovan answers questions from members of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee. Donovan, a New Jersey construction contractor, said his goal is to "build bridges" between workers and management.

Perdue Brand Poultry Added To AFL-CIO's 'Unfair' Listing

Perdue poultry products have been placed on the AFL-CIO unfair list, and union consumers are being asked not to buy the non-union company's roasters, broilers, chicken parts or Cornish game hens. Perdue is the third largest poultry processor in the United States.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland added the company to the unfair list at the request of Food & Commercial Workers President William E. Wynn, and has instructed the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to notify federation affiliates, state and local central labor councils and other labor organizations of the action.

Wynn, in a letter requesting the sanction against Perdue, said the UFCW will seek the endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council for a nationwide boycott next month.

The UFCW launched its boycott of Perdue products in September 1980 following an effort by UFCW Local 117 to organize the 1,700 production and maintenance workers at Perdue's Accomac, Va. processing plant. An unfair labor practice strike is now in its sixth month at the plant.

During the organizing campaign, UFCW supporters agreed to honor a picket line set up by the unaffiliated Teamsters in an attempt to organize the Perdue drivers. Fifty-seven UFCW members were "permanently replaced" by the company in retaliation, forcing the UFCW to file unfair labor practice charges.

The National Labor Relations Board has issued a complaint based on the UFCW's charges, and hearings will begin in April. The election remains blocked until the charges are resolved.

Wynn pointed out that the larger issue in the UFCW boycott is Perdue's "aggressive anti-union philosophy which has translated into a situation where not one of its 6,000 employees works under a union contract."

Perdue's anti-union tactics have included buying plants where union contracts are in force, closing them for "modernization," and reopening them under non-union conditions, according to Jerry Gordon, assistant drector of UFCW Region 4, who is coordinating the boycott for the union.

"Perdue is out to destroy the union in the poultry processing industry," Gordon said, pointing out that Perdue's harsh employment policies and record of citations for unsafe working conditions underscore the need for a union.

In the Accomac plant alone, Gordon said, Perdue fired more than 400 workers over a two-year period, and was cited for numerous health and safety law violations.

Wage Test Raised for Exempted Employees

A long-delayed increase in the wage test required for exemption of executives and professionals from overtime pay requirements of the wage-hour law has been announced by the Labor Dept.

Rudy Oswald, director of the AFL-CIO Department of Economic Research, described the new salary tests as a wholly inadequate updating of figures that were obsolete years ago. "While the new rates are better than no change, the new proposals fail to reflect the general increases in wages since 1975, the last time that the Labor Dept. had updated the regulations.

"The rates made effective in 1981 reflect the proposals made by the Labor Dept. three years ago, and the stepup scheduled for 1983 will not keep even those meager rates current with the Administration's own projection of inflation. The whole purpose of the salary tests is to assure that those who receive overtime exemptions are bona fide executives, administrative and professional employees. These new rates do not adequately provide such a safeguard."

The first step, effective Feb. 13, will require that persons whose duties are primarily executive or administrative must be paid at least $225 a week if they are not paid the time and one-half overtime rates required by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The present salary test, unchanged since 1975, is only $155 a week.

A SECOND STEP in the wage test will be effective two years later, on Feb. 13, 1983. As of that date, the executive wage test will move to $250.

Professional employees must meet a higher wage test for exemption from overtime pay requirements. The existing pay requirement, also dating from 1975, is $170 a week. That will rise to $250 on Feb. 13 and to $280 in 1983.

A third category is termed the "upset test." That is the level at which the test for exemption from the Fair Labor Standards Act becomes less stringent in terms of duties and a higher salary level becomes supportive evidence for an exemption.

The old level of $250 will rise to $320 in the first step and to $345 in 1983. The same levels also apply for exemption of persons employed in the motion picture producing industry.

Back in 1978, the Labor Dept. had proposed raising the executive and professional cutoffs to the same levels now scheduled to take effect next month—and to increase the "upset test" to $350, higher than is now proposed. All three figures were substantially less than the AFL-CIO had urged at hearings on the proposals.

The increase, however, never was put into effect. It was criticized as potentially inflationary by the Council on Wage & Price Stability, which then was trying to enforce guidelines to hold down wages.

In practical terms, the only "executives" likely to be affected at the still low cutoff levels are supervisory employees of traditionally low-paying fast food outlets and comparable operations.

A spokesman for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce labeled the Labor Dept. action, which was cleared by President Carter, a "midnight raid" and said the chamber might seek a court order to block it.

The Labor Dept. said the new rates are fully justified by changes in the average salaries paid in white collar occupations and would have only a minimal effect on payrolls.

NO EMPLOYER has to raise the pay of any executive or professional employee as a result of the change in the exempt salary levels. But an otherwise exempt employee making less than the cutoff figure would have to be paid time-and-one-half for hours over 40 a week.

The cutoff test remains lower for employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa but comparable two-step increases are provided in those jurisdictions also.

Thurmond to Press Labor Antitrust Law

Unions have become "too powerful" and should be brought under antitrust laws, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) said at a seminar for business executives.

Early in the century, courts had held that unions could be sued under the antitrust act on the reasoning that insistence on uniform wage scales and strikes were a form of conspiracy in restraint of trade.

Congress lifted that threat when it enacted the Clayton Act in 1914, which specified that "the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce" under antitrust laws.

Economists Scrap Goal on Jobs, Inflation

The Carter Administration's final Economic Report to Congress virtually abandoned the unemployment and inflation goals of the 1978 Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act, insisting that they are unattainable within the time-frame set forth in the act.

"It will not be simultaneously possible to achieve 4 percent unemployment and 3 percent inflation in the time envisioned in the Humphrey-Hawkins Act or in last year's report," the annual report of the President's Council of Economic Advisers maintained.

"ATTEMPTS TO reach either goal on the act's timetable would frustrate progress toward the other goal, and could substantially impair the prospects for improved economic performance," the CEA report argued.

In effect, the outgoing Administration eliminated the schedule for reaching the Humphrey-Hawkins goals of 4 percent joblessness and 3 percent inflation by 1983. In last year's Economic Report, Carter's advisers pushed back the inflation goal to 1988 and the unemployment goal to 1985. CEA Chairman Charles L. Schultze said he did not envision achieving those goals in "the foreseeable future."

Instead, the Carter CEA forecast an unemployment rate of between 7.5 and 7.75 percent at year-end 1981, adding that "it is likely to be above this range in the early part of 1981." During 1982, the unemployment rate is projected to decline steadily, ending the year in the range of 7.25 to 7.5 percent. Joblessness stood at 7.4 percent last month.

A FIVE-YEAR projection in the report sees unemployment gradually declining to 5.9 percent by 1986. Beyond that, the outgoing CEA offered no predictions.

As for inflation, Carter's advisers said the government's consumer price index, which rose 12.6 percent in 1980, likely will increase at about last year's pace. By 1986, they said, the rise in the CPI will moderate to less than half that rate, or 6 percent.

"Given public concern with inflation, both fiscal and monetary policy are expected to be a restraining influence on economic activity in 1981 and beyond," the CEA report observed. "However, there is both need and room for a prudently designed tax cut which would be phased in gradually over the next two years."

THE CARTER unemployment and inflation projections assume that real economic growth will increase at a sluggish rate of about 1.75 percent over the four quarters of 1981, with virtually all of it coming in the last half of the year. For 1982, they foresee a rise of 3.5 percent in real gross national product—the value of the nation's total output of goods and services—but this is predicated on tax cuts that would provide significant economic stimulus. Between 1983 and 1986,

4th Quarter Rise Fails to Recoup Loss

By James M. Shevis

A strong fourth-quarter finish failed to make up ground lost to the recession earlier in the year, with the result that the nation's economy in 1980 suffered its third setback of the past decade.

For 1980 as a whole, real gross national product (GNP) declined one-tenth of 1 percent, the Commerce Dept. said. The downturn followed four years of economic growth.

RUDY OSWALD, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Economic Research, compared the economic ups and downs of the past 10 years with the record of the 1960s, which "showed strong growth" through most of the period.

"The repeated recessions of the last decade contributed to lower productivity and resultant higher inflation," Oswald observed. "The downturn in the 1980 economy reduced the nation's output far below its potential. Fewer goods and services were produced despite a growing labor force that was looking for work.

"As a result, unemployment rose from 5.9 percent in the fourth quarter of 1979 to 7.4 percent in the fourth quarter of 1980."

OSWALD SAID the growth and vitality of the economy last year were "choked off" by the highest interest rates of the century. A record prime rate, topping 20 percent for the first time ever, had particularly deleterious effects on the housing and manufacturing sectors of the economy, he noted.

Reagan's Conservatism Keys Inaugural Theme

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan's "first priorities" will be to shrink the federal government and cut taxes. But he cautioned in his inaugural address against expecting quick results in curbing inflation and expanding employment.

"Progress may be slow—measured in inches and feet, not miles," the new President said.

Reagan followed tradition by using his inauguration to set broad themes for his Administration, and it will be weeks, perhaps months, before these are transformed into detailed legislative and budget proposals to Congress.

"Government is not the solution to our problems. Government is the problem," Reagan said just minutes after taking over the helm.

The nation's economic ills, Reagan suggested, stem from a "punitive tax burden" that penalizes successful achievement."

ON THE PRINCIPLES OF less government and less taxes, "there will be no compromise," Reagan insisted.

The Reagan Administration is still in the early stages of formation.

The President has named his key White House staff and his Cabinet choices. But it will be weeks yet before the scores of sub-Cabinet posts and the hundreds of other top positions open to a new Administration are filled.

Reagan's early choices are an amalgam of traditional Republican mainstreamers, such as dominated the last Republican Administration under Gerald Ford, and conservative ideologues long suspicious of government.

IRONICALLY, the two votes cast against confirmation of Defense Sec. Caspar W. Weinberger, a close personal associate of Reagan as well as a veteran of the Nixon and Ford Cabinets, came from two of the most conservative members of the Senate—North Carolina Republicans Jesse A. Helms and John P. East.

House Committee Lineups Reflect GOP Election Gain

Election returns and retirements have shuffled the membership of House committees in the new Congress although, with continued Democratic control, most chairmen are holdovers.

Democrats retain majorities above their party ratio in the House in some key committees. But in other committees, the party division reflects Republican election gains and in some cases gives the conservative coalition effective control.

Here's the new lineup:

AGRICULTURE—Changes from 27 Democrats, 15 Republicans to 24 Democrats, 18 Republicans, and becomes more conservative as Kika de la Garza (Tex.) replaces Thomas S. Foley (Wash.) as chairman. Foley remains on the committee, whose jurisdiction includes the food stamp program. But he had to give up his chairmanship to take the post of party whip, or assistant majority leader. Republican William C. Wampler (Va.) continues as ranking minority member.

APPROPRIATIONS—Changes from a 36-18 to a 33-22 Democratic majority. The holdover chairman is conservative Jamie L. Whitten (Miss.), and liberal Republican Silvio O. Conte (Mass.) remains senior minority member.

ARMED SERVICES—Party ratio still to be decided. Melvin Price (Ill.) remains chairman and William L. Dickinson (Ala.) becomes the senior Republican.

BANKING, FINANCE & URBAN AFFAIRS—The Democratic majority is

Labor Presses Job Programs In '80s 'Agenda'

A 45-member presidential commission agreed that balanced economic growth should top the nation's "Agenda for the Eighties," but differed in emphasis on how to achieve it.

Labor, civil rights and consumer representatives were among the signers of a supplementary statement urging policies to promote full employment and generally supporting a more direct role for government in dealing with the nation's problems.

LEON B. SCHACHTER, the retired vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers who represented AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland on the commission, signed the separate statement. The other signers were Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts; Addie L. Wyatt, vice president of the UFCW and executive vice president of the Coalition of Labor

SKY SAFETY is the goal of an intensive public education effort launched by the Air Line Pilots, ALPA President John J. O'Donnell announced at a meeting in Atlanta. Operation USA (Unity for Safe Airtravel) will alert the public to air safety problems which the union says could be remedied by requiring the Federal Aviation Administration to exercise a greater safety role.

Pilots Sound Public Alert On 'Erosion' of Air Safety

Atlanta—A campaign to alert the public to an "erosion in the U.S. air safety system" was kicked off by the Air Line Pilots at a special meeting here that drew more than 200 pilots from 29 airlines.

The program, dubbed Operation USA (Unity for Safe Airtravel), was launched to focus public attention on the responsibility of the Federal Aviation Administration for air passenger safety. ALPA, which represents 33,000 pilots, has been critical of the FAA's record on safety issues, charging that the agency "has allowed its role of promoting air commerce to compromise its role of ensuring the highest practicable level of air safety."

The goals of the campaign are to require the FAA to open up the aircraft certification process to participation by qualified third parties, including professional pilots. Currently, the process is "closed," and only the FAA and the manufacturer participate, the union said.

Another goal is reduction of the number of near mid-air collisions, which could be accomplished by requiring the FAA to revamp existing and future air traffic control systems. The ALPA is also urging development of an independent on-board collision avoidance system.

AN FAA EFFORT to increase the number of hours a pilot can be required to fly without rest should be ha'ted, the union said, and the agency's safety improvement programs should be directed to constructive measures and away from a "witch hunt" against pilots.

Some proposed FAA rule changes would provide for stiffer fines (up to $25 000) or possible prison terms for violations of federal aviation regulations, ALPA pointed out.

Operation USA is also calling for speedy release of a $4 billion surplus in the federal airport and airway trust fund which could be used to improve airport safety facilities.

Fifteen major U.S. cities have been targeted for activities in the union's campaign, spearheaded by pilot volunteers. Radio time for spots urging the public to call ALPA for information on air safety has been purchased in Washington, D.C., and ALPA President John J. O'Donnell has scheduled a tour of the remaining cities to officially launch the campaign.

IN ADDITION to alerting the public to safety issues, Operation USA's goal is "to persuade President Reagan to improve the performance procedures and standards set down by the FAA," O'Donnell said.

The union's executive board at its November 1980 meeting called for a series of protests to underscore the safety issue which could include a "nationwide suspension of services as an act of public protest."

A work stoppage would not be intended to inconvenience the public or employers, O'Connell said, but to "bring attention to our conviction that the present erosion of the air safety system will escalate in the near future unless the FAA acts now to correct its deficiencies."

ALPA, AS WELL as the Flight Engineers, has called the FAA's current certification process for new generation aircraft "flawed," charging that the agency has been swayed by manufacturer pressure to relax certain safety standards.

The union points out that the issue of crew complement—whether an aircraft requires a three-person or a two-person cockpit crew for maximum safety—has not been properly addressed by the FAA. One aircraft, the McDonnell-Douglas Super 80, has already been certificated with a two-person cockpit, and similar approval of two new Boeing aircraft is expected soon.

THE PILOTS' union disagrees with the contention of the manufacturers that advances in aircraft technology permit them to be flown safely by two crew members. The ALPA points out that advances in automation actually increase the pilots' complex workload. A third crew member adds "an additional margin of safety" by reducing workload, providing a back-up and checking service and additional action in an emergency.

An independent, scientific study is needed to resolve the issue which has been a recurring one in the airline industry for 35 years, the ALPA said, arguing that the FAA has not performed such studies, but has relied on the manufacturers' own claims of safety.

Returning Hostages Welcomed by AFGE

The American Federation of Government Employees sent a warm "welcome back" message to the former hostages returning from captivity in Iran.

"In this time of joy and celebration," AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock said, "it is proper to reflect upon the terrific injustice each of them suffered at the hands of their captors. Whether it was one day or 444, it was wrong for one group of humans to unjustly deprive others of their freedom.

"As the union representing 750,000 men and women who work for government, including several of these courageous freed hostages, we offer a hearty welcome home from your co-workers."

Women Pace Rise in 'Moonlighting'

The number of "moonlighters"—workers holding two or more jobs—rose slightly between May 1979 and May 1980 to 4,759,000, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. A year earlier, the number was 4,724,000.

The multiple job holding or moonlighting rate, which measures multiple jobholders as a percent of all employed workers, was 4.9 percent, the same as in May 1979.

The proportion of all working women who moonlighted, however, rose from 3.5 to 3.8 percent while that of men dropped from 5.9 to 5.8 percent over the year, BLS said. Seven years ago, the rate was 6.6 percent for men, 2.7 percent for women, and 5.1 percent overall.

By occupation, workers in professional and technical jobs and farmers were the most likely to hold second jobs. Their moonlighting rates averaged 8 percent and 6.4 percent, respectively, in 1980, BLS said. On the other hand, factory operatives and clerical workers were the least likely to hold second jobs, with moonlighting rates of 2.7 and 3.8 percent.

The total number of workers employed more than 40 hours a week, whether in one job or more than one job, fell from 25.7 million to 23.2 million in the year ended in May 1980, BLS said.

Steelworkers Open Talks in Can Industry

Costa Mesa, Calif.—The Steelworkers opened negotiations with the container industry on new agreements to replace current contracts covering nearly 40,000 workers that expire on Feb. 15.

Following a two-day, joint "sound-off" session with industry representatives here, union negotiators met separately with bargainers from each of the four major companies in the industry, American Can, Continental Can, National Can, and Crown Cork & Seal.

THE FOUR companies employ a total of some 20,000 USWA members. In addition to the four major firms, the union holds contracts with several smaller producers and "captive" can operations owned by food, beer, and other product manufacturers which make their own containers.

About 200 officers of USWA locals across the country attended the sound-off session. Robert Petris, director of the union's District 38 in Los Angeles, is chairman of the USWA container industry conference and chairman of the union's bargaining committee at Continental Can.

Petris said the union hopes to gain an agreement similar to the one it reached last year with the aluminum industry. He said the union seeks a substantial wage increase, continuation and improvement of its current cost-of-living clause, and improved benefits and health coverage for retirees. He pointed out that the industry has lost some 10,000 jobs in recent years.

Current contracts with the four major can companies provided a 40-cent hourly wage increase in March 1977, and additional hourly raises of 10 cents on Nov. 1, 1977, 10 to 19.6 cents on Mar. 1, 1978, 10 cents on Sept. 1, 1978, 10 to 22 cents on Mar. 1. 1979, and 34 to 43.6 cents on Mar. 1, 1980.

THE UNION seeks to improve the COL formula to provide for a one-cent hourly increase for every .28 of a point rise in the government's consumer price index. The current formula calls for a one-cent increase for every rise of three-tenths of a point in the index.

The container industry talks are the last in the union's series of four major industry conference negotiations which began with the major steel companies last spring, followed by negotiations with the aluminum industry. The nonferrous bargaining talks with the copper industry ended late last November.

ASSOCIATED PRESS employees in major cities have been walking informational picket lines to protest the news agency's stonewalling tactics in bargaining with the Newspaper Guild. More than 100 staffers joined this protest outside AP's headquarters in New York, where the board of directors was meeting. The Guild has filed unfair labor practice charges stemming from the bargaining impasse. The Guild-AP contract expired Dec. 31.

Drozak Asks Measures to Rescue U.S. Shipbuilding, Merchant Fleet

The United States is in danger of losing its vital shipbuilding capacity and its status as a world maritime power unless government policies are quickly changed, AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. President Frank Drozak warned.

Drozak, who is president of the Seafarers, called for a reversal of "the 20-year decline in the American merchant marine and shipbuilding industry" in a statement issued following a meeting of the Ad Hoc Maritime Committee of the AFL-CIO.

"THE MARITIME industry does not need new subsidies, loans, grants or bailouts," Drozak said. "It only needs government policies that recognize its importance to all American citizens no matter how far from water they may live."

The committee, chaired by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, includes the Steelworkers; Marine Engineers; Longshoremen; the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; the Masters, Mates & Pilots; the Radio Officers, and the National Maritime Union. It is calling for the adoption of five new government policies:

- Revitalization of the dry bulk U.S.-flag fleet and consideration of the U.S. merchant marine in all programs promoting the export of American coal. A strong fleet is essential to carry not only coal but also strategic materials, the committee said, pointing out that of 71 raw materials considered vital to defense and U.S. industry, only a small percentage is shipped under U.S. flags.
- Greater use by the U.S. Navy of the merchant marine fleet for routine auxiliary functions, and transfer of operation and construction of auxiliary support vessels to the private sector.
- Revision of tax incentives and regulatory practices that encourage the building of new vessels in foreign shipyards rather than in the United States.
- Negotiation of bilateral trade agreements, particularly with developing countries, that include guarantees of an equitable share of U.S. international cargoes for U.S.-flag ships.
- Ratification by the United States of the UN Conference on Trade & Development's proposed code of conduct for liner services with formulas that would reserve for U.S. ships 40 percent of all liner cargoes shipped from or destined for the United States.

"UNLESS THESE policies are adopted now, there will be no more yards building commercial ships in the United States," Drozak warned. "Even today fewer than two dozen major shipyards remain to be saved from extinction."

He pointed to the recent closing of the Sun Ship Yard in Chester, Pa., as evidence of the "frightening situation" threatening U.S. marine capability. Several thousand workers are expected to lose their jobs, Drozak said, when the yard stops construction of new ships.

Drozak urged the new Administration to follow up on a campaign commitment to a revitalization of an effective U.S. merchant marine made by Ronald Reagan in a speech at the same shipyard.

WITHOUT NEW policies, "there soon could be no U.S. merchant marine to carry grain to foreign buyers and to transport strategic materials to our defense and manufacturing plants," Drozak cautioned. "If a war were to break out, the United States would be unable to send men and equipment in numbers sufficient to fight. Hundreds of thousands of Americans would be in unemployment lines. The end of American shipbuilding capability and U.S.-flag shipping would be catastrophic to our economy and our defense," he emphasized.

Drozak pointed out that similar recommendations for bolstering the U.S. merchant fleet were agreed upon by more than 100 representatives of the maritime industry, labor and government at a symposium sponsored earlier this month in the U.S. Virgin Islands by the Center for Ocean Law & Policy of the University of Virginia. Drozak was on a panel discussing government action and maritime policy.

College-Educated Workers Nearly Double in 10 Years

More workers than ever have college degrees, and the number of college graduates in the workforce has nearly doubled since 1970, according to data released by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The Labor Dept.'s statistical arm found in a March 1980 survey that nearly 17 million workers aged 25 to 64 had completed four or more years of college and some 13.4 million had attended at least one year of college, a total of about 30.3 million workers with education beyond high school.

A DECADE AGO, 8.7 million workers had finished four years of college, and 7.2 million had attended some college for a total of about 16 million.

BLS pointed out that the figures correspond to the passage of the post-World War II "baby boom" generation through school and into the workforce. Men and women in the 25-34 year age bracket accounted for 44 percent of the total number of workers who have completed four or more years of college and 45 percent of all workers with at least one year of college.

Among college graduates, the BLS said, about three-fourths of both men and women workers are concentrated in two broad occupational groups, professional/technical and managerial. Of workers with one to three years of college, 37 percent of the men and 32 percent of the women were in those job categories.

Of those who attended only one to three years of college, 21 percent of the men were craft workers and 44 percent of the women were clerical workers. Some 31 percent of male high school graduates with no college were craft workers and 46 percent of the women in that category were clustered in clerical jobs.

THE BLS FIGURES show that unemployment rates varied in relation to a worker's years of schooling, with only 2 percent of college graduates out of work in March 1980 compared to 4.9 percent of workers with one to three years of college and 6.5 percent of workers with only high school diplomas.

White college graduates had an unemployment rate of 1.9 percent in March 1980 compared to 4.1 percent for black graduates and 3.4 percent for Hispanic graduates. The rate for blacks with one to three years of college jumped to 10.2 percent in the same period compared to a jobless rate of 4.3 percent for whites and 5.9 percent for Hispanics in the same educational category.

Musicians Gain Settlement With Film, TV Producers

Los Angeles — The Musicians reached an agreement with motion picture and television producers on a new three-year contract to end a 27-week strike by some 5,000 AFM members who score and provide the music for productions.

Although details of the agreement were not released pending a ratification vote, AMF President Victor W. Fuentealba reported that the contract provides for substantial wage increases and other improvements.

It also makes provisions for future negotiations on the use of original production music for the home video market. A major issue in the dispute that led to the strike, which began last Aug. 1, was over compensation for various forms of pay television, as well as payments for reruns of TV shows and motion pictures.

The ratification vote, which will be conducted by mail, is expected to take several weeks to complete.

The tentative agreement between the AFM and the Association of Motion Picture & Television Producers was reached Jan. 14 with the assistance of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Fuentealba said the AFM was "pleased with the resolution of the strike and gratified by the terms of the agreement." He added that the determination and unity of striking members "has been rewarded with a settlement which will benefit all musicians."

During the strike, producers used dubbed-in music from previous television shows or had recordings for motion pictures done overseas.

A Proud Workforce

IN AN ESTABLISHMENT as vast as the United States government, President Reagan's appointees will surely find some of the waste and inefficiency he has committed his Administration to eradicate.

Where it is found, it should be eliminated. The problem is not unique to government. A diligent search almost certainly would uncover pockets of sloth in General Motors, IBM and most other large corporations.

But the President and his appointees will also find a large reservoir of conscientious men and women performing useful work and doing so with pride.

THEY MAY BE found driving trucks or inspecting mines, checking tax returns or feeding data into computers, directing air traffic or cleaning hospital wards, answering telephones and reproducing reports.

Government employees were taken hostage in Iran, and other government employees worked day and night to achieve their freedom.

And yes, some are also engaged in the enormously complex task of drawing up regulations that are fair and workable so as to better protect the health, safety and rights of their fellow Americans.

Like workers everywhere, they will respond to leadership and example—and justly resent undeserved abuse.

End of an Ordeal

THE DEEP EMOTION that President Carter showed in his warm welcome to the men and women finally freed from captivity in Iran was shared by his fellow Americans.

The American people were united in outrage when the U.S. embassy was seized and diplomatic hostages taken in violation of international tenets that have been observed almost since the dawn of history.

We seethed at the indignities to which the hostages were subjected and we rejoiced, as if for our own kin, at their release.

IN THE DELICATE around-the-clock negotiations that occupied the final days of his Administration, President Carter demonstrated that the awesome responsibility of the presidency is borne for the full four years, and cannot be put aside even when the view from the Oval Office shows the preparations for the inaugural of a successor.

And President Reagan took the proper step in asking Mr. Carter to represent him and all of the American people in a personal welcome to the liberated Americans.

The ordeal to which the Americans taken hostage were subjected was all the more reprehensible because it was not merely indignities at the hands of an inflamed, unreasoning mob.

As the AFL-CIO Executive Council noted in a resolution adopted last year, the hostages were "victims of Iran's policy of official terrorism—a policy aimed at the humiliation and blackmail of the United States."

A Political Message

State Lines Prove No Barrier To Airborne Pollution of Lakes

By Gus Tyler

THE LAKES AND PONDS of New York's Adirondack Mountains are so acid that fish can no longer live in them. By count, 219 such bodies of water have been so polluted; an additional 256 are rapidly reaching the same point of poisoning.

The problem is environmental, of course; but it is actually more political than technical.

The political message is that no state in these United States is an island unto itself; it is part of the continent, inhabited by 49 other states, whose behavior affects all of us. For instance:

THE ACID IN these lakes and ponds does not come from the negligence of the New Yorkers who surround the area. The poison comes from faraway states, like Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, Tennessee and West Virginia. These states burn coal to generate power and do so with little regard to sulfur dioxide and other dangerous emissions.

Winds, rain and snow carry these pollutants eastward, doing heavy damage when they hit heights above 2,000 feet. The poisons are not only deposited directly on the ponds and lakes, once some of the finest trout fishing spots in the world, but are dumped on soil through which the contaminants leach into the waterways.

There is no way that New York can cope with this matter short of calling for federal intervention and for tight enforcement of tough standards. By itself, the Empire State is helpless.

NO DOUBT, New York's call for Uncle Sam to step in can be interpreted as a call for "more" rather than "less" government. Such an act would surely be denounced by those who want to get the government out of our lives. But what alternative does New York—or any other state affected by a neighbor's behavior—have, but to call upon Uncle Sam to come to the aid of an endangered niece or nephew?

The case of the poisoned water is, in a very real way, symbolic of the relationship between the states and Washington. Over the years, they—or some of their inhabitants—have turned to the capital for action because the state could not or would not move on its own.

A constitutional amendment to extend the suffrage to women in the country was needed because the separate states would have taken forever-and-a-day (if ever) to give every woman in this country the right to vote.

A CIVIL RIGHTS act was needed in 1964 because, if the matter of rights for minorities were left to the states, there would still be millions in this country who would be denied what was rightfully theirs.

Many years ago it became painfully apparent that any state that introduced progressive social legislation—like workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance or social security—would be penalized for doing so. To finance such systems required taxation. If a neighboring (or distant) state did not go in for such sensible and humane measures, it could attract business by offering lower tax rates. Hence, the meaner the state was the greater its success in drawing away business from the states with a social conscience.

PRECISELY because the states had not moved in these areas, partly for fear that to be generous would be foolhardy, the federal government had to take the initiative to establish unemployment insurance and social security.

History has proven over and over again that in socio-economic matters, as in containing the effects of acid rain, a state can not do what's right just by itself. In many such matters, we must act as a united states.

Kirkland Presses Tripartite Action

General Tax Cuts No Remedy For Erosion of Industrial Base

From an address by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at an Industrial Union Dept. conference, Jan. 9, 1981, at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

DURING the Seventies, the American economy experienced extended periods of high unemployment, massive layoffs, and plant closings. The growth of the economy slowed, inflation increased, and our balance of payments worsened. These events would have been bad enough if they were purely cylical in nature, with the economy rebounding after a downturn. Underlying these problems, however, was a much more serious and enduring problem. The industrial base of the American economy was in fact eroding.

During the Seventies, the American share of the world market for manufactured goods declined 23 percent, while our share of our own domestic market also declined. As a result of this deindustrialization, at least 2 million industrial jobs have been lost. In the face of this ominous trend, there has been no coherent national policy to reverse it.

We just don't believe that you can write off major industries in this country without paying for it dearly in the future. Nor do we believe that whole cities and regions of America can be allowed to decay, while other regions prosper like Arab sheikdoms, without serious social and economic consequences. It's the height of arrogance to talk in abstract, theoretical terms about letting certain industries disappear and then putting everyone else to work making micro-chips.

IT'S IMPORTANT that America be a diversified industrial nation, not one that just depends upon one or two industries or is dependent upon services. I do not believe that our standards of living will be improved if we allow basic industries to erode.

Nor would the world be better off if each country simply specialized in the production of one product. In the first place, no other country has accepted that idea.

On the contrary, the countries that we point to as having outperformed us economically have taken precisely the opposite course of action. They have generally approached their economic problems with a coherent industrial policy, in which government, labor and business all play key roles. Industries that are considered important to the nation's growth aren't allowed to atrophy in order to demonstrate a country's faith in the principles of free-market economics. And new industries are often given government assistance where the market would prevent them from getting started.

Instead of blindly adhering to economic prescriptions based upon an industrial structure that existed 200 years ago, we should adopt similar procedures to stem the erosion and begin the revitalization of American industry.

Conservatives argue that all we have to do to achieve growth rates comparable to our foreign competitors is to cut taxes in a general fashion. They argue that taxes are so burdensome here in the U.S. that the incentive to save and invest has diminished, thereby causing a long-term slowdown in economic growth. But this notion just doesn't square with reality. As a proportion of gross domestic product, taxes in the U.S. are 29 percent; in France they're 39 percent; in Germany they are 37 percent. Yet these countries have achieved higher rates of growth. If there is a relationship between taxes and growth, this would indicate that it is positive, rather than negative as the supply-siders would like us to believe.

Thus, the idea that we have grown more slowly than other industrial nations because of excessive taxes just isn't true. A general tax cut is not the answer to our problems.

THE TRACK RECORD of general business tax cuts demonstrates they are generally ineffective in stimulating investment or productivity. During the 1970s there were several huge business tax cuts, including liberalized depreciation allowances, an increased investment credit, reduced corporate tax rates, and reduced taxation on capital gains. Yet investment as a proportion of GNP remained substantially constant over this period.

The only assured result of across-the-board tax cuts is that corporate cash flows will increase. Instead of undertaking greater rates of investment here in the U.S., businesses may raise dividends, invest abroad or purchase other companies.

Tax policy—if it's to be a tool for reindustrialization—must be structured in terms of precise and planned goals. It must be flexible and selective, not across-the-board.

Rather than just providing for general across-the-board cuts in depreciation, a new targeted program should be developed. Such a program could be initiated as part of an overall reindustrialization policy.

The need for a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board—including representatives of labor, business, and the government—has not diminished. The amount and type of any tax incentive or accelerated depreciation allowance granted to any company would be determined on a case-by-case basis with some type of certificate of necessity. Investment credits should only be available for increases in investment levels, and tax subsidies should be clearly targeted to needed industrial sectors and regions.

The need for a massive effort to reindustrialize the American economy remains one of our most important priorities.

97th Congress

Labor's Legislative Program Stresses Action to Create Jobs

MEASURES TO PUT Americans back to work and restore the vitality of the nation's productive capacity will be the major thrust of organized labor in the 97th Congress, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said on Labor News Conference.

"There is a constituency for those programs," Denison stressed. He listed specific action to reshape international trade policies, bolster the U.S. auto industry and make a meaningful start on a synthetic fuels program as the keys to a successful session for the new Congress.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Denison said the labor movement will also put strong emphasis on defending vital worker protections against dangerous cuts and poor administration. He said the "considerable conservative shift" in Congress and the new Administration has put workers, the economy and the entire society in a "much more precarious posture." He warned of a danger in the potential for "regressive legislation and conservative programs that will hurt American workers across the board."

Denison said the AFL-CIO hopes that a "harmonious relationship" will prevail at the department and agency level of the federal government, where the day-to-day operations of programs put on the books by Congress are carried out. "The administration of programs is the area where good laws can fail," he added.

DENISON ACKNOWLEDGED that ultra-conservatives are putting substantial pressure on Congress and that a drive against the labor movement, as an institution, could develop. But, he said, the hope is that "moderate forces will prevail," for there is "no percentage to be gained if warfare on the Hill pits the American labor movement against hard-nosed, right-wing zealots."

Far more important, he asserted, is a sustained effort to move toward a full-employment economy that is built on a stable base. That, he said, will be the key battleground for the labor movement.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AFTER THE NOVEMBER elections, a young congressman named David Stockman went out to California and presented a 23-page scenario to Ronald Reagan. In highly emotional language, Stockman warned Reagan that his Administration faces an "economic Dunkirk" in its first two years.

Apparently mindful of the traditional mid-term swing against the party in the White House, Stockman said Reagan must act boldly and swiftly or else risk a demoralized GOP and lose a "golden opportunity" for conservative change and political realignment by November 1982.

To "dominate" the Washington agenda, Stockman advised, Reagan should declare "a national economic emergency" and enter "fevered consultation" with leaders of Congress on his economic program.

Fortunately, calmer heads prevailed.

TREASURY SEC.-DESIGNATE Donald Regan told the Senate Finance Committee that "we must have a sense of urgency—not a sense of emergency." Former Federal Reserve Chairman Arthur Burns also threw cold water on Stockman's idea, saying it would only "frighten people."

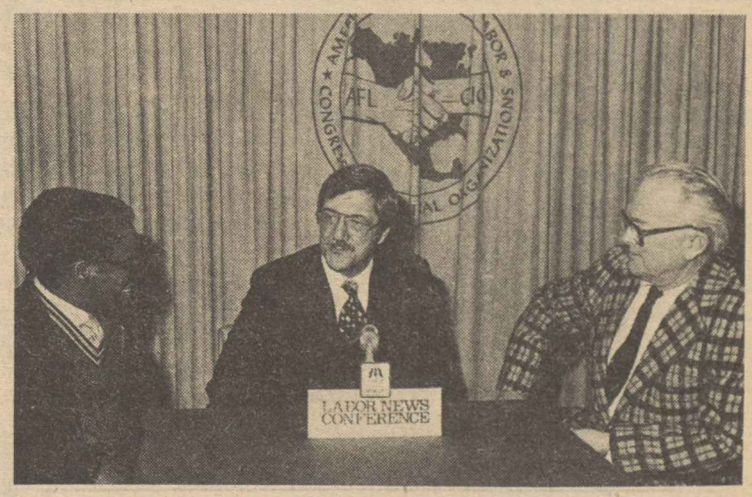
Now that Stockman has become Reagan's budget chief, it is perhaps worth looking at his cast of mind towards federal programs.

In his memo to Reagan, he described the federal budget as "an automatic 'coast-to-coast soup line' that dispenses remedial aid with almost reckless abandon, converting the traditional notion of automatic stabilizers into multitudinous outlay spasms throughout the budget."

ONE ISSUE that bothers Stockman is what he calls the "ticking regulatory time-bomb." During the 1970s, as he sees it, Congress approved a dozen sweeping environmental, energy and safety laws practically devoid of policy standards and sound criteria.

Then the "McGovernite no-growth activists assumed control of most of the relevant sub-Cabinet policy posts during the Carter Administration." These people spent the past four years "tooling up" to implement "a mind-boggling outpouring" of rules.

Rising to his rhetorical climax, Stockman said this decade-long process is now at the point where "it will sweep through the industrial economy with near gale force, preempting multi-billions in investment capital, driving up operating costs, and siphoning off management and technical personnel in an incredible morass of new controls and compliance procedures."



TO EASE OR LIFT the cost of regulations on industry, Stockman would act administratively to defer, revise or rescind existing and pending regulations.

Since only about one-fourth of the federal budget is "controllable," Stockman advised Reagan to focus on the "entitlement" programs that make up most of the remaining 75 percent:

"Current expenditures for food stamps, cash assistance, Medicaid, disability, heating assistance, housing assistance, WIC (child nutrition), school lunches, and unemployment compensation amount to $100 billion. A carefully tailored package to reduce eligibility, overlap and abuse should be developed for these areas —with potential savings of $10-20 billion."

The basic trouble with Stockman's approach is that it adds up costs and ignores benefits.

ON THE BENEFITS side, for example, Douglas Costle, former administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, points out that an investment of $200,000 at the Life Sciences plant in Hopewell, Va., would have made it safe to produce Kepone. Failure to make it safe led to contamination of workers and the James River. Judgments against Life Sciences total $12 million and EPA estimates it would cost $8 billion to clean up the James, if it can ever be done.

JOBS FOR THE UNEMPLOYED in a stable economy will be the focus of organized labor's efforts in the 97th Congress, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Warren Brown, left, of the Washington Post and Neil MacNeil of Time Magazine. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast weekly over the Mutual radio network.

Indiana Cited for Laxity

OSHA Acts on Backlog Of Safety, Health Issues

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has moved to lift the charter on Indiana's job safety and health plan, which the state has operated for the past six years.

Citing a "consistent pattern of poor performance in critical program areas," OSHA filed a formal complaint in the Federal Register—one in a series of steps to have certification of the Indiana plan withdrawn.

THE INDIANA PLAN has been under fire for several years from workers and unions on charges that workplace hazards were either totally ignored or glossed over.

In 1977, the AFL-CIO, along with the state federation, the Steelworkers and other affiliates, petitioned OSHA for the withdrawal of the Indiana plan.

The action against the Indiana plan was among a flurry of labor-backed measures by outgoing OSHA officials who left office Jan. 20. Other actions included:

- A final "walk-around" rule requiring employers to pay workers who accompany OSHA compliance officers on workplace inspections.
- Proposed safety and health regulations designed to improve protections for some 680,000 workers involved in onshore marine cargo-handling.
- Scheduling of hearings and extending the comment period on a proposed conveyor safety standard to reduce hazards.

THESE AND several other measures issued during the past month are likely to get close scrutiny from the incoming OSHA officials to be appointed by the Reagan Administration.

In filing its complaint against the Indiana plan, OSHA charged that the state failed to employ enough qualified industrial hygienists, resulting in an inadequate health enforcement program.

OSHA also cited Indiana for overlooking serious workplace hazards, proposing unduly light penalties for violations, and for not upgrading workers' rights in line with changes in the federal program.

THE 1970 JOB safety law stipulates that state plans must be "at least as effective" as the federal occupational safety and health program if they are to govern within the state instead of the federal program. State plans that are certified by OSHA receive 50 percent federal funding.

The walk-around pay rule was originally issued by OSHA in 1978, but an appeals court vacated the regulation last November after it was challenged by employers. The agency reissued the rule after carrying out administration procedures cited by the court. In addition to full earnings, the rule requires that the worker receive all other benefits and rights during the walk-around period.

In announcing the marine cargo-handling safety proposal, outgoing Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham pointed out that the injury rate is far greater for marine terminal workers than in many other private sector industries.

HEARINGS ON the conveyor safety standard will be held in Washington, May 5-7, and followed by regional hearings in Chicago, May 12-14, ans Los Angeles, May 19-21.

OSHA said that in 1976 alone, 16,720 lost-time injuries were related to conveyors. The agency estimated that the cost of these injuries, including compensation claims, legal fees, lost income and other charges, amounted to $235 million.

Equity Members Weigh Plan To Shore Up Dues Structure

New York—Actors' Equity members are voting on proposals that would raise dues for professional stage actors for the first time since 1973. Action to submit alternative plans for a dues increase to the membership was approved at the Equity's national membership meeting here Jan. 9.

Willard Swire, the union's executive secretary, said the need for a dues increase grew out of a "fiscal crisis" brought on by a "serious financial deficit."

WHILE THE UNION'S membership has increased since 1973 from 15,000 to 27,000 and employment of Equity actors was 13,000 in 1980 compared to only 9,000 in 1973, and the union's operating income needed to pay fixed expenses as well as provide expanded services has not kept pace, Swire told the delegates.

Two dues proposals have been submitted for a vote of ballots mailed Jan. 23 which must be returned by Feb. 27. Plan A, developed by a committee of the union's executive council, has the unanimous recommendation of the council. Plan B, a revision of the union's existing dues structure, also appears on the ballot as an alternative, but does not carry a recommendation.

The new proposal provides for basic dues of $1 per week payable annually by all Equity members. In addition, a 2 percent charge will be levied on an actor's earnings payable to Equity while the member is working. "Working dues" will be paid by checkoff.

TO EASE THE dues burden on actors who are not employed, Plan A provides that members who earn less than $5,000 will receive a credit of one-half percent of their Equity income in the following year.

Actors who earn more than $100,000 a year under Equity contracts will receive a rebate of any dues collected in excess of $2,000 in that year.

Plan B, a revision of the current dues system, would provide for collection of dues based on a sliding scale tied to income. Dues would be paid directly by the member.

The current system is based on 10 categories of Equity income ranping from none to $25,000 or more a year. The new plan would establish 16 categories from no income to over $50,000 per year. Dues at the low end of the scale would be increased from $42 to $52 per year, and at the top from $400 to $1,000.

Labor Stresses Job Needs in '80s 'Agenda'

Union Women; President Dorothy I. Height of the National Council of Negro Women; NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks, and Consumers Union Executive Director Rhoda H. Karpatkin.

Their statement cited the need for public investment to support balanced economic growth.

"Selective, targeted stimulus programs —employment and training programs, investment incentives and credit regulations —are more efficient in promoting economic growth, in raising productivity, and in fighting inflation," they said. Further, such policies "are more fair in terms of income distribution than general across-the-board tax cuts or restrictive fiscal and monetary policies," the statement declared.

COMMISSION CHAIRMAN William J. McGill, president-emeritus of Columbia University, expressed satisfaction that such a diverse group had reached a general consensus on a large number of important issues during its 13-month exploration.

One of the controversial conclusions of the McGill commission was that the nation should accept the fact that production and employment are shifting from the older cities of the Northeast to the Sunbelt. Rather than seeking to stem the tide, the commission said, "we should try to help people bear their often painful burdens and, as quickly as possible, facilitate transition to new locations and jobs."

THE SIGNERS of the supplementary statement, however, contended that "it is essential to maintain and revitalize America's urban areas as centers for economic, social and cultural activity."

The supplementary report was made public by the AFL-CIO and was included in an appendix to the commission's report. These were some of the other points it made:

- An agenda for the Eighties should include a continuing examination of economic concentration and the effects of corporate power on employment, prices, income distribution and the U.S. role in the world.
- U.S. trade policy should "contribute to a health and diversified economy."
- The commission properly urged federalizing of the welfare system and a minimum security income for all Americans. The signers urged that the minimum payment be raised to the poverty level by the end of the decade and that food stamp assistance be continued until that is done, instead of being ended.
- On health care, the signers agreed with the commission's conclusion that the delivery of health care is "woefully inadequate," but balked at the inadequate remedies proposed. These included insurance for catastrophic insurance and "consumer choice" health insurance plans that the supplementary statement said would make the problem worse. Instead, it called for a comprehensive national health care system.

APART FROM its specific recommendations, the commission report included demographic projections for a "Portrait of America in the Eighties."

It projected "a gradual aging of the American population, starting slowly in the Eighties and reaching a peak in the early decades of the new century.

But it also foresees "a baby boom echo" that will result in a 36 percent increase in the number of pre-schoolers during the Eighties.

Seniors Press for National Health Plan

A strong resolution calling for a comprehensive national health plan was adopted by delegates to a conference on health security as a preliminary to the 1981 White House Conference on Aging.

The mini-conference on national health security, held in Washington, D. C., to prepare recommendations for the White House meeting, was sponsored jointly by the National Council of Senior Citizens and the American Association of Retired Persons/National Retired Teachers Association.

CO-SPONSORS included the AFL-CIO, the Auto Workers, the National Center on Black Aged, the Gray Panthers, the National Council on Aging and the Asociacion Nacional Pro Personas Mayores.

No specific legislation was endorsed by the 350 delegates to the one-day conference, which focused on the health care problems of the elderly. The delegates adopted a broad resolution, introduced by NCSC President Jacob Clayman, former president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The resolution called for universal coverage of individuals of all ages and income levels without deductibles, cost-sharing or co-payment requirements.

FULL COVERAGE should be provided for both acute and preventive care by hospitals and doctors, the resolution said. This should include social and medical services, health maintenance and long-term care, as well as other services not now covered by Medicare such as preventive physical and mental health services, drugs and medication, dental treatment, eye care, foot care and long-term care.

Strict health care cost controls are essential along with minimum standards of quality, the resolution urged.

Coverage of treatment at health maintenance organizations should be provided as well as other "alternative methods" of health care in addition to treatment by private physicians, the delegates agreed.

The resolution called for assumption of underwriting risks for health care plans by the federal government rather than the private sector and opposed an income test for plan participants.

Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO social security director, told the conference the federation believes the enactment of a comprehensive national health insurance program is essential to guarantee the individual's basic right of access to quality health care.

Comprehensive national health insurance could reduce administrative costs well below what is now being spent for Medicare, Medicaid and private insurance and encourage effective hospital cost containment without adversely affecting the wages of low-paid hospital workers, Seidman said.

The director of the labor-supported Committee for National Health Insurance, Mel Glasser, discussed proposals expected to become before the new Congress for a "catastrophic" health insurance program.

SUCH BILLS, Glasser observed, seem to "define 'catastrophic' in terms of the guy who makes $50,000, not the guy who makes $10,000." One bill before the Senate Finance Committee, he noted, called for consumers to pay the first $18,000 in costs "and then the insurance would pick up the rest of the charges so you wouldn't go broke."

Although that proposal was revised, the fact that such plans emphasizing high deductibles and low quality controls are seriously introduced underscores the need for continued action by retirees, workers and consumer organizations for universal health security coverage "for every man, woman and child in the United States," Glasser stressed.

Will Duncan, executive assistant to the director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, challenged the "myth about hospital costs" that blames unions and hospital workers for inflation in fees.

"HOSPITAL WORKERS still lag behind in wages compared to workers in other fields," Duncan pointed out. He laid the blame for high health care costs on opposition to national health insurance organized by the medical industry lobbies as well as "duplication, inefficiency and unnecessary hospitalization and surgery" permitted by the medical profession.

"No social issue should have higher priority than the enactment of a national health plan," Duncan urged.

Other speakers at the conference included Esther Peterson, former special assistant to the President for consumer affairs; Nelson H. Cruikshank, former White House counsellor on aging and past president of the NCSC; Dr. Victor E. Sidel, chairman of the Dept. of Social Medicine, Albert Einstein College of Medicine; Donald F. Riley, deputy director, National Council on Aging; Dr. John Hollomon, former staff adviser to the House Ways & Means health subcommittee; Tish Sommers, president, Older Women's League educational fund; Cyril F. Brickfield, executive director, AARP; and Jerome Waldie, executive director, White House Conference on Aging.

30,000 in SEIU Win Pay Boosts, Security Gains

New York—A new three-year contract providing substantial wage and job security benefits to 30,000 workers in this city's commercial buildings has been concluded between Local 32B-32J of the Service Employees and the Realty Advisory Board on Labor Relations.

Announcing the agreement, which averted a citywide strike, Local President John J. Sweeney, who also heads the SEIU, characterized negotiations as one of the most difficult in the union's 46-year history.

THE CONTRACT covers maintenance workers, security guards, porters, elevator starters and operators, and others.

Highlights include wage increases of $26 a week effective Jan. 1, 1981, an additional $27 per week increase beginning Jan. 1, 1982, and a further increase of $28 a week starting Jan. 1, 1983. An additional $2-a-week differential in each year of the contract is provided for certain job classifications.

Among benefit improvements are an increase in the maximum pension to $300 a month and a cost-of-living increase for retired members, an improved dental program, an increase in life insurance to $8,000, a maintenance drug plan, and increased contributions to the union's training and safety fund through which scholarships, job training and safety protection are provided.

Cost-of-living clauses providing adjustments effective Jan. 1, 1982, and Jan. 1, 1983, based on increases in the consumer price index, are also included.

SWEENEY SAID the union had won precedent-setting safeguards for employees who fill in for absent workers and against reduction in force, both of which have been trouble areas for the union's members in recent years.

"We are happy to have secured this contract without a strike because we have always been deeply concerned about the inconvenience suffered by New Yorkers and the hardship experienced by our members and their families when there is a work stoppage," he said.

Humphrey-Hawkins Abandoned

Economic Report Drops Full Employment Goal

the Carter projections assume a real annual GNP increase of 3.7 percent.

As one way of reaching the Humphrey-Hawkins inflation and unemployment goals, the Carter Administration suggested a tax-based incomes policy that would provide rewards for complying with voluntary wage and price guidelines.

"Broadly, we have concluded that an approach which provided a tax reduction to workers in firms whose average pay increase did not exceed some standard, set as part of a voluntary incomes policy, would be feasible and effective in helping to lower inflation," the President said in a message accompanying the CEA report. He insisted however, that such a policy should be considered only as a supplement to fiscal and monetary restraints. He added that it ought to be carried out only on a temporary basis.

"AFTER SEVERAL years, such a program might cease to be effective, and could induce significant distortions into wage relationships throughout the economy," Carter observed.

The President expressed strong reservations about a tax cut at this time.

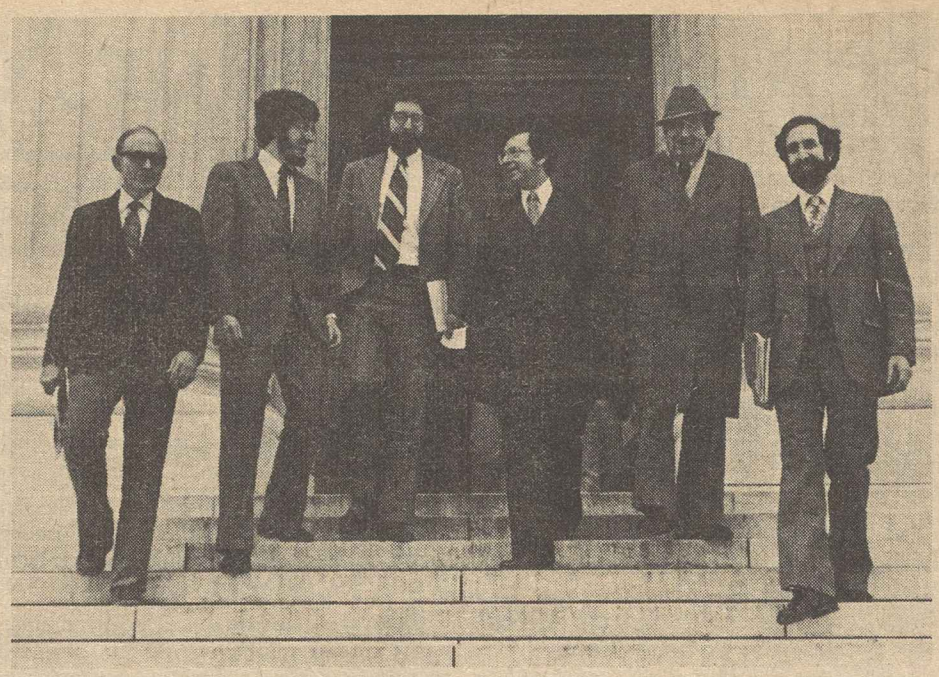
"I do not believe that we should now commit budgetary resources to large-scale personal tax cuts, which will stimulate consumption far more than investment, and thereby foreclose the possibility of meeting the nation's critical investment requirements," he said.

Separately, in his final State of the Union message to Congress, Carter said "the persistent inflationary pressures that beset our economy today dictate a restrained fiscal policy." Accordingly, he said, Congress should postpone until Jan. 1, 1982, the personal tax reductions he had earlier proposed to take effect on Jan. 1 of this year.

THERE WAS NO immediate reaction to the Carter Economic Report from the new Reagan Administration. During the election campaign, Reagan's repeated call for a sharp reduction in income taxes became the mainstay of his economic policy.

Rep. David Stockman (R-Mich.), Reagan's nominee as director of the Office of Management & Budget, seemed to question the Carter Administration's modest economic recovery projections for this year and next, however, saying that its forecast was too optimistic.

In his State of the Union message, Carter asked Congress to enact several domestic legislative proposals that he had earlier recommended. These included bills to establish a national health insurance program, overhaul the welfare system, improve medical care for children, and increase training and education programs for jobless youths.



AMONG HIS achievements over the past four years, the outgoing President listed an 11 percent rise in employment, or almost 9 million new jobs added to the nation's economy.

"Not only were jobs provided for a sharply rising population reaching working age, but job opportunities were opened up by the millions for new second earners, principally women," he said. "Neither Europe nor Japan came even close to the job performance of the American economy," Carter observed.

He cited these other gains:

- The National Accord with the AFL-CIO, giving workers a voice in the formulation of economic and domestic policies.
- An increase in the minimum wage over a four-year period from $2.30 to $3.35 an hour.
- Substantial reforms of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to help reduce unnecessary burdens on business and to focus on major job hazards.
- Defeat of attempts to weaken the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law.
- Enactment of the Mine Safety & Health Act, which brought about improved working conditions for the nation's 500,000 miners.

Carter also said that "clear progress" had been made in restoring confidence in the government's integrity, in moving toward a comprehensive national energy policy, and in pursuit of human rights around the world.

showed that "real" GNP increased at an annual rate of 5 percent during the final three months of 1980. Neither that nor the 2.4 percent rise of the third quarter was enough, however, to offset the record 9.9 percent plunge in the second quarter. The economy gained at a 3.1 percent rate in the first quarter of the year.

GNP is the dollar value of all goods and services produced in the country. Before adjustment for inflation, but after adjustment for seasonal change, GNP during the October-December period stood at $2.741 trillion, up from the third quarter's $2.637 trillion. After adjustment for inflation since 1972, "real" GNP rose to $1.490 trillion, up from the third quarter's $1.472 trillion.

WHILE THE fourth-quarter real GNP gain was the economy's strongest showing in two years, most analysts expect a slowdown in activity during the first part of 1981.

In its 1981 Economic Report to Congress, former President Carter's Council of Economic Advisers gave this growth forecast: "Overall, it is likely that real GNP will be essentially flat in the first half of the year, with a distinct possibility of one quarter of actual decline.

"After midyear, the pace of activity should pick up, although by historical standards growth will remain modest for a period of recovery."

THE CARTER prognostications will be affected, however, by the new Reagan Administration's economic moves, including planned tax reductions and government spending cuts. These would influence output and determine the direction of unemployment, now at 7.4 percent. Reagan is expected to enunciate his economic policy in the next few weeks.

The GNP figures showed that growth in the fourth quarter was due principally to continued high spending by consumers and private businesses.

Tight inventories explain much of the difference between the third- and fourth-quarter growth rates.

Final sales, adjusted for inflation since 1972, rose 3.7 percent in the fourth quarter, roughly the same as the 4.1 percent rate of gain in the third quarter. But more of those sales came out of inventories in the third period. In the October-December quarter, businesses had to increase production to meet demand.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT purchases, which decreased in the third quarter, rose a modest $2 billion in the final quarter. Business fixed investment increased $3.9 billion in constant 1972 dollars. Net exports, adjusted for inflation, declined by $4.7 billion after rising in the third quarter.

The over-the-year decline in real GNP was the first drop in economic growth since 1975, when the measure fell by 1.1 percent. In 1976, the economy grew 5.4 percent; in 1977 by 5.5 percent; in 1978 by 4.8 percent, and in 1979 by 3.2 percent.

Inflation worsened during the fourth quarter, the GNP data showed. As measured by a GNP price measure, a broadly based index known as the "deflator," inflation was at an annual rate of 11.2 percent in the October-December period, up from less than 10 percent in the previous three quarters.

Possibly a result of rising inflation, Americans managed to save less of their earnings in the last quarter of 1980. The Commerce Dept. said the U.S. personal savings rate dropped to 5.6 percent of disposable income during the fourth quarter. The rate was 6.1 percent in the third quarter, 6.2 percent in the second, and 4.9 percent in the first quarter.

Reagan Hews to Conservative Approach

initially considered a controversial Cabinet choice, was confirmed by a bipartisan 93-6 majority.

The new President hewed close to the mainstream in his reaffirmation of "support and firm commitment" to America's traditional allies. And he cautioned "potential adversaries" that Americans will "negotiate" for peace and even "sacrifice" for peace. But "we will not surrender for it—now or ever," he declared.

Reagan spoke of "equal opportunities for all Americans with no barriers born of bigotry or discrimination," of putting "all Americans back to work" and of a "new beginning" in which no groups would have to make a disproportionate sacrifice and "all must share in the bounty of a revived economy."

In one of his first actions as President, Reagan requested the resignations of Carter appointees still in office and formally ousted the inspectors general of the various departments—a move that required notification to Congress. The posts were set up as a watchdog over fraud and waste in government programs. A White House spokesman said the inspectors would be replaced by "a Reagan team."

He also directed a virtually total freeze on new government civilian hiring, tightening a partial freeze that had been imposed by former President Carter.

David A. Stockman, who will head the Office of Management & Budget, said the new Administration will seek to hold up all new federal regulations "we legally and technically can," for further review.

BY THE FIRST DAY of the Reagan Administration, all but one of the President's Cabinet appointees had been cleared by Senate committees and either had been confirmed or were expected to be confirmed by large margins.

The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee put off a scheduled vote on confirmation of Raymond J. Donovan as Secretary of Labor to allow completion of an FBI check on his activities as an executive of a New Jersey construction company.

But Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said the FBI had not found any substantiation for allegations made against Donovan, and he anticipated early approval of the nomination.

AS WAS THE case four years ago, when Democrat Jimmy Carter succeeded Republican Gerald Ford, the transition was accomplished with a minimum of abrasiveness. And President Reagan opened his inaugural address with his personal thanks to Carter for his "gracious cooperation in the transition process."

There was, of course, a unique element in this transition resulting from the round-the-clock negotiations that led to the freedom of America's hostages in Iran just moments after the inauguration. It was thus as the personal emissary of the new President that Jimmy Carter flew to greet the returnees whose freedom he was instrumental in achieving.

Labor Mourns Celler As Civil Rights Ally

Brooklyn, N.Y.—Former Congressman Emanuel Celler, who worked for the passage of numerous labor-backed measures while representing his home Brooklyn district in the House for 50 years, died of pneumonia Jan. 15. He was 92.

In a message to his daughter, Mrs. Jane Wertheimer, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland noted that "the American labor movement stood with your father as he guided enactment of civil rights laws that breached the barriers to fulfilling the nation's commitment to liberty and justice for all. We admired his passionate defense of our economic system against those who would monopolize various sectors of that system."

Modest Gains Recorded in State Legislatures

By Susan Dunlop

Labor scored modest gains in most of the 44 state legislatures that met last year, suffered a few setbacks, and successfully resisted a number of attempts to roll back past achievements.

State legislatures and comparable bodies in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico acted on minimum wages, collective bargaining, labor standards and workers' compensation laws, among others.

A LABOR DEPT. survey and reports from AFL-CIO state central bodies also note legislative interest in such matters as sex harassment on the job, restrictions on the use of "lie detectors" to screen employees, and proposals to bar state contracts to companies that violate national labor law. But in many cases, the legislative action did not go beyond committee hearings.

LABOR'S CENTENNIAL AFL-CIO 1881-1981

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, January 31, 1981 No. 5

Union-supported efforts to get ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution failed in Illinois and Virginia, leaving the tally still three short of the 38 states needed.

Minimum wage rates were increased in five jurisdictions in 1980—California, the District of Columbia, Oklahoma, Virginia and West Virginia, the Labor Dept. said. The actual number of increases was greater since 21 jurisdictions raised their minimums based on prior action.

Fifteen states now have a minimum wage of $3.10 an hour, and 13 will match the federal minimum increase of $3.35 an hour which took effect Jan. 1, 1981. Only Alaska, Connecticut, and certain industries in the District of Columbia post minimums higher than the federal rate, the Labor Dept. reported.

New protections were adopted in Nebraska and Wisconsin to sharply curtail the use of so-called "lie detectors" or similar "truth test" equipment in hiring.

THE NEBRASKA law requires licensing of polygraph operators and forbids use of the tests as a mandatory condition of employment, except in the case of law enforcement officers.

The Wisconsin statute requires written consent to the tests following notice that submission to the examination is voluntary.

Both laws expressly forbid asking ques-

1980 Buying Power Down 4.8%

TRADE UNIONISTS and staff members of the AFL-CIO and Washington-based unions were among the nearly half-million persons welcoming the 52 liberated Americans who had been held hostage in Iran. Buildings decked with yellow ribbons, like the massive one strung up at the AFL-CIO headquarters (inset), helped mark the welcome. The returnees were also greeted by a giant American flag, the size of two football fields, that 100 volunteer Iron Workers spread out at Andrews Air Force Base before the motorcade of buses brought them to the nation's capital.

Real Wages Cut Deeply By Inflation

By James M. Shevis

Inflation raged through the economy at a double-digit rate in 1980 for the second straight year, causing workers' purchasing power to plummet 4.8 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The 12.5 percent jump in the government's consumer price index last year was an improvement over 1979's rate of 13.4 percent, but was still the second-worst inflation rate for the nation since 1946. Not since 1918-19 had the inflation rate exceeded 10 percent for two years in a row.

THE HUGE RISE in consumer prices, coupled with higher taxes, combined to bring about the reduction in workers' real spendable pay, or purchasing power. Real spendable earnings are take-home pay adjusted for the impact of inflation. The 4.8 percent drop last year compared with a 5.3 decline in 1979.

The average earnings of all non-supervisory workers in private, non-farm jobs were $246.03 a week in current dollars at the end of 1980, up $17.91 from the December 1979 average. Adjusted for inflation, and expressed in terms of 1967 dollars, however, the average worker's real weekly pay was $94.85—a decrease of $4.03 from a year earlier.

While inflation and recession eroded weekly earnings by $4.03, higher taxes—both social security and income taxes on the higher weekly pay—reduced earnings by 38 cents a week, assuming the tax burden borne by a worker with three sependents.

'80 Settlements Boost Pay 9.5% In First Year

Major contract settlements in 1980 provided union workers with wage increases averaging 9.5 percent in the first year, up from 7.4 percent in 1979, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Averaged over the life of the contracts, the pay boosts came to 7.1 percent a year, again higher than the 6 percent average for settlements negotiated in 1979.

The figures do not include estimates of potential wage increases under cost-of-living clauses. As in the past, 1980 settlements which contained COL provisions tended to be smaller than for contracts without such clauses.

FIRST-YEAR increases in agreements without COL clauses averaged 11.8 percent, up from 9.1 percent in 1979. This compares with 8 percent for contracts with COL adjustments, up from 6.2 percent in 1979.

Averaged over the life of the contracts, the annual rates in 1980 were 5 percent for pacts with COL clauses and 10.4 percent for those without; the comparable rates of increase in 1979 were 4.6 and 8 percent.

The report for 1980 covered 3,720,000 workers in 793 private bargaining units of 1,000 workers or more—the Labor Dept.'s definition of a major agreement. About 61 percent of the workers covered by these

Kirkland Pledges Drive To Fund Key Programs

Blacks and other minorities that suffer disproportionately from poverty and discrimination would also be the chief victim of federal budget slashes, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged.

Kirkland told the executive board of the A. Philip Randolph Institute that the labor and civil rights coalition which worked together for social justice must now do battle to assure adequate funding for programs to carry out these goals.

A COMMITMENT to equality goes beyond the basic civil rights statutes, Kirkland stressed.

Thus, aid to education, maternal health and child nutrition programs are needed "because those who are behind at the start of life frequently never catch up," he said.

Kirkland noted also that "a greater percentage of those who cannot afford decent housing are black or brown," health disparities exist and "minority Americans are standing in unemployment lines at twice the rate of white Americans."

MANY OF THOSE who now demand "a reduced federal role" have themselves prospered from various forms of government subsidies, Kirkland said. And attacks on government programs as "wasteful" or "inefficient," he said, ignore the much greater inefficiency of unemployment.

Kirkland made the distinction between accepting gracefully a political defeat and acquiescing in a rollback of past gains.

Both the trade union movement and the black community sought a different election outcome, Kirkland noted. "Yet we all accept the result in good spirit, as a testament of our system and to the ulti-

Talks with Japan Proposed To Resolve Trade Issues

Tokyo—Frank discussions and good-faith negotiations over trade policies are needed to lessen friction between the United States and Japan, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

Such talks, he suggested in a speech to the Japan Institute of Labor, should involve unions and management in the private sectors as well as the two governments. The institute is a prestigious research group established by the Japanese government to foster a better understanding of industrial relations.

KIRKLAND VOICED U.S. labor's deep concern over the future of automobile production and other import-damaged industries.

A healthy auto industry is "vital" to the American economy, Kirkland stressed, noting that more than one million jobs in all parts of the United States were lost as a result of auto imports, higher interest rates and the general economic recession. While imports were not the only cause of the auto-related job losses, they were "a principal cause" that cannot be ignored, he said.

Kirkland cited the many ways in which other industrial nations assure a viable automobile industry, including requirements that automobiles sold in the country include a high degree of "domestic content"—parts manufactured within the country.

THE AFL-CIO supports the position of the Auto Workers for such a domestic content requirement in the United States,

SOCIAL AND HUMAN IMPACT on white-collar workers resulting from technological changes in working conditions was explored at a 10-day conference at the International Labor Organization in Geneva. U.S. worker delegates included Thomas G. Whaley, left, executive vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers, Director Jack Golodner of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees and UFCW International Affairs Director Gerard O'Keefe, who served the delegation as an adviser.

ILO Group Maps Program To Ease Technology's Impact

Geneva—A blueprint for national and international action to moderate the impact on white-collar workers from the introduction of new technology at their work places was charted at a 10-day conference of the International Labor Organization.

More than 200 trade union, employer and government delegates attended the 26-nation session of the ILO's committee on salaried employees and professional workers.

THOMAS G. WHALEY, executive vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers, said he was "very pleased" because the problems of white-collar workers, including those of special concern to women, were the "subject of nearly two full weeks of discussion in an international forum."

Jack Golodner, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, stressed in reviewing the session's work that it had been "vitally important for workers and their representatives from all over the world to have had the opportunity to meet and discuss their problems together."

The two AFL-CIO delegates were reinforced by Gerard O'Keefe, international affairs director of the UFCW, as an adviser. Whaley served as a conference vice chairman and sat on the steering committee.

IN THE AGREED conclusions, which will go to the ILO governing body for follow-up action, the employer and government delegates joined the trade unionists in urging that no decision to introduce technological changes be taken without having considered their "social and human" impact on the workers.

Workers and their representatives, should have a voice in any contemplated structural or technological changes affecting working conditions so as to "mitigate any harmful effects" for them, the conference recommended.

Employers, it was agreed, should attempt to provide job security for their workers by helping them gain the skills needed to fill the new jobs resulting from technological innovations.

AMONG THE conclusions were a series of measures aimed at avoiding such job hazards as eye strain or excessive fatigue resulting from the use of visual display units, electronic cash registers and the like.

On the special problems of women, the conference said concerted action is needed to guarantee equal employment opportunities by such measures as barring any suggestion of sex in job advertisements.

"Broad-based" vocational training programs should be provided for women to equip them with the skills needed to adapt to technological change, one conclusion urged.

"INCREASED opportunities" for advanced training was likewise recommended as a way to raise the proportionately lower number of women now holding managerial level jobs.

Whaley expressed disappointment at the weakness of a conclusion calling for an unspecified "variety of measures" to provide husband and wife "with a choice for an equal sharing of responsibilities and to make it possible for both men and women to reconcile family and work life."

Workers proposals for more concrete recommendations were diluted at the insistance of employer and government delegates in tough negotiations over the issues.

Graphic Arts Union Wins 5-Year Organizing Drive

Senatobia, Miss.—After five years of organizing campaigns, workers at W. A. Krueger Co.'s publishing plant here voted for representation by the Graphic Arts International Union.

The 115 to 102 vote "reflects some change in attitudes in the South," GAIU Local 527 President Anthony L. Moore said. He pointed out that the organizing victory was all the more significant in a state with a so-called right-to-work law.

When the Senatobia campaign began in 1976, the city had an ordinance requiring union organizers to pay a $1,000 license fee and be local residents for at least six months. The statute was scrapped after the union challenged its constitutionality in court.

Donahue Cites 'Fast Response'

Adjustment to Change Marks Labor Policies

New York—The labor movement has watched administrations come and go for 100 years and has survived because of its confidence in its ideas and its ability to adjust quickly to change, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said at a meeting of lawyers here.

It is too early to develop strategies for dealing with the new Administration, Donahue told the labor law section of the New York State Bar Association, since little has been heard yet from those who speak in an offical capacity.

"WE ARE NOT afraid of adjusting tactics or assuming new strategies," Donahue said. "We have supported administrations; we have opposed administrations. We have remained an independent, free trade union movement. We have faced worse line-ups in Congress, and we have endured."

He said organized labor movement has served its members well through the years because of "the rapidity with which trade union ideas percolate up from the lowest rungs as a result of our democratic structure." The trade union movement's "fast response" to new ideas has outstripped that of other institutions, he observed.

Because change is constant and normal in the labor movement, it is sometimes overlooked, and many changes are going on now that will define the trends in labor "come what may from the Administration," Donahue emphasized.

HE CITED the increasing role of women workers in union leadership and policy-making as one major trend.

"As significant as the election of Joyce Miller to the AFL-CIO Executive Council is, it has tended to obscure the fact that throughout the labor movement from shop committees to local unions to international unions women are assuming leadership positions; women are becoming organizers; women are aggressively asserting the interests and needs of women workers," Donahue said.

Miller, a vice president of the Clothing Workers, was elected to the Executive Council at its August 1980 meeting.

THE LABOR movement also is devoting more of its resources to help women workers achieve contractual, legislative and legal gains, Donahue said. And, he stressed, whether or not the new Administration assumes an activist role in wiping out economic and physical discrimination in the workplace or ignores the issue, "one fact is clear: it will not go away."

On the organizing front, Donahue said the AFL-CIO has improved its structure to help workers who want to join or form unions through the establishment of a national organizing coordinating committee and the use of the federation's field staff.

The AFL-CIO's role in organizing, he pointed out, is to "serve as the resource and active partner" for the organizing efforts of affiliates. He predicted that cooperative organizing activities will pose a greater challenge to union-busters.

THE ROLE OF the AFL-CIO's state and local central bodies also is being reexamined and strengthened, Donahue told the lawyers' conference. He noted that a spring series of regional conferences will air the ideas and needs of the central bodies and seek to expand and strengthen their efforts in building grass roots support for labor's legislative agenda.

Donahue said the trade union movement will also be forging closer ties with other organizations with allied interests, including community-based groups.

In 1980, he noted, the AFL-CIO was the central organizing force behind the Budget Coalition of more than 150 organizations opposed to the concept of balancing the federal budget by cutting programs that help "the weakest in our society."

"THIS COALITION will 'humanize' the battle over the federal budget," Donahue said. "We will translate the percentages into people, the dollars into jobs, the numbers into human terms."

On labor's political activity, Donahue reported that the AFL-CIO Executive Council will begin discussions on "the ways and means by which those unions which have been active in national political party affairs can cooperate more closely and achieve a higher degree of agreement on party leadership, party rules and possibly, in the future, on primary candidates."

Other trends in labor, Donahue said, include a growing interest in mergers as a way of strengthening and improving unions' services to their members. He noted that the labor movement is also beginning to use the latest developments in communications technology, particularly in its political activity.

In international affairs, the strengthening of ties with labor organizations around the world is a major objective of the AFL-CIO and many of its affiliates, Donahue stressed, noting that such cooperation is "absolutely necessary for a labor movement moving in the world of multinational corporations."

"The password of the American labor movement is change," Donahue concluded, "and individually and collectively each of these actions will strengthen the ability of the labor movement to respond to whatever 'trends' develop from this or future administrations."

SEX BIAS SETTLEMENT that the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers won from General Electric Co. is reviewed by members and officers of IUE Local 623 in Pittsburgh. The settlement, which ends a nine-year battle at a Pittsburgh GE repair plant, provides $176,250 in back pay as well as retroactive seniority and pension credits for 18 women workers. Local 623 President Sam Lawrence, seated second from left, is joined by shop stewards and some of the beneficiaries.

Unions Back OSHA Standard

Court Asked to Affirm Controls on Cotton Dust

By John R. Oravec

The Supreme Court was urged by organized labor to keep intact key provisions of the federal cotton dust standard to help protect more than 200,000 textile industry workers against disability from brown lung disease.

Employer groups are pressing the court to invalidate sections of the OSHA regulation to avoid installation of engineering controls that would greatly reduce worker exposure to cotton dust.

BUT THE prime issue in the cotton dust case is whether the law requires the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to conduct a cost-benefit analysis in the development of any standards.

The industry contends that the cost of installing cotton dust engineering controls by Mar. 27, 1984, would outweigh the safeguards for workers. Employers insist that the same protections can be achieved through the use of respirators, which already are required.

OSHA issued the cotton dust standard in 1978, and a federal appeals court upheld it last year in rejecting an industry challenge. The American Textile Manufacturers Institute and the National Cotton Council appealed the decision to the Supreme Court.

THE AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept. and the Clothing & Textile Workers are intervenors on the side of OSHA.

In delivering oral arguments before the court on behalf of labor, Attorney George H. Cohen said that in enacting the 1970

Cohen stressed that the wording of the law is clear in directing OSHA to develop standards that are as "effective as possible," and that it was the intent of Congress not to compromise the health protections of workers with a cost-benefit assessment.

OSHA ESTIMATES that it will cost industry $550 million to comply with the standard, which provides for separate exposure limits in various segments of the cotton processing and textile industry. Employers claim compliance costs would run five times more than OSHA's estimate.

Over an eight-hour workday, the standard limits exposure to 200 micrograms of respirable cotton dust per cubic meter of air in yarn manufacturing, 500 micrograms in textile production, and 750 micrograms in slashing and weaving.

Labor's brief points out that employers are not challenging the technological feasibility of the engineering controls, and since large segments of the industry are already in compliance with permissible exposure levels, the cost impact of the regulation is eased.

ACCORDING TO an industry survey, about 75 percent of the spinning operations are at or below the 200-microgram limit and 88 percent of the weaving operations are at or below the 750-microgram level.

In arguing the case for industry, Attorney Robert H. Bork contended that the standard is "extraordinarily severe and costly."

But Cohen noted that a section of the job safety law provides for economic assistance for small businesses that lack the capital to meet full compliance.

Justice Dept. Attorney Kenneth Geller strongly disputed industry's attempt to characterize byssinosis, or brown lung, as "no more dangerous than a common cold."

GELLER NOTED that OSHA issued the standard because of evidence that worker exposure to high levels of cotton dust poses "a substantial health risk." Under higher exposure levels, 26 percent of workers risk contracting brown lung, but that risk would be cut in half by the new standard, he said.

ACTWU Executive Vice President Sol Stetin branded industry's attempt to block the standard as "heartless." He said some 150,000 workers are afflicted by brown lung disease—"including 35,000 who are totally and permanently disabled."

Humanities Seminars Offered for Unionists

Union officers and staff members are eligible to attend six seminars being sponsored in 1981 by the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Five of the month-long programs, open to labor officials along with members of other professions, will focus on conflicts between individual values and professional responsibilities, competing rights claims in contemporary society and American popular culture. A sixth program, open only to union officers and staff.

The tuition-free seminars are limited to 12-15 persons. A job safety law, Congress did not intend to require OSHA to perform a cost-benefit analysis before issuing a standard.

Information on dates and locations and application forms are available from the Professions Program, Div. of Fellowships & Seminars, MS-101, National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington, D.C.

NATIONAL LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE drew 1,300 representatives of the State, County & Municipal Employees to Washington for three days of discussions on a wide range of economic and political issues. Here, AFSCME President Jerry Wurf delivers the keynote address.

Ruben Levin Dies at 78, Dean of Labor Journalists

Ruben Levin, 78, editor and manager of Labor newspaper, died Jan. 29 of congestive heart failure at Bethesda Suburban Hospital, just outside Washington. He had been in failing health for several months.

Levin, whose newspaper career spanned over half a century, was regarded by his colleagues in the labor press as the dean of labor union editors. He served his own publication, Labor, for more than 42 years. He received many awards and honors over the years, including the Eugene V. Debs award in 1975.

IN A MESSAGE of condolence to Mrs. Levin, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said that Levin "personified America's labor press." They noted that he had been "a friend, guide and teacher to scores of young journalists."

Kirkland and Donahue observed that Levin's contribution to the trade union movement went "far beyond journalism."

"In a thousand battles for human rights and justice," they said, "he was a frontline activist whose example and leadership many times made the difference between defeat and victory."

Levin, who was born in Poland Aug. 2, 1902, came to the United States as a boy of two. His family settled first in Manitowoc. Wis., then moved to Milwaukee.

IN 1924, as a student at the University of Wisconsin in Madison, he worked part-time as a reporter on the Capitol Times, then a crusading daily in the La Follette Progressive tradition. He later worked for three Milwaukee daily newspapers, then spent the next three years as a "boomer" news reporter working for 11 other papers, including the Winnipeg Tribune in Canada and the European edition of the New York Herald Tribune in Paris.

Levin joined Labor, a national newspaper published by 14 major unions in the railway, airline, and related transport fields, in 1938 to start a distinguished career in the labor movement. Editor and manager of the paper since 1953, he helped build it into the largest labor publication of its kind. He received a score of awards, including a special recognition from the International Labor Press Association.

PRESIDENT FRED J. Kroll of the Railway & Airline Clerks, who chairs the Railway Labor Executives Association, said that under Levin's editorship, Labor was "unswerving in its loyalty to the best interests of the railroad brotherhoods and our democratic form of government."

Levin also helped to found Labor Press Associates, a cooperative news service for union publications, the forerunner of today's Press Associates, Inc.

In 1956, he received the Sidney Hillman Foundation Award for a series of articles on the emasculation of federal regulatory agencies. In 1965, the University of Wisconsin's School of Journalism honored him for "distinguished service to the profession of journalism."

LEVIN WAS a regular contributor to a number of magazines. He was a member of the Newspaper Guild, and a member and past president of the Association of Railroad Editors.

Survivors include his wife Bertha of Chevy Chase, Md., two children, David of Hong Kong and Jonathan of Richmond, Va., and two grandchildren. The family suggests that expressions of sympathy be in the form of contributions to Temple Sinai, 3100 Military Road, N.W., Washington, D.C., or to a charity of choice. Services were scheduled to be held at Temple Sinai at 1 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 2.

Conservative Heads Key Senate Panel

One of the most conservative of the new Republican senators, Don Nickles of Oklahoma, has been named chairman of a Senate Labor & Human Resources subcommittee that has jurisdiction over legislation most directly affecting the trade union movement.

Nickles will head the Subcommittee on Labor, which will have a 6-4 ratio in favor of the Republicans.

AT 32, Nickles is the youngest senator. He is a machinery company executive whose only previous political office was a single term in the Oklahoma legislature. A Congressional Quarterly magazine profile credits his election to active support from the Moral Majority organization and terms him "at the conservative end of a conservative group of Republican newcomers."

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), chairman of the full committee, will also serve on the panel. The other subcommittee Republicans will be John P. East (N.C.), another freshman right-winger; two-term moderate Robert T. Stafford (Vt.); freshman Dan Quayle (Ind.), who was a mainstream Republican in the House, and Paula Hawkins (Fla.), also a first-timer, who has called for abolition of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration but also campaigned as a consumer watchdog.

The subcommittee Democrats, all multi-term veterans, are Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (N.J.), Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Jennings Randolph (W.Va.) and Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (Mich.),

Republicans have a 9-7 majority on the full committee, with moderates Stafford and Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (Conn.) as the potential swing votes. The Labor subcommittee is the only one on which the GOP has more than a one-vote edge.

Stafford heads the Education subcommittee, with Claiborne Pell (R.I.) as the ranking Democrat. Quayle is chairman of the Employment & Productivity subcommittee, with Howard M. Metzenbaum (Ohio) as senior Democrat.

Another freshman, Jeremiah Denton (Ala.) will head the Subcommittee on Aging, Family & Human Services, with Sen. Thomas Eagleton (Mo.) as ranking Democrat. Hawkins will head the Investigation & General Oversight subcommittee, with Kennedy for the minority; Weicker will chair the Handicapped subcommittee with Randolph as senior Democrat, and the Subcommittee on Alcoholism will be headed by Gordon J. Humphrey (N.H.), with Riegle as senior Democrat.

The House, meanwhile, completed the assignment of members to committees and rejected—by a straight party vote—a new Republican attempt to obtain greater representation on the Ways & Means Committee.

This is the most important committee in terms of the Reagan Administration's tax proposals and other major ingredients of its economic program. With that clearly is mind, the Democratic leadership set the party ratio at 23-12, just barely under the 24-12 majority in the last Congress despite Republican election gains.

IN EFFECT, the heavy Democratic tilt offsets the likelihood that several conservative Democrats on the committee will vote with the Republican minority on controversial issues.

House Minority Leader Robert H. Michel (Ill.) protested that the 23-12 ratio "makts a mockery of representative government" since Republicans make up 44 percent of the House.

But the GOP attempt to add two Republican seats to the committee was defeated on a straight party vote.

The Budget Target

A COMMITMENT TO equality requires more than statutes. It requires the opportunity for each individual to enjoy the full measure of that equality.

That philosophy and the federal programs enacted to carry it out are under attack. The battleground this year—as it was last year—is the federal budget, because that document defines the relationship of government to its citizens who are most in need of help to reach the ladder, much less to climb it.

The federal budget has always been a target of convenience for opponents of social progress. It provides an opportunity for indirect attack, for denying the fullest measure of equality to all Americans without opposing equality per se. That way, a supposedly color-blind system—in this case, so-called free market economics—supplants the more repugnant selection system based on skin color.

WE ARE NOT deceived. A greater percentage of those who cannot afford decent housing are black or brown; minority Americans are standing in unemployment lines at twice the rate of white Americans; there is a wide disparity in all measures of health between blacks and whites.

Economic discrimination, whether we like it or not, has racial overtones because of past failures. And to ignore those factors is to perpetuate the discrimination.

It is one thing to open the doors of opportunity to all, and quite another to open the doors to only those who can afford the price of admission.

THAT IS WHY the labor movement and the A. Philip Randolph Institute, in fidelity to our commitment to equality and social justice, must join the battle over the federal budget to assure adequate funding for those programs that provide opportunity and protection for those who have neither.

And we know full well from whence come the arguments for a reduced federal role in providing opportunity and protection.

It comes from quarters and groups that have themselves prospered in many ways from the role and largess of government and from circumstances held in place by government.

There is a certain measure of hypocrisy in the contention of those who, in opposing federal programs essential to a fair chance in life for the weak and underprivileged, say "look how well we have done on our own, so others should not rely on the federal government to help them get ahead."

TO THOSE WHO claim such programs are "wasteful" and "inefficient," we must affirm their real value, not just to the human beings affected but to our human society at large, and underscore the clear fact that unemployment is the most inefficient of all.

In short, our job did not end with the election. We do not intend to slumber through the next two or four years, hoping to awake to the dawn of a new day. Our job is just beginning, and we draw both strength and hope from our shared experiences—both successful and incomplete—of the past.

Perversion of Purpose

Tax-Exempt Municipal Bonds Underwriting Private Profits

By Gus Tyler

A STRATEGY to help towns and cities with their finances is being perverted into a scheme to enrich industrial and commercial corporations at the expense of the federal Treasury. What looked like a pretty good idea is turning into a very bad practice.

Many years ago, Congress passed a law allowing local governments to issue tax-free bonds. The concept was cozy:

Towns and cities saved money because the interest charges on the municipal bonds were low. Despite the low interest rate, investors grabbed them up because the income from interest was tax-free.

UNCLE SAM was the loser—but he didn't mind. Washington lost income it would otherwise have derived from the return to investors in these bonds. But Papa on the Potomac didn't mind because he was helping out his family of local governments across the land. In effect, the Capital was subsidizing towns and cities that needed the help badly.

The only serious objection to this strategy was the argument that these municipal bonds were bought up almost exclusively by people in the upper-income brackets, people in the 50-percent or over tax brackets. Consequently, an investor drawing his income solely from such bonds could have an income of $1 million a year, yet pay not a single cent in taxes to the federal government.

But that objection is trivial compared with a current practice that uses the tax-free device not to help out the "public" sector but to give away scarce federal dollars to enrich "private" companies.

Originally, these were called "industrial development" bonds, issued to companies that were setting up factories. The rationale was that the tax-free bond would encourage the firm to locate plants in a given area.

ONCE IMPLANTED the seed began to grow. Now tax-free bonds are being issued for "commercial development," for such operations as bars and grills, hamburger stands, bowling alleys, mass-mailing outfits, dentists' offices, bank branches, and for hundreds of other ventures intended to produce profits to private entrepreneurs.

Originally, Congress limited the size of the enterprise to $5 million; then it extended the limits to $10 million. But the limits are limitless for a national corporation that gets tax-free bonds to set up a local subsidiary, as McDonald's did in Elmore County, Ala., for instance.

IN 1979, the total for these tax-free bonds for private companies ran to $7 billion; this was twice the sum for such bonds the previous year.

Again, Uncle Sam is the loser—as he has been all along on the municipal bonds. But there is a difference. In the past, Uncle was subsidizing his family of local governments to make it necessary for them to levy higher taxes on their citizens: Uncle was acting in the "public" interest. But now, on the rapid increase, Uncle Sam is subsidizing "private" enterprises at a time when the Reagan Administration is talking about cutting taxes and balancing the budget.

'Change' a Password Of Labor Movement

Throughout its history, the labor movement has consistently served its members well because of the rapidity with which trade union ideas percolate up from the lowest rungs as a result of our democratic structure. In its policies and programs, the labor movement has always been a "fast response" organization, far outstripping government and those who occupy ivory towers in drawing on new ideas.

Because the trade union movement will always retain this feature of democracy and willingly entertains suggestions and resolutions developed as part of this process, we will never be hidebound in ideas.

The password of the American labor movement is "change." Change in the labor movement is the only trend we perceive as lasting longer than a fad; after all, it has lasted 100 years and is headed for another 100.

Legal or Not, Gambling Odds Virtually Impossible to Beat

By Esther Margolius

GAMBLING not only has become a major form of recreation for many Americans but a source of revenue for many states. New York recently started its own numbers game, challenging the illegal numbers racket.

Some national surveys now claim that over 80 percent of the public approves of gambling, and some even consider gambling as a right. For example, recently a Newark, N.J., citizens group petitioned City Hall not to close down a numbers operation in their area. They claimed to do so was interference with a business enterprise of minorities. Yet numbers remain an illegal form of gambling known to be under the control of crime syndicates.

There was a time when gambling and so much money openly credited to gambling receipts would evoke a public outcry. But today, voices are muted as state after state looks for new sources of revenue. Currently, 15 states sponsor lotteries, and one or another form of gambling is legal in 44 states and the territory of Puerto Rico.

CASINO REVENUES alone tell of incredibly high gross wins. For example, the June gross take in New Jersey, as reported by the state's Casino Control Commission, was $51.1 million. This represented receipts from only three casinos in one city.

What the news stories gloss over, however, is that without players to lose, there would not be any receipts. Despite the implications that "high rollers" contribute heavily to a casino's take, the realities are that the biggest supporters of casino gambling are the "little spenders" who come, usually as bus riders, on one-day excursions.

In fact, so essential are the "day-trippers" to Atlantic City casinos that all now vie with each other to arrange for charter travel tours. And a soon-to-open casino, the Golden Nugget, is presently working on plans to set up its own bus company. The number of day-trippers was expected to exceed 3 million by the end of 1980.

SLOT MACHINES account for close to half of the casinos' gross take. Forty-three to 53 percent of the June gross were attributed to slot machines. In dollar terms, this means that the $15 bus excursion riders in June alone lost between $22.1 million and $27.3 million.

Yet, according to calculations made by noted gambling authority John Scarne, gross win or gross receipts tell only part of the story. In Scarne's recently published book, "Guide to Casino Gambling," he asserts that gross revenues in Nevada casinos represented but a mere 4 percent of the total "betting handle." He describes "betting handle" as the total amount of monies handled—bet, won, replayed and lost.

Although Nevada claims a bigger payout than Atlantic City, applying Scarne's figure of 4 percent to the $51.5 million Atlantic City gross would project a "betting handle" of almost $1.3 billion.

In Scarne's Guide, he states: "Craps is the most widely played game of chance played in the United States today. More money is won or lost at craps legally and illegally each day than any other form of gambling with the exception of sports and horse betting."

He also writes: "There are more than 40 million craps players in America, 5 million of whom are women, and most of them will accept any sucker bet offered them by craps hustlers.

"A CRAPS hustler is half gambler and half cheat. The consistent right bettor, or 'chump,' must lose in the long run, because the odds are stacked against him. Thousands of craps hustlers in the country work in industrial plants and hustle craps games at noon. I knew one hustler who won $20,000 in numbers from his fellow workers during one year of lunch hour craps shootings."

Blackjack, or 21, is the most widely played casino game in the world. When a player fully understands the dealer's advantage, he should be able to keep that advantage to 5.9 percent and perhaps reduce it to 3 percent, according to Scarne.

In betting through off-track bookies, the odds against you are even greater since bookies limit the payoff. They may pay, at the most, 20 to 1 on a winner even though the odds at the track are much greater, even 100 to 1.

On OTB, Scarne says, "my OTB survey revealed that the OTB made thousands of new horse bettors in New York and adjoining states. And many of these new horse bettors have left the OTB shops and are now betting with illegal horse bookies who, in time of need, will give them credit and a better percentage break by not having to pay OTB's additional 5 percent tax."

THE KEY FACT to remember is that in any professionally operated gambling, legal or illegal, it is impossible to beat the odds. Even if you temporarily enjoy a run of luck, eventually you must lose. In all professional gambling games, the odds are tilted against you so that you never have an even chance. In fact, the smaller the bets, and the poorer the gambler, the worse the odds.

It is claimed that legalization of gambling can produce revenue for schools and hospitals. If this happens, it actually will be a tax upon the poor even more regressive than the sales tax.

After 4-Year Advance

Conservative Tilt Dims Outlook For Federal Job Safety Efforts

AFTER FOUR YEARS of steady progress, federal programs to protect the safety and health of workers face new problems from a more conservative White House and Congress, AFL-CIO Occupational Safety & Health Director George H. R. Taylor said.

Taylor credited the leadership of Labor Sec. Ray Marshall and Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham with converting OSHA from a "quiet and largely non-producing" program to an "active and effective advocate" of on-the-job health and safety.

He cited two major accomplishments: the right of workers to know the hazards of toxic substances they work with and the effect of those substances on their health, and creation of the New Directions Training & Education Program, which has enabled unions, colleges and employers to develop efforts to deal with hazards in the workplace.

QUESTIONED BY reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Taylor said that as a direct result of aggressive leadership, "workers began to feel that this (OSHA) is their program."

Taylor said that while it is too soon to pinpoint the exact problems that OSHA is likely to encounter in the next four years, progress will be more difficult than in recent years. He noted that congressional support fell off in the last Congress, largely as a reaction to "a continuous avalanche of letters from business interests alleging real or fancied harms."

Reporters questioning Taylor were Jean White of Press Associates, Inc., and Doug Harbrecht of the Pittsburgh Press. Labor News Conference is a public service production of the AFL-CIO and is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE LIFE EXPERIENCES of older workers have been undergoing marked changes over the past quarter century, a phenomenon little noticed in the popular press.

A study on older workers recently released by the Dept. of Health & Human Services shows a sharp drop in labor force participation by men 65 and older and a strong growth in job-seeking by pre-elderly women, those in the 55-64 bracket.

Social security improvements have figured importantly in enabling people to live decent lives and even to consider retiring earlier. Private pensions, disability insurance programs and higher earnings also enable many to retire early.

But health problems still force many to retire early and keep others from seeking work.

Following are some highlights from the government's report on "The Older Worker."

TRENDS IN labor force participation for men and women over the last several decades are decidedly different. Elderly men have withdrawn steadily from the labor force during this period. Only 20 percent of men 65 years old and older were in the labor force in 1979, compared to 46 percent in 1950.

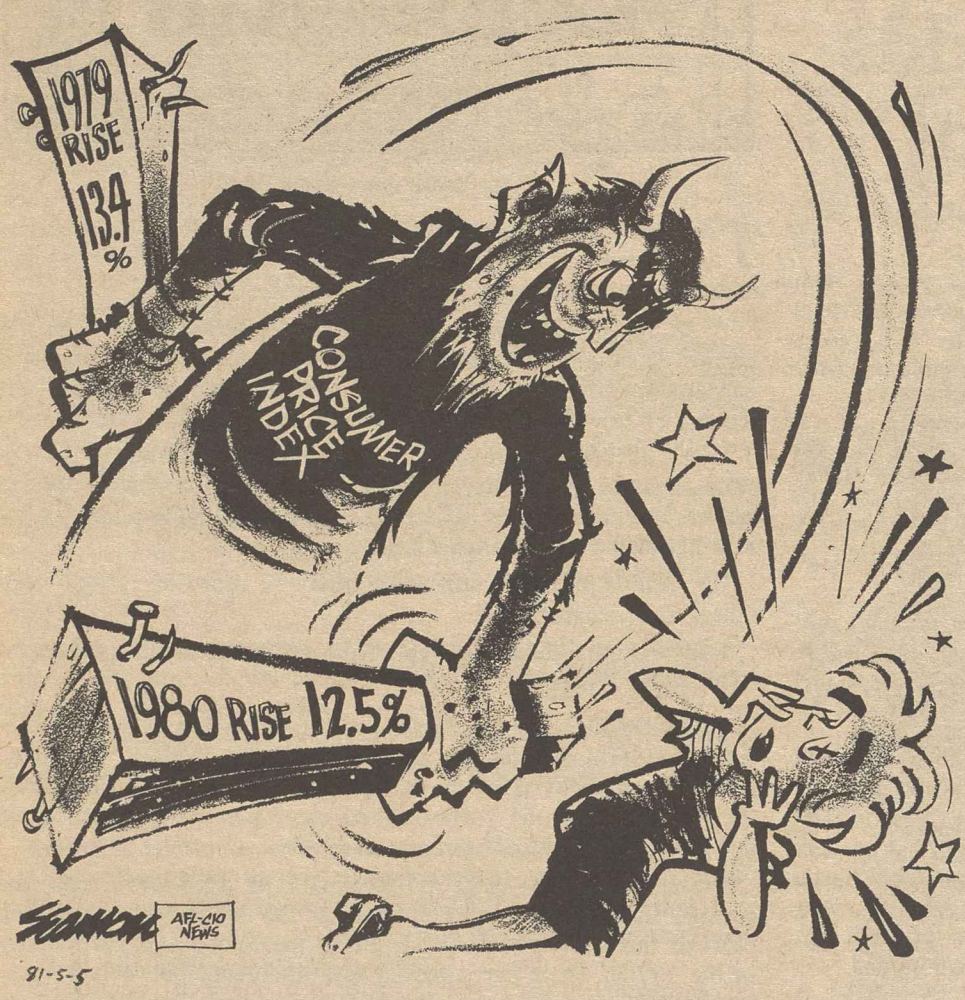
Pre-elderly men—those 55-64 years of age—have also decreased their level of participation in the labor force, although most of this decrease occurred during the 1960s and particularly in the 1970s. Their participation rate fluctuated between 87 percent and 89 percent during the 1950s, declined slowly to 83 percent during the 1960s, and fell more rapidly to 73 percent during the 1970s.

Pre-elderly women, on the other hand, have been participating in the labor force at an increasing rate. Their rate rose from 27 percent in 1950 to 43 percent in 1969, and leveled off around the 41 percent mark since 1975. In 1979, it stood at 42 percent. The labor force participation of elderly women has been low and fairly constant during this period, dropping to 8 percent in 1974.

THE DECISION to retire is a complex one. It can be influenced by many factors, including involuntary ones such as compulsory retirement policies, plant closings, or work force lay-offs, and voluntary reasons such as dissatisfaction with job, poor health, family or personal reasons, or a simple desire to stop working.

The proportion of workers who retired before reaching the age of 65 has risen considerably since 1962, the first full year of operation of the early retirement provisions for both sexes under the amendments of the Social Security Act. Evidence from several studies indicates that health problems represent a major factor in the retirement decision.

The vast majority of older persons who are not in the labor force do not indicate a desire to work. About 30 percent cited poor health and another 28 percent did not think they could get a job for a variety of personal or job-market factors.



THE FUTURE employment picture for older workers is difficult to predict. In the aggregate, the older population will certainly be more numerous, particularly after the turn of the century when the "baby boom" generation reaches the upper ages. Persons entering the ranks of the older population in future years will be better educated and will have worked at higher-paying occupations in industries that were not even born when today's elderly were in their working years. Older workers today have opted for early retirement, and this trend may well continue.

Opposed to these trends will be such forces as the lack of younger workers to adequately support the social security system, as well as smaller family networks to provide emotional and economic support to retired persons, if the low birth rates of the last few years continue. The scarcity and high price of non-renewable energy sources may continue to drive the cost of living up at the expense of many older persons who do not work and must rely on relatively fixed income. These factors and others may force more older people to stay in the labor force longer.

FOUR YEARS of progress in federal programs to protect the safety and health of workers could be stalled by new barriers in the more conservative White House and Congress, AFL-CIO Occupational Safety & Health Director George H. R. Taylor said on Labor News Conference. Reporters questioning him were Jean White of Press Associates, Inc. and Doug Harbrecht of the Pittsburgh Press.

'There! Isn't That Better?'

'Catch-Up' Pay Boosts Top Rail Union Contract Goals

The nation's railroad workers are seeking substantial wage increases to help make up for buying power lost to inflation over the past three years.

Not all of the 13 unions that will be bargaining with the major railroads in the current round of negotiations have submitted their goals. Of the five that have, however, there are certain areas of general agreement. These include the need for inflation "catch-up" wage increases, full cost-of-living adjustments, and improvements in health and welfare benefits.

UNIONS THAT have already served collective bargaining notices on the railroads include the Maintenance of Way Employees, Machinists, Signalmen, Railway & Airline Clerks, and the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths. The United Transportation Union is expected to file its notice on Feb. 2, and the others within 10 days. The 13 unions together represent more than 430,000 workers.

The size of the wage increases sought varies from union to union. The Maintenance of Way Employees are asking for boosts totaling 60 percent over a three-year period. The Signalmen are seeking retroactive pay plus pay increases totaling 46 percent. Other unions are less specific on the percentage increase.

The five unions that have served notices also have called for a "roll-in" of previously gained cost-of-living adjustments; that is, they want COL increases under their former three-year agreement made part of their base pay. For the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, for instance, this would amount to 58 cents an hour.

THE UNIONS also are proposing full cost-of-living adjustments, rather than the "capped" increases in their old pacts. And they want to improve the formulas under which the increases are calculated. The Maintenance of Way Employees, for example, are asking for a COL clause providing for a cent an hour for each increase of two-tenths of a point in the government's consumer price index. Declines in the CPI would not affect basic pay rates.

Union negotiators are also in agreement on the need for across-the-board improvements in health and welfare benefits. These would involve life insurance, accidental death and dismemberment coverage, and dental care. The unions also want establishment of a vision-care program.

Other bargaining goals include liberalized vacations and holidays, paid personal leaves, overtime changes, increases in differential pay for shifts starting at irregular times, and stronger job security.

RAIL CONTRACTS, which are governed by the Railway Labor Act, do not have specific expiration dates. Instead, the pacts may be opened for amendment from time to time. In the current round of negotiations, changes in wages and work rules would become effective on Apr. 1.

The employers are represented by the National Railway Labor Conference, which has withheld comment on the new union notices until all 13 unions have submitted their proposals. The other unions involved in the bargaining are the Dispatchers, Locomotive Engineers, Carmen, Firemen-Oilers, Yardmasters, Sheet Metal Workers, and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Consumer Prices Up 12.5%

Real Wages Fall 4.8% In 1980 Inflation Surge

Summarizing the annual changes in the consumer price index, BLS said that last year's increase, like that in 1979, was due primarily to large advances for housing and transportation costs. These accounted for almost three-fourths of the 1980 CPI price rise. Food and beverage prices rose about the same as in 1979; "most other major categories of consumer spending registered price increases moderately larger than in 1979," BLS said.

DECEMBER'S CPI increase alone was 1.1 percent, slightly above the 1 percent rise in each of the preceding three months. Increases in the cost of housing, transportation, food, and beverages accounted for over 90 percent of the month's total CPI increase, BLS said. The rise left the index at a level of 258.4, which means that goods and services that cost $10 in 1967 cost $25.84 at the end of 1980.

Of last year's total 12.5 percent jump, 1.5 percent points resulted from higher mortgage-interest costs, nearly one-tenth of the entire index, BLS said. Increases in energy prices, which rose about half again as fast as the overall index, were responsible for another 1.7 percentage points.

The immediate outlook is for still higher living costs. Rudy Oswald, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Economic Research, observed: "Food and energy price increases can be expected to accelerate in January, reflecting weather damage to Florida citrus crops, recent OPEC (Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries) actions, and the schedule of energy decontrol in the United States."

THE DECEMBER CPI advance was the largest jump since March. Housing costs were up 1.4 percent as mortgage-interest rates rose 4.1 percent. House prices declined one-tenth of 1 percent. Food prices increased 1 percent, following an increase of 1.1 percent in November. Energy prices jumped by 1.8 percent, following a 1.1 percent decline the month before.

Aside from home financing, other housing costs increased more rapidly in December than in November. The cost of maintenance and repairs jumped 1.3 percent, after posting an increase of only half that rate the previous month. The cost of house furnishings, unchanged in November, edged up three-tenths in December.

Higher gasoline prices helped push up transportation costs by 1.2 percent, following a 1.5 percent rise in November. In addition to gas, higher prices for used cars and automobile finance charges accounted for most of the transportation increase. Used car prices rose 3.3 percent, the fifth consecutive large monthly increase.

PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION charges went up 1.1 percent for the month as charges for airline fares rose 1.7 percent and inter-city train fares jumped 5.7 percent. Over the year, BLS said, the cost of public transportation increased 25.6 percent.

Among food items, higher costs for meats, poultry, fish, and eggs contributed most to the over-the-month rise. Prices for these items advanced 1.2 percent in December. The cost of dairy products rose nine-tenths of 1 percent, the same as in November. Fresh vegetable prices went up 4 percent, while prices for cereals and bakery products, fresh milk, sugar and artificial sweeteners also registered substantial increases.

Medical care costs were up five-tenths of 1 percent for the month as charges for physicians' fees and hospital rooms rose eight-tenths of 1 percent and seven-tenths of 1 percent, respectively. Prices for apparel and personal upkeep registered moderate increases. The cost of dining out was up 1 percent over the month. Entertainment costs declined.

Wage Gains Average 7.2% In '80 Public Employee Pacts

State and local government collective bargaining agreements concluded in the first half of 1980 provided average adjustments of 7 percent in the first year and 7.2 percent a year when measured over the life of the pacts, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In a survey of contracts covering 5,000 or more workers each, BLS found that—as in the private sector—settlements with cost-of-living clauses tended to be smaller than those without such clauses. First-year negotiated wage increases in agreements with COL provisions averaged 7.3 percent, while those without such clauses averaged 6.9 percent.

"WHEN NEGOTIATED wage adjustments were averaged over the life of the agreements, the annual wage rate changes for those agreements were 6.7 percent for settlements with COL clauses, and 7.5 percent for those without COL clauses," BLS said. Agreements with COL clauses had an average duration of 27 months, while those without such clauses averaged 23.9 months.

The survey covered 1,008,000 workers in 83 state and local government bargaining units. New settlements were reached in 16 of these units. Deferred wage changes were received in eight others under agreements negotiated prior to 1980, and COL adjustments were made under two contracts.

FIFTEEN OF THE new settlements, covering 150,000 workers, provided for fixed wage increases. One agreement, reached by the Chicago Transit Authority, provided no fixed wage increase but continued quarterly COL adjustments.

No COL clauses were introduced in settlements reached during the first six months of 1980. One unit, the Alaska State Employees Association, dropped a COL clause in an agreement effective Jan. 1, 1980.

About 52 percent of the workers covered by the public employee contracts in the survey were in the Northeast, 20 percent in the South, 11 percent in the north central region, and 8 percent in the West.

mate power of the people." The democratic system assures "another chance," he said.

BUT "OUR JOB did not end with the election," he stressed. "We do not intend to slumber through the next two or four years, hoping to awaken to the dawn of a new day."

The A. Philip Randolph Institute board meeting in Washington took place when Polish workers were striking and demonstrating in support of their newly-won trade union movement, Solidarity. Kirkland linked their struggle to these words of A. Philip Randolph, the black trade union leader whose life was a crusade for equal rights:

"Freedom is never granted; it is won. Justice is never given; it is exacted. Freedom and justice must be struggled for by the oppressed of all lands and races, and the struggle must be continuous—for freedom is never a final fact but a continuing evolving process."

The board meeting, attended by more than 100 union and civil rights leaders, reviewed 1980 activities of the Randolph Institute and explored proposed new projects.

Institute President Norman Hill said preliminary reports indicate the voter education and participation campaign was responsible for getting over 700,000 black voters to the polls.

HE ALSO reported on the institute's job safety and health program and its Frontlash-linked activities in predominantly black colleges in the South. The institute's intern program, Hill said, has trained and placed black union members with international union staffs and AFL-CIO central bodies.

Hill told the group that despite the election outcome, "there is still a constituency for social progress in the United States, and those politicians who retreat from progressive positions do so at their political peril."

Modest Gains Tallied in Legislatures

tions on labor union activities, as well as political beliefs and sexual activity.

The following is a summary of other legislative action affecting workers in a cross-section of states:

CALIFORNIA—Strong efforts by the State AFL-CIO raised the workers' compensation ceiling for temporary and permanent total disability from $154 to $175 a week and increased the death benefit for the surviving spouse from $50,000 to $75,000. Improvements were also made in the delivery of disability payments.

A $2.6 million state fund will assist victims of asbestosis, and other legislation require employers to notify workers of any exposure to toxic substances.

Dues check-off was authorized for certain employees of California schools and community colleges, including deductions for agency shop fees.

Exploitation of workers in the state's large garment industry will be curbed by a law requiring employers to register with the state labor commissioner and keep adequate records of employees' names, addresses, hours, production rates and wages.

CONNECTICUT—State labor officials are concerned about passage of a so-called "workfare" bill which could lead to replacement of municipal workers with welfare recipients forced to take specific jobs to maintain benefits. The state's sales tax, the highest in the nation, was increased from 7 to 7.5 percent, worsening what the State AFL-CIO terms an already inequitable tax burden on workers.

Improvements in the workers' compensation law increased the dependency allowance from $5 to $10 per dependent and eliminated the 15-year maximum benefit period for dependents. Children will now receive benefits up to age 18, or 22 if they are full-time students.

The time allowed for filing an occupational illness claim was extended to three years from the beginning of the disability or detection of the disease, rather than from the time it was contracted.

FLORIDA—An increase from $95 to $105 in maximum weekly unemployment compensation benefits was called a major victory for workers in a recessionary period by the State AFL-CIO. Potentially damaging bills were successfully defeated which would have jeopardized jobless payments to seasonal workers and allowed employers to cut their wages.

Substantial increases were won in the state budget to maintain a labor studies program in the state university system and to launch a program that will give workers an opportunity to pursue college degrees while working full time.

Measures to make technical improvements in the workers' compensation system were labor-supported, along with benefit improvements for retirees from public jobs.

ILLINOIS—Amendments to the unemployment insurance law include an increase in the minimum weekly benefit, raising it from $15 to 15 percent of the state's average weekly wage, or about $42. Another improvement permits a jobless worker to earn up to $62.50 a week in take-home pay before those earnings are offset against unemployment benefits.

Adoption of a compromise workers' compensation bill preserves major improvements made in the statute in 1975, beating back fierce employer lobbying to slash the program.

Although ERA failed in the Illinois legislature, the state did enact a human rights bill that will consolidate state agencies with rights enforcement power and strengthen protections of the Fair Employment Practices Act.

A bill to require payment of prevailing wages on all state service contracts also was passed, and a series of punitive public employee proposals was warded off.

KENTUCKY—Attempts to destroy the state's prevailing wage legislation were de- of 80 percent of a worker's spendable inrenewed pressure on the issue.

Workers' compensation legislation included stronger information requirements for insurers that will make it easier to contest rate increases.

Less acceptable to labor was a bill setting new maximum and minimum benefits for total disability which could serve to reduce or curtail some benefits for both total disability and permanent partial disability.

A bill to add "misconduct" to the reasons a fired employee could be denied jobless benefits was also passed over labor's opposition.

LOUISIANA—The State AFL-CIO fought hard against a grab-bag of anti-labor legislation proposed by the state's new governor, the first Republican in the Louisiana statehouse in more than 100 years. Bills were blocked that would have seriously cut both unemployment and workers' compensation, repealed the state's prevailing wage law, outlawed strikes by public employees, reduced retirement benefits of state employees and turned back gains in wages and working conditions for teachers.

Labor support led to the passage of four bills that actually increased workers' compensation benefits, including burial benefits, survivors' benefits, and benefit computation for payments related to occupational disease. It was also made illegal for an employer to refuse to hire workers because they had previously filed 8 compensation claims.

MARYLAND—The workers' compensation law was amended to include coverage of workers in public assistance work programs, and the time limit for notifying an employer of an occupational disease was extended from 30 days to one year after the worker's discovery of the disease. In addition, the minimum benefit for a temporary total disability was raised from $25 to $50 per week, or equal to the employee's weekly wage if less than $50.

MICHIGAN—Labor posted a major gain in improvements in unemployment compensation with weekly benefits increased to 70 percent of a worker's after-tax earnings, up to a maximum of 58 percent of the average weekly wage in the state, or $182. A significant feature of the law, the State AFL-CIO stressed, is the provision for indexing maximum benefits to provide annual increases.

Workers' compensation was also favorably reformed, capping a long struggle by Michigan labor. Effective in January 1982 benefits will go to a maximum of 90 percent of the average weekly wage, or $282 per week, compared to $210 a week under the current system. Cost-of-living increases will be provided to those already receiving compensation, and most minimum benefit levels will be eliminated through payment of 80 percent of a worker's spendable income, up to the maximum.

MINNESOTA—A revision in the Public Employment Labor Relations Act expands the right of Minnesota teachers to strike in the absence of an agreement or arbitration award. Except for provisions affecting employees designated as "essential," such as police and fire fighters, the new law also expands strike rights for all state and local government employees.

A workers' compensation intervention fund was created to finance participation in rate increase hearings by major employer and worker groups such as the State AFL-CIO.

Minnesota labor was also successful in its support of a constitutional amendment to place certain campaign spending limits on candidates in state elections who accept public financing.

MISSISSIPPI—A wage increase of $950 a year was passed for the state's school teachers, along with legislation designed to make it easier for local school districts to establish kindergartens.

Labor continued its support for equalization of property taxes in the state's 82 counties, participating in action to defend the bill against legal challenges that now await a ruling by the state supreme court.

Another bill tightens controls on the use of polygraph tests by employers.

NEW JERSEY—One of the State AFL-CIO's most successful legislative efforts won substantial improvement in workers' compensation legislation. The new law provides for increases of some 500 to 700 percent in compensation awards for serious and catastrophic injuries, as well as higher benefits for permanent partial disability based on 70 percent of an employee's weekly earnings at the time of the injury, up to a maximum of 75 percent of the state's average weekly wage for covered employees.

Agency shop agreements with unions were made a negotiable item in collective bargaining laws covering public employees. The agreement could require non-union workers to pay a monthly fee to the union equivalent to 85 percent of union dues.

Public employees also won rights to dues check-off as well as payroll deduction of voluntary contributions to be allocated to union welfare, political action, charity, legal defense and educational funds.

OKLAHOMA—Labor supported the successful effort to ban the use of prison inmates as strikebreakers.

VIRGINIA—A bill backed by the National Right to Work Committee which would have required employers to post notices of employees' rights under the state's so-called right-to-work law was beaten back by strong lobbying from Virginia unions.

Unemployment compensation laws were amended to increase employer contributions from 3.2 percent to 4.5 percent. Other legislation will require employers with records of heavy layoffs to increase their contributions to the state unemployment trust fund.

WASHINGTON—Despite a 49-49 division between Republicans and Democrats of seats in the state legislature, significant improvements were scored in labor-related legislation.

Lump sum money awards for permanent partial disability under workers' compensation were doubled, and fully disabled workers were given supplements to their fixed workers' compensation pensions, a measure particularly beneficial to older disabled workers.

Legislation to correct inequities in the offset provisions of the social security law means improved benefits for retirees. Another measure corrects language in the unemployment compensation statute that had been used to deny benefits to workers who voluntarily quit jobs that were excessively far from their homes.

WEST VIRGINIA—Low income workers will get a break from the increase in the state minimum wage from $2.20 to $2.75 an hour, and from the decrease from 42 to 40 hours worked before compulsory overtime must be paid.

Labor support helped defeat a bill that would have denied unemployment compensation benefits to any worker who voluntarily quit his or her job. Present law requires a penalty of six weeks disqualification from benefits. The state federation is supporting a speedy review of the state's overall jobless benefits program in the face of a rapidly deteriorating fund.

Labor successfully warded off the second attempt in two years to pass "right to work" legislation and helped scuttle several punitive measures aimed at public employees.

February Schedule Listed By Labor Studies Center

Organizing, arbitration and newswriting and editing are the subjects of three programs offered by the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md., during February. The schedule:

Organizing Techniques, Feb. 1-6—A review of the essentials in a successful organizing campaign: programming in-plant committees, developing winning issues, making house calls, and responding to employer attacks. Labor Board procedures are explained.

Newswriting & Editing, Feb. 1-6—A workshop for union editors to sharpen their skills in newswriting, headline writing, makeup and editing for greater readability and credibility. This workshop is co-sponsored by the International Labor Press Association.

Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation, Feb. 22-27—An opportunity to prepare a grievance case for hearing, present a mock case before a professional arbitrator, hear his comments and suggestions, and review the action on videotape. Methods of picking arbitrators and the law of arbitration are covered.

Unions using the campus for their own leadership training during February are the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, Feb. 8-12; Flight Attendants, Feb. 8-13; Office & Professional Employees, Feb. 15-18; United Transportation Union, Feb. 22-Mar. 6; Communications Workers, Feb. 22-Mar. 13.

Kirkland Urges Talks with Japan On Trade Issues

Kirkland said, and for negotiations to set import quotas on automobiles and auto parts.

There are no "simple solutions" to complex trade problems, he acknowledged. But the AFL-CIO hopes that discussions and negotiations "can significantly reduce those areas of disagreement and friction" while widening the areas of accord, he said.

Kirkland spoke of the AFL-CIO's program for the "reindustrialization" of America, and suggested that Japan has shown an example of utilizing government assistance to fund programs to develop new technologies.

He also spoke of free unions as "essential" to democratic societies.

"Democracy and free trade unions strengthen and reinforce each other," he said. "What weakens one, weakens the other."

He told the Japanese research group that in an era of oil shortages and price-gouging, "the control of energy prices and energy company profits is a legitimate responsibility of government."

As the AFL-CIO sees it, Kirkland said, "breaking the OPEC stranglehold on the U.S. economy requires the federal government to determine the amount of oil to be imported, negotiate its price and allocate it in a manner which meets the needs . . . of all segments of America society."

Major Pacts Boost Wages 9.5 Percent agreements were protected by COL clauses, slightly higher than the 58 percent for all major contracts negotiated in 1979.

The construction and telephone industries accounted for 40 percent of the workers involved in last year's bargaining—21 percent and 19 percent, respectively. Other large segments of workers were in primary metals, transportation equipment, retail food stores, public utilities, electrical and electronic equipment, and machinery industries.

Other highlights of the BLS report:

- In key contracts, those covering 5,000 workers or more, combined wage and fringe-benefit increases in 1980 averaged 10.4 percent in the first year and 7 percent annually over the life of the agreement. Corresponding averages in 1979 were 9 percent and 6.6 percent, respectively.
- 1980 settlements covering some 770,000 construction workers provided first-year average wage increases of 13.6 percent, up from 8.8 percent in the previous year. Over the life of the agreements, the annual rate of increase was 12 percent.
- In manufacturing, the average wage gain was 7.3 percent for the first year and 5.4 percent annually over the life of the agreements. The figures compare with 6.9 percent and 5.4 percent, respectively, in 1979.
- In non-manufacturing industries, the average first-year wage increase was 11 percent, compared to 8 percent in 1979. Over the life of the contracts, the annual rate of increase was 8.3 percent, compared to 6.8 percent in the previous year.
- The average duration of agreements negotiated last year was 32.8 months, slightly lower than the 33.4 months when the same parties previously bargained. For settlements containing COL provisions, contract duration averaged 35.4 months compared with 28.9 months for those without COL clauses.

Revised Davis-Bacon Rules Retain '30-Percent' Standard

A revised set of Davis-Bacon regulations is scheduled to take effect Feb. 17, only slightly changed from a draft proposed by the Labor Dept. more than a year ago.

The changes are largely designed to improve enforcement of prevailing wage standards on federally-funded construction projects and to provide more accurate and up-to-date wage determinations.

PRESIDENT ROBERT A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said the new regulations "generally" would improve the prevailing wage program. But the open-shop Associated Builders & Contractors protested the "11th-hour issuance" of the regulations shortly before the change of administration. The employer group said it would seek "to get these regulations rescinded." President Reagan subsequently announced a 60-day holdup of all pending regulation changes to allow review by his Administration.

The Labor Dept. had several times extended the deadline for interested groups to comment on the regulations, which were first published in the Federal Register in December of 1979. The department said it rejected requests for further postponements and public hearings because it appeared that all viewpoints had been adequately expressed in the 246 written comments submitted by interested groups and individuals.

The new regulations incorporate the "30-percent rule" that open-shop contractors have long sought to eliminate.

THE EXISTING policy, which will be continued, is that the prevailing area rate will be the pay scale received by the largest number of workers in the job classification, provided they make up at least 30 percent of the workers in that classification. Non-union contractors complained that this often results in union wage scales becoming prevailing wage rates when using an average wage would have resulted in a lower pay line.

But another employer group, the Associated General Contractors, acknowledged that the regulations included some changes sought by employers. Thus, distinctions between types of construction and locations of work will avoid "importing" higher city rates to rural job sites, the ACG said. But the organization said it will still challenge the regulations when the new Administration is in place.

Decontrol to Kick Off Oil Price Surge

President Reagan's executive order lifting all remaining controls on oil will touch off a new round of increases in gasoline and fuel oil costs, Administration officials concede.

But the President and Energy Sec. James Edwards argue that the higher prices will spur energy conservation and the additional windfall profits to the oil companies will provide further incentive for new drilling and production.

IDENTICAL arguments had been made by former President Carter when he began the phaseout of controls nearly two years ago—a step the AFL-CIO opposed and sought unsuccessfully to reverse.

The decontrol "cannot be justified on economic, social or equity grounds," the AFL-CIO declared when the process began. It would worsen inflation and feed recession, labor warned.

By the time of the AFL-CIO convention in December 1979, the warning had been largely borne out. Decontrol does not "contribute one iota to resolving the energy crisis," a convention resolution affirmed, nor increase supplies.

Further, the "gluttony" of the oil companies for ever-bigger profits "has injured the American people," the convention said.

CONGRESS subsequently passed a windfall profits tax to soak up some of the enormous added revenue the oil compasies were receiving, although the tax rate was less than the Carter Administration and the AFL-CIO had urged. Ironically, the added tax that will result from Reagan's decontrol decision will ease his budget problems.

But the oil industry will be left with substantial additional after-tax profits, and it enthusiastically hailed the decontrol order, which Reagan had promised during his presidential campaign.

A Standard Oil of California executive told the Associated Press that his company was "ecstatic" over the decontrol order.

WHILE THE actual pricing decisions will be made by the oil companies in the days ahead, the state Energy Office in Connecticut estimated that lifting controls now instead of next September will cost the average family in the state an extra $32 for heating oil and $42 for gasoline Energy Sec. James B. Edwards said he thought agsoline prices would rise only 3 to 5 cents a gallon as a result of decontrol, but other estimates were more than double that.

The Congressional Budget Office said the decontrol may add as much as 1 percent to the consumer price index for 1981.

Oil price controls were first imposed under the Nixon Administration, and as a result of the Carter phaseout, only 15 percent of U.S. oil production was under price contsols when Reagan issued his order.

Donovan Nomination Gains Senate Committee Support

The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee recommended confirmation of Raymond J. Donovan as Secretary of Labor, paving the way for an early vote by the full Senate and completion of action on President Reagan's Cabinet appointees.

The committee vote was 11-0 to recommend confirmation, but five of the seven Democrats abstained after declaring they were not yet prepared to make "a final judgment" on the nomination.

COMMITTEE ACTION had been held up pending completion of an intensive FBI investigation of allegations that Donovan and the New Jersey construction company with which he was associated had links with figures in organized crime.

The most serious charges had been made by an FBI informant whose criminal record included a murder conviction. But the FBI said 1,400 hours of investigative work by 62 agents had failed to uncover any evidence supporting the allegations.

All nine Republicans supported confirmation, as did Democrats Jennings Randolph (W. Va.) and former Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (N.J.).

Democrats who abstained were Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Claiborne Pell (R.I.), Thomas Eagleton (Mo.), Donald Riegle (Mich.) and Howard Metzenbaum (Ohio).

IN ADDITION to confirming heads of the other government departments, the Senate also approved the nomination of David Stockman, a former Michigan congressman, as director of the Office of Management & Budget; Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, Georgetown University professor and foreign policy expert, as Ambassador to the United Nations; William E. Brock III, a former Tennessee senator and most recently Republican national chairman, as U.S. Trade Representative, and William J. Casey, a former chairman of the Securities & Exchange Commission, as director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Ralph C. Smith Retires From United Way Labor Post

Atlanta—Ralph C. Smith, AFL-CIO Community Services regional director for the labor participation department at the United Way southeastern regional office since 1967, retired Dec. 31.

Smith served as executive secretary of Rubber Workers Local 5 in Akron, Ohio, during the late 1950s and early '60s. He later represented the Akron AFL-CIO on the staff of the Summit County, Ohio, United Way.

Truesdale Quits NLRB Post To Create Second Vacancy

A second member of the National Labor Relations Board, John C. Truesdale, has resigned, leaving the federal agency with two vacancies to be filled by President Ronald Reagan.

Truesdale, a Democrat, had been serving a recess appointment by former President Carter since late last year. Confirmation by the Senate had been delayed by Republican leaders in the hope that an incoming GOP Administration could fill the seat with its own choice.

IN A LETTER to Reagan, Truesdale noted that his nomination had been withdrawn by the President, and said that, "in the circumstances, it seems appropriate to offer my resignation at this time to clear the way for you to make your own nomination at an early date."

Earlier in January, another Democrat, John A. Penello, announced his retirement from the board to take advantage of federal pension provisions.

Reagan's withdrawal of Truesdale's nomination, and those of 30 others by the Carter Administration, came in a notice received by the Senate on Jan. 21. Truesdale's resignation leaves the NLRB with three members — Chairman John H. Fanning, a Democrat; Howard Jenkins, Jr., a Republican, and Don A. Zimmerman, an independent.

Truesdale was immediately chosen by the remaining three NLRB members to return to his former position as executive secretary of the board, a post he held from 1972 to 1977 before he was named a member to fill the unexpired term of Peter C. Walther, a Republican.

The executive secretary's position had been vacant, with Robert Volger serving in an acting capacity.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI Saturday, February 7, 1981 No. 6

CENTENNIAL SEMINAR kicking off the celebration of labor's 100th anniversary brought editors and Washington news bureau chiefs to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies to hear AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and former Labor Secretaries John Dunlop and Ray Marshall, as well as a panel of Executive Council members, discuss American labor's current positions and its future. Vice President John Lyons (at podium) is shown with Donahue and Vice Presidents Albert Shanker, Sol Chaikin and Glenn Watts at the final session. A major goal of the centennial program is to win greater public understanding of labor's aims and achievements as well as the challenges facing it in the future.

Regulation Freeze Ties Up Measures On Safety, Wages

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan's 60-day freeze of pending government regulations has put in limbo a group of labor-supported measures affecting the safety, health and wages of America's workers.

Along with scores of other pending government actions, many clearly non-controversial, they have been labeled by the Reagan White House as "midnight regulations" of the outgoing Carter Administration and pulled back for review.

THEY WILL BE scrutinized for cost-effectiveness and, the White House stressed, in terms of the Administration goal of "lessening rather than increasing the regulatory burden."

In fact, regulations are the means by which the Executive Branch of government administers the laws passed by Congress, which only rarely are self-enforcing. In at least some cases, suspending regulations amounts to suspension of the law on which they are based.

Thus, the regulatory freeze will hold up —at least until Mar. 30—the implementation of "walkaround pay" rights for worker representatives during workplace inspections by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

It will allow Indiana to continue to operate a state job safety and health program that the AFL-CIO has repreatedly criticized as grossly inferior to the federal program it replaced. OSHA had begun administrative action to suspend certification of the Indiana program because of the state's "consistent pattern of poor performance."

ALSO HELD UP by the government-wide regulatory freeze are changes in Davis-Bacon Act procedures for setting prevailing wage rates on federally-funded construction. It includes some changes sought by employers. But an open-shop contractors' association complained it didn't go far enough to meet their objections and has urged the Reagan Administration to rescind it.

The freeze means at least a further delay in an already years-delayed action by the Labor Dept. to raise the wage test for exemption from overtime pay requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

A WHITE HOUSE LIST of regulations termed "candidates for postponement"—pending checks to determine if some are mandated by law and therefore cannot be postponed—range from food stamp changes to housing loans to asbestos detection and control programs.

The Dept. of Housing & Urban Development has pulled back rules for the Solar Energy & Conservation Bank that Congress authorized last year and rules to improve Fair Housing Act enforcement.

Regulations with scheduled effective dates beyond Mar. 30 also must pass the screening process even though they are not formally under the freeze. These include a long-range hearing conservation program to protect more than 5 million workers who are regularly exposed to high levels of noise. It was scheduled to take effect in mid-April.

REAGAN ALSO prohibited issuance of any new final regulations—with limited exceptions—by any agency. This holdup would presumably cover OSHA's proposed toxic labeling standard which would provide precise chemical identification and warnings on hazardous substances.

The White House charged that many of the regulations issued during the last month of the Carter Administration would impose "substantial new burdens on the economy."

The freeze period, it said, would permit a review of the pending regulations "to assure that they are cost-effective and necessary." It would also allow time for a task force headed by Vice President Bush "to reassess the need for regulations that have been under development."

Budget Policies Urged To Reduce Joblessness

Budget and monetary policies should be geared to prevent increases in unemployment and the loss of billions of dollars in potential output, income, and savings, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Testifying before the Senate Appropriations Committee, Rudy Oswald, director of the federation's Dept. of Economic Research, said that adoption of policies that lessen unemployment and loss of revenue and help to increase the nation's productive capital can help to break the stagflation pattern of simultaneous inflation and recession that currently grips the United States.

"Without expansionary monetary and fiscal policies, the economy will go through another downturn involving more unemployment," he warned.

OSWALD TOLD the panel, chaired by Sen. Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.), that a high-employment budget would help to balance the budget. "Full employment would minimize the loss of national product, income and savings and turn the federal budget deficit into surplus," he said. The Senate committee held hearings on the relationship between the economic outlook and the budget.

Oswald noted that the unemployment situation in the United States is already serious—and likely to get worse. Since January 1980, joblessness rose 1.3 per-

Donovan Takes Office as New Labor Secretary

Raymond C. Donovan took office as the nation's 17th Secretary of Labor, following his confirmation by the Senate on an 80-17 rollcall.

He was sworn in by Vice President George Bush at a White House ceremony that completed the installation of the Reagan Cabinet. But the new Administration is still in its skeletal phase, with scores of presidential appointments yet to be made.

DONOVAN'S confirmation is expected to be followed quickly by the announcement of nominees for other top department posts—the undersecretary and assistant secretaries. The new team will have to deal in the weeks ahead with budget cuts proposed by the White House and by the President's Office of Management & Budget, and with decisions on important and controversial regulations promulgated by the Carter Administration that have been pulled back for review.

Senate action on Donovan's nomination was put off to allow completion of a lengthy FBI investigation of allegations linking Donovan and the New Jersey construction firm with which he was associated to illegal payoffs and links with organized crime figures.

Kirkland Spurs Strong Role For Labor on World Scene

Tokyo—The world's free trade union movement has a duty to involve itself much more deeply in national and international decision-making, and to concern itself with corporate behavior, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the 17th annual convention of the Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI) here.

"Until enforceable international standards are developed, our unions must do all we can to see that companies based in our own countries behave decently and observe the laws of other countries in which they do business," Kirkland told the 1,500 delegates.

"We have a duty not only to insist that our employers and our governments protect and advance human rights, but to throw our own energies and resources into the battle wherever we can be of help. It is our job to assist in the creation and development of free trade unions among the workers of all countries in which help is needed," he added.

ABOVE ALL, Kirkland said, free trade unions must persuade their respective governments to work together to seek workable, joint solutions to their mutual problems. Some steps toward that end, he noted, have been taken by the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (OECD), on which the labor movements of the United States, Japan, and western Europe are represented. But the OECD itself had failed to come to grips with the most pressing issues facing the world's big industrial countries, Kirkland warned.

At last summer's OECD summit meeting in Venice, and at previous summit meetings, the issue of mass unemployment was disregarded in favor of continuing the "bankrupt policy" of fighting inflation with tight monetary policies and high interest, Kirkland charged.

It's GOP's Turn to Squirm As House Ups Debt Ceiling

The shoe was on the other foot, and it hurt. It was the turn of congressional Republicans to put politics aside and vote to increase the federal debt ceiling.

Democrats in the House and Senate suggested that it was time that their Republican colleagues faced up to the fact that the debt limit must be raised periodically to keep government checks from bouncing and to allow the United States to meet its legal obligations.

LAST YEAR, all 154 House Republicans voted against raising the debt limit. It earned them a big plus as fiscally responsible from conservative political action groups that give out money and endorsements, while Democrats who supported the measure were branded as "big spenders."

In fact, even when Republican Gerald Ford was in the White House, most Republicans voted against his debt limit requests and Democrats had to supply the votes to keep the government solvent.

PRESIDENT REAGAN personally came to Capitol Hill to ask both Democratic and Republican leaders to support raising the debt limit to nearly one trillion dollars—ironically the first legislative request he had made to Congress.

He was accompanied by the director of his Office of Management & Budget, David A. Stockman, a former Republican congressman from Michigan who had always voted against debt limit bills.

The House Ways & Means Committee voted unanimously to approve the rise in the debt limit, but Democrats served notice that they didn't intend to let the Republicans have a free ride by providing the votes to pass the bill—at least not until most Republicans had voted for it.

Kirkland Cites International Role of Labor

"WE ARE convinced that these matters must be brought forward for public debate and discussion and that all of our national labor centers should bring our views and recommendations home to all of our governments as forcefully as possible," Kirkland declared.

Accompanying him on his convention visit were AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joyce Miller and William Wynn, State AFL-CIO Presidents William Marshall of Michigan and Victor Bussie of Louisiana, and James Ellenberger of the federation's Dept. of International Affairs.

About 35 international labor leaders attended the annual DOMEI meeting during the last week of January. They included President P. P. Narayanan and Sec.-Gen. Otto Kersten of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and representatives of labor unions in the Republic of Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, the Philippines, Malaysia, Indonesia, Turkey, and Israel. It was Kirkland's first visit to Japan since 1941, when he arrived as a crew member of a U.S.-flag cargo vessel.

DOMEI AND THE AFL-CIO have held annual consultations for a number of years, probing U.S.-Japan economic ties with an eye toward greater cooperation. The two organizations have sought also to promote increased mutual understanding between Japanese and American labor unions, and to avoid trade frictions between the two countries.

The AFL-CIO delegation conferred with top-ranking officials of Japanese labor, business, and governmental groups. In addition, Kirkland and Wynn joined U.S. Ambassador to Japan Mike Mansfield at a luncheon attended by the presidents of all four Japanese national trade union centers, DOMEI, Sohyo (General Council of Trade Unions of Japan) Churitsu Roren (National Liaison Council of Neutral Labor Unions) and Shin Sanbetsu (National Federation of Industrial Organizations.)

Kirkland and others also conferred with Japanese Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki, Foreign Minister Masayoshi Itoh, Labor Minister Masayuki Fujio, and met with President Bunpei Ohtsuki of the Japan Federation of Employers Association (Nikkeiren) and the leaders of the Japan Seamen's Union, the Japan Union of Commercial Workers, and Zenkindomei (Metal Machinery Workers.)

centage points, representing about 1.5 million workers without jobs. For the full year 1981, many economists are forecasting an unemployment rate of 8 to 8.5 percent.

Putting people to work under specific job programs could alleviate certain inflationary pressures on the economy, Oswald said. Yet, he noted the fiscal 1981 and 1982 budget "practically phase out" local public works support and anti-recession fiscal assistance, and greatly reduce temporary employment assistance. Such policies contribute to the decline of large urban centers, he added.

"THE COUNTRY cannot long remain prosperous if the economic and population centers of major regions of the country are to become reservoirs of unemployment and subsequent social unrest," Oswald warned. He said reindustrialization programs, from a national as well as a local economic perspective, are essential.

It would be anti-inflationary to have people employed in useful public projects such as mass transit construction, repair and replacements of bridges, streets and highways, and the provision of low-income housing, Oswald observed.

"No one program alone will be enough to solve the inflation and unemployment problems," he said, "but job-creation programs are often more effective job generators and more deflationary than tax cuts."

Oswald said that any tax cuts should be directed to mitigate the effects of inflation on those who suffer the most, the lower and middle income taxpayers. Business tax cuts should be directed through the reindustrialization program, he urged.

THE NATION'S soaring inflation rate is not basically the result of budget deficits or excess demand but rather the result of rising costs for the necessities of life—food, energy, medical care, and housing, Oswald pointed out.

"They account for 60 percent of the average family's spending. And these are areas where labor costs have little impact on prices," he said.

"Even if the budget were in balance, it would not resolve the energy and food shocks to the price level."

Miss Florence A. Long, a retired AFL-CIO employee, died in Alexandria, Va., Jan. 15, 1981. Miss Long, 90, retired Jan. 1, 1966, after 24 years of service with the CIO and AFL-CIO Accounting Dept.

Senior Citizens Alert Needy To Energy Cost Subsidies

Low-income families and the elderly are the target of a nationwide energy assistance information campaign launched by the National Council of Senior Citizens with the help of a federal grant.

NCSC's "Project EnergyCare" will use a network of volunteers to alert the needy to the aid available under the $1.85-billion federal low-income energy assistance program as well as other state and local aid to help them pay high home heating bills. The NCSC's project is funded by a grant from the Community Services Administration of the U.S. Health & Human Services Dept.

NCSC's CAMPAIGN will include a national and local radio and television advertising schedule, newspaper articles and editorials, a speakers' bureau and flyers and information kits to be given directly to people eligible for the program.

The week of Feb. 22-28 has been designated "EnergyCare Week" by NCSC, which plans to mobilize thousands of volunteers during the week to distribute information about the aid program.

The council will work directly with local "EnergyCare" sponsors in some 70 cities. These sponsors, including community action agencies, church groups, nutrition programs, legal services offices and other groups, will coordinate the information programs locally. NCSC members, trade unionists, and other interested organizations and individuals are being asked to contact their local EnergyCare sponsors to volunteer for the program. The council will release its final sponsor list shortly, and local public service advertising will also identify local sponsors.

THOSE INTERESTED in volunteering for the information program should contact local sponsors before beginning any outreach activity, NCSC EnergyCare director Michael Sandifer said.

"The local sponsor will be able to give volunteers all the essential information on energy assistance programs," Sandifer pointed out, "as well as proper application procedures for obtaining aid."

The federal assistance program will grant up to $750 to eligible persons who formally apply for aid. A few states are expected to mail small assistance checks automatically to recipients of supplemental security income and aid to families with dependent children. Those receiving aid, however, may be eligible for additional benefits, if they apply.

INCOME eligibility levels will vary from region to region, and the basic standard will be based on incomes falling below the Bureau of Labor Statistics lower living standard or on 125 percent of the official poverty level, whichever would grant eligibility to the largest number of an area's needy citizens.

The amount of assistance granted will be based on factors including income, size of household and the amount of total budget spent on heating. Priority will be given to households that include elderly or handicapped people.

In addition to cash assistance, the program will provide funds for such needs as blankets and space heaters in the event of life-threatening emergencies.

THE NCSC POINTS OUT that other sources of aid will be publicized in addition to the federal program, including state energy assistance funds and state and federal weatherization programs.

Information on the campaign is available from the National Council of Senior Citizens, 1511 K St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005. Tel. 202/347-8800.

Two Ohio Reporters Cited For Guild's Broun Award

A series of articles on police brutality toward prisoners resulting in at least one prisoner's death—and the attendant cover-up by responsible authorities—won the Newspaper Guild's annual Heywood Broun award for two reporters on the Mansfield (Ohio) News Journal. They are Barb Brucker and Jim Underwood.

The award—$1,000 for the reporters and a citation for the newspaper—was presented to Brucker and Underwood and News Journal Editor K. Robert May at a luncheon on the opening day of the Guild's international executive board meeting.

THE MANSFIELD team's entry was selected from among a record 156 submitted in the annual Broun Award competition. There were no honorable mention awards. The judges explained that to award any would have produced too long a list because of the high quality of so many of the entries.

The Brucker-Underwood series, the judges said, "represented the finest tradition of Heywood Broun," the columnist who was the Guild's founding president.

"More than two years after the fact, these two reporters began an investigation of the death of a black prisoner in a local jail," the judges said, continuing:

"The prisoner obviously was not a 'leading citizen,' and had had previous brushes with the law. Yet the reporters did not let his background deter them from a thorough probe into his death.

"THE SERIES uncovered a pattern of alleged beating by the police department. It led to the dismissal of the two policemen accused in the original incident and the adoption of new procedures by the city, a federal grand jury investigation and perhaps the defusing of a potential dangerous situation of racial tension in the community."

The Broun award has been given each of the last 40 years for work that is in the spirit of Broun's own work in the '20s and '30s. That spirit was distinguished by an unceasing devotion to the public interest and an abiding concern for the underdog.

Judges of this year's award entries were Bill Kovach, chief of the New York Times Washington bureau; Benjamin F. Holman, acting dean of the University of Maryland's college of journalism and a former reporter in Chicago, New York and Washington, and Richard W. Daw, editor-in-chief of the National Catholic News Service and a former reporter, editor and bureau chief with Associated Press.

Supreme Court Case

Wide Equal Pay Rights Backed in Labor Brief

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to rule that Title VII, the equal employment opportunity section, of the 1964 Civil Rights Act gave women wider protection against pay discrimination than they already had under the Equal Pay Act of 1963.

At issue is whether pay differentials can be challenged in court as illegal sex discrimination if they do not involve unequal pay for substantially equal work in the same establishment—the test imposed for claims under the Equal Pay Act.

AN AFL-CIO BRIEF, joined by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) and a group of unaffiliated unions, contends that the Civil Rights Act provides recourse for all forms of discriminatory pay practices based on sex, as it does for discrimination based on race, color, religion or national origin.

The case that reached the Supreme Court stems from a charge brought by matrons at a county jail in Oregon who had been paid less than male employees with different job titles but many similar duties.

A federal district judge ruled against them, holding that their claim did not meet the test imposed in the Equal Pay Act and therefore could not be grounds for a Title VII suit under the Civil Rights Act. He interpreted an amendment to Title VII that the Senate adopted during the civil rights debate as compelling such a conclusion.

BUT A 2-1 majority of a 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals panel took a broader view. It agreed that the suit brought by the prison matrons did not meet the Equal Pay Act criteria. But it held that this did not preclude an opportunity to prove to the satisfaction of a court that pay differentials were in fact the result of sex discrimination.

The so-called Bennett Amendment, introduced by a former senator from Utah, specified that pay differences between men and women would not be unlawful under Title VII if "authorized" by the Equal Pay Act.

The AFL-CIO brief rejects the contention that the Bennett amendment ruled out any relief for pay discrimination not falling under the Equal Pay Act. The intent of Congress, the AFL-CIO argued, was "to incorporate into Title VII the equal work requirement of the Equal Pay Act in cases involving claims for equal pay based solely on comparison of job duties."

A similar issue arose in another case, in which a different appellate court also upheld the union position.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) brought that case on behalf of women workers at a Westinghouse lamp factory where, the union contends, a lower wage structure for women was the outgrowth of a blatant double standard of job evaluation that has never been rectified.

In that case, a 3rd Circuit appellate decision held, the standard of proof of illegal discrimination would be the same as if the case had involved charges of racial rather than sex discrimination.

AS IN THE case that the Supreme Court has accepted for review—known as the "Gunther case" from the name of one of the prison matrons who brought the suit—the issue involved is not whether women workers were victims of illegal pay discrimination. It is whether they should have an opportunity to prove in court that they were discriminated against even if the circumstances didn't fall within the narrow confines of the Equal Pay Act.

In its brief to the Supreme Court, the AFL-CIO said the appellate court conclusion that the women who brought the suit are entitled to their day in court "should be affirmed."

The unaffiliated unions that joined in the brief were the Auto Workers, National Treasury Employees and the National Federation of Federal Employees.

Mine Safety Act Programs Slash Job Injury Rate

Fatalities and injuries decreased substantially during fiscal year 1980 at 57 non-coal mines and mills participating in a federal accident reduction program, the Mine Safety & Health Administration reported.

MSHA said that preliminary data for fiscal 1980 show that accidents at participating operations resulted in 1,985 lost-workday injuries, a drop of 32 percent from the 2,920 in fiscal 1979.

Since the Program in Accident Reduction (PAR) was put into operation in 1976, MSHA said there has been a consistent reduction in injuries over the years. During that span, the number of participating metal and nonmetal mines and mills has increased from 33 to 57.

Under the program, MSHA assigns inspectors to mines and mills having unusually high accident rates to work closely with management and unions on efforts to improve safety.

MSHA said the rate for lost-workday accidents at PAR mines and mills dropped 30 percent in fiscal 1980 to 10.8 per 200,000 worker-hours from a rate of 15.4 the year before. It credited cooperation of labor, management and inspectors for the progress.

COLLEGE DEGREES were awarded by Antioch University to three union officials who earned Bachelor of Arts degrees in Labor Studies through a cooperative program between the university and the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. William E. Berry, Jr., left, confers degrees on William C. Goetz, Carpenters; Marvin E. Oursler, Operating Engineers, and Arthur J. Jones, Clothing & Textile Workers.

Studies Center Degree Plan Graduates 3 More Unionists

Three more officials of AFL-CIO unions have been awarded degrees of Bachelor of Arts in Labor Studies by Antioch University. The ceremony took place Jan. 28 at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Silver Spring, Md., before more than 60 participants in the center's external degree program.

The program, offered by Antioch in cooperation with the Meany Center, permits students to study independently at home while continuing their regular work. Some college credits are allowed for competencies gained through experience in the labor movement.

SINCE THE college degree program began seven years ago, 24 union officials have earned B.A. degrees. More than 100 others are now enrolled in the program, which is open to officers and staff members of AFL-CIO unions.

The January graduates were William C. Goetz, 33, of Lexington, Ky; an organizer for the Carpenters; Arthur C. Jones, 40, of Cheektowaga, N.Y., secretary-treasurer of the local joint board of the Clothing & Textile Workers, and Marvin E. Oursler, 29, of Camp Springs, Md., business representative of Operating Engineers Local 77.

The three graduates had been working in the program from two to five years, during which they spent a week every six months on campus at the studies center, meeting with counsellors and attending classes. These classes introduced them to courses of study they pursued during the next six months. All three brought to the program some previously-earned college credits.

William E. Berry, Jr., director of Antioch University in Maryland, presented the diplomas, Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, spoke at the commencement, and Russell Allen, the center's deputy director, presided.

Pay Issue Tops Paperworkers' Contract Agenda

Atlanta—Substantial wage increases to meet the higher cost of living and adequate pension benefits will be the two most important issues in bargaining with the paper industry this year, Paperworkers President Wayne E. Glenn said here.

In an address at an employee relations conference sponsored jointly by the Fibre Box Association and the American Paper Institute, Glenn said that the single, overriding issue is the need for wage increases "sufficient to prevent erosion of our members' standard of living."

THE DECLINE of purchasing power over the past two years has left UPIU members poorest in their ability to provide for the necessities of living—shelter, fuel, food, and medical care, Glenn said.

"Single-digit percentage wage increases cannot adequately meet the needs of our members in the face of double-digit inflation," he added.

Also on the bargaining agenda, Glenn said, will be a cost-of-living clause, improved occupational safety and health, and advance notice of an employer's intention to close a plant or lay off a substantial portion of the workforce.

PRELIMINARY figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics indicate that as of Jan. 9 there were approximately 30,000 fewer employees on the payroll in the paper industry than a year and a half ago, Glenn said.

"Our experience tells us that the vast majority of those laid-off workers will never return to the paper industry," he said. "For this reason, we believe that employers have an obligation to negotiate with our union not only when they are closing a plant, but also when they are consolidating departments and are laying off workers with little or no expectation of their returning to the bargaining unit."

THIS AMERICAN FLAG, the length of two football fields and the equivalent in height of a 21-story building, greeted the former hostages when their plane touched down at Andrews Air Force Base, Md. for the start of an enthusiastic welcome to the nation's capital. Members of two Iron Workers' locals made up most of this volunteer crew shown positioning the flag by the runway. Other building trades and American Legion members helped out on the project.

An International Duty

WE IN THE LABOR movement have long been aware of the extent to which all human affairs are interlinked and all human beings are interdependent. We did not need to be told that on this crowded planet there are no longer any purely internal affairs.

The present energy crisis should make it clear to even the most obtuse national policymaker that economics is, in fact, part and parcel of foreign policy and that there will be no solution for any country, however rich or fortunate, unless all of our countries have a share in it.

At the same time, it should be clear that decisions made in the financial capitals of the world have at least as great a worldwide impact as those made in political capitals, and that those decisions need to be guided by concern for human beings, rather than merely for corporate advantage.

DAILY LIFE all around the globe has been transformed. Production and trade patterns have been disrupted and reshaped by the rise of multinational corporations and state-operated transnational enterprises. Producer-consumer relationships and employer-employee relationships have been changed in ways that no country and no national labor movement can cope with alone.

All of the economic problems that were once confined within the borders of individual countries have become international problems. Recession, inflation, unemployment, food shortages, energy shortages, trade barriers and dislocations have become international problems that the international trade union movement can and must help to solve.

In such a world there is no more effective force for stability and progress than the free trade union movement. We can perform no greater service than to strengthen that movement in every way we can. We must work together, share our knowledge and resources and bring our combined weight to bear on the problems that beset us all. We must, above all, persuade our governments to work together to seek workable, joint solutions to our mutual problems.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT has a duty to involve itself much more deeply in national and international decision-making and to concern itself with corporate behavior, as well.

Until enforceable international standards are developed, our unions must do all we can to see that companies based in our own countries behave decently and observe the laws of other countries in which they do business.

We have a duty not only to insist that our employers and our governments protect and advance human rights, but to throw our own energies and resources into the battle wherever we can be of help. It is our job to assist in the creation and development of free trade unions among the workers of all countries in which help is needed.

Trade unionism and the hopeful, self-respecting spirit it fosters are essential if the peoples of developing countries are to succeed in creating a just, stable and democratic society.

Carter's Economic Advisers Leave 'Trickle-Down' Advice

By Gus Tyler

ON JAN. 17, a mere three days before a new President was to be inaugurated, the Council of Economic Advisers, appointed by the outgoing President, made its report to Congress. That report was unnecessary—in more than one way.

The council is appointed by a sitting President to make regular reports to Congress on the economic state of the nation on the assumption that the chief executive will listen, pay heed, make recommendations to the legislature on economic policy, especially on how to maintain full employment. For the advisers of an ex-President to give advice to a new President, especially one of an opposing party, seems useless.

FOR THIS SORT of foolishness, no one is to blame except the law. The council is mandated to make its report. Perhaps, it would be best to rewrite the legislation so that the council is under no obligation to go through this ridiculous ritual.

Having no alternative but to make a report, this council might have distinguished itself by making a statement that would have been as histrionic in its impact as it would be historic in its worth. The council might have said that it was appointed four years ago to cope with stagflation, that it had plans to do so, that it abandoned those plans early, that it proceeded to do almost exactly what its predecessors had done, that it failed—as Nixon and Ford had failed—to solve the problem, that matters went from bad to worse.

It could then have done the unexpected by saying: "We made a big mistake; go thou and do otherwise."

But that is not what the council said. It did just the opposite. It called upon the new President and Congress to continue in the ways of the 1970s—to do as Nixon, Ford, and this present council have been doing.

THE ADVICE IS summed up in one paragraph that, after it is translated from fashionable economese into straight English, tells the whole story.

"Tax measures focused on increasing supply can make a significant contribution," it says. But plainly, that means tax measures that will give investors more money to invest in what are supposed to be "supply" producing undertakings.

"In the process of learning some needed lessons in supply-side economics, however, the nation cannot afford to forget its hard-learned lessons about the need for demand-side restraint." Put plainly, that means policies not simply to hold down government spending, but also to hold down overall demand by curbing consumer dollars.

WHEN WE PUT these two thoughts together about expanding the supply side and curbing the demand side we end up with a simplistic solution: give more of the nation's income to investors and give less of the nation's income to consumers.

That kind of advice seems unnecessary to give to the incoming Administration. To redistribute the nation's wealth from those who have a little to those who have much has been almost standard Republican policy for about a century. Reagan really doesn't need a "Democratic" Council of Economic Advisers to teach him the "drip-down" theory of economics.

The Inspiration of Polish Workers

It is hypocritical, two-faced political expediency to praise the workers of Poland for seeking the right all workers should have and, in the next breath, condemn American workers for also seeking the same rights.

If it is right for Polish workers—and it most definitely is right—then it is also right for American workers.

We draw inspiration from the Polish workers. We offer them all the support we can muster through contributions to the AFL-CIO's Polish Workers Fund.

They have raised our consciousness as trade unionists and our hopes for the future. We thank them for doing more than their share to make ours a better movement and this a better world. They've raised the consciousness of the world about the never-ending striving of people for freedom and dignity.

Appeal of Black Conservatives Rings Hollow to Workers, Poor

By Norman Hill

IN MID-DECEMBER, newspapers devoted front-page coverage to a conference of blacks in San Francisco. However, what made the conference noteworthy was not its size—there were about 100 participants—nor the range of organizations which were represented—few of the participants could be said to represent significant black constituencies. What was special about the meeting, what made it news, was the fact that it was a gathering of black conservatives.

Of equal importance was the fact that the conference was sponsored by a conservative foundation which Ronald Reagan helped found in the early 1970s. In 1980 Ronald Reagan failed to attract a significant portion of the black vote. The overwhelming majority of black community and political leaders endorsed President Carter in his unsuccessful bid for re-election. Yet despite little black enthusiasm for Ronald Reagan, a number of black intellectuals and professionals have begun to embrace Reagan's conservative economic positions.

TO SOME EXTENT there is evidence to suggest that there is a small constituency for conservative political ideas in the black community. However, despite the growth of a black upper-middle class of professionals and businessmen who might be drawn to the conservative siren song of tax cuts, the overwhelming majority of blacks are workers and the poor. For them the appeal of black conservatism will ring hollow, and for this reason one can confidently predict that blacks will continue to be a solid voting block which backs pro-labor candidates who support policies dedicated to a more equitable distribution of wealth.

Nonetheless, the two-day conference in San Francisco indicates that a debate will have to begin for the first time within the black community on political options. This debate, in my view, will be a healthy one insofar as it helps sharpen the arguments of black liberals and moderates.

Who, then, are the black conservatives and what do they stand for? The two leading pronoments of black conservatism are Prof. Thomas Sowell, an economist from the Hoover Institution, and Prof. Walter Williams of Temple University in Philadelphia. Both are strong opponents of organized labor, which they claim limits opportunities for blacks. Their view, however, flies in the face of the evidence that organized labor, more than any other institution in American life, has opened its doors to increased black participation. Indeed, today, over 30 percent of black workers are union members. Rather than adopting a policy of exclusion, the labor movement has sought better working conditions for all its workers, irrespective of race. And, most importantly, unions effectively represent their members, who on the average receive $2,000 per year more than non-union workers and have better health and retirement benefits.

A SECOND FAVORITE target of Sowell and Williams is the minimum wage. They argue that the minimum wage is responsible for the inordinately high rate of black teenage unemployment and propose that it be eliminated entirely. At the least, they feel, a sub-minimum wage should be established for teenagers. Their prescription for black teenage unemployment would be worse than the disease it is meant to cure. For a teenage sub-minimum wage would displace unskilled adult workers, a large proportion of whom are blacks with family obligations.

Under conditions of full employment, where every adult is guaranteed a job, the implementation of the youth sub-minimum wage would be of less serious consequence. Under conditions where unemployment stands at nearly 8 percent nation-wide and with figures several percentage points higher among blacks, the implementation of a youth sub-minimum wage would produce disastrous consequences for adult black unskilled workers.

Yet despite the fact that the views of Sowell and Williams are not in the interests of most blacks, the black conservatives cannot be dismissed as mere oddities. They are reflective of the sense of frustration with the state of the economy most blacks have felt in the last decade. In this way they mirror the dissatisfaction which moved many Americans to vote for Ronald Reagan.

IF THE CONSERVATIVE policies which Walter Williams and Thomas Sowell espouse are implemented by the new Administration, blacks and all working Americans will be able to judge the merits of the conservative approach. If history is to serve as any guide, these policies will be found wanting and will be repudiated in future elections.

And within the black community, those who have consistently favored progressive social programs and who have actively participated in the labor movement should welcome the opportunity to challenge the views of the black conservatives. Complacency can hardly be characterized as indicative of leadership. And the coming Reagan years give little reason for us to be complacent.

'Heavily Weighted' Treatment

Television Medium Falls Short In Portraying Workers, Unions

THE TELEVISION MEDIUM, the main source of news and information for most Americans, is not meeting its responsibility in its portrayal of workers and the world of work, President William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists declared in a network radio interview.

Reporting on the results of a 14-month project in which 1,500 Machinists monitored prime time programming on the three major TV networks, Winpisinger said that "unions are virtually invisible" in dramatic and entertainment programs. Even when plot situations have union aspects, he said, "the role of the union in improving life on the job—working conditions, wages and hours—is almost never illustrated."

He said the "inability or unwillingness of television to deal with work in America on a real-life basis" is having a "very adverse effect on employment or career selection among young people," who are "turned off to industrial employment."

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO public affairs program, Labor News Conference, Winpisinger stressed that "pitifully little effort is devoted to helping viewers understand what union members do—the hard, tough, dirty jobs they do every day of their lives to provide the comforts that society enjoys." He said network executives have been largely unresponsive to the union's efforts to get a "fair shake" for workers and union activity.

WINPISINGER SAID that television news, according to the monitors, is as unbalanced as entertainment programs. He said the monitors found the treatment of news stories "heavily weighted on the corporate side of the equation," with the best performance five to one and the worst seven to one, "heavy on the corporate side."

The Machinists' union is using the survey data to follow up with personal visits to local television outlets to encourage closer compliance with the fairness, equal time and other provisions of broadcasting legislation, Winpisinger noted. If that approach is rejected, he said, the union is prepared to make specific appearances in license renewal proceedings.

Reporters questioning Winpisinger were Philip Shabecoff of the New York Times and Frank Swoboda of the Washington Post. Labor News Conference is aired weekly by Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AMERICA'S WORKFORCE today is increasingly female. Most women have or seek full-time, not part-time jobs. The majority work out of economic necessity, and are concentrated in lower-paying jobs.

A top goal of the labor movement during the 1980s is to reach these women, to address their concerns and, most of all, to convince them the labor movement has something important to offer.

Some ideas emerged at a recent conference on organizing women. A highlight of the meeting was a panel presentation by union organizers who discussed strategies and techniques used in recent campaigns involving mainly female workforces.

PAT SCARCELLI of Food & Commercial Workers Local 1357 described an effort to organize more than 100 women employed at the Burlington coat factory in Delaware County outside Philadelphia. The workforce was dominated by women working part-time and by high school students, she noted. It was the men in the plant, janitors, who first contacted the union.

Scarcelli described her approach to the women: "Instead of talking about unions, I talked about them as people." She asked, "How can you be a role model for your children if you're only earning $3.10 an hour?"

THE WORD GOT around that there was this woman "talking about self-worth," and more and more women were drawn to the union cause. Scarcelli said, "I made them believe in themselves."

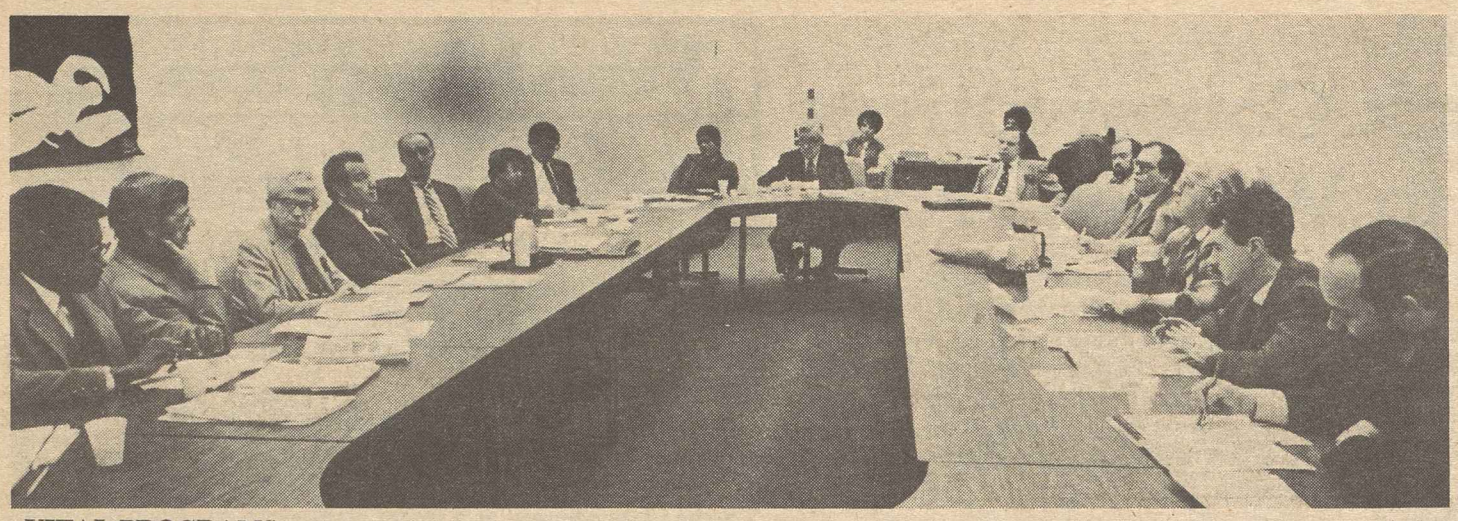
Ernestine Weaver of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers discussed an organizing campaign at a Sunbeam plant in the right-to-work state of Arkansas. The workforce numbered about 450 employees and was 90 percent female.

Organizers focused on the families and not just the employees. They tried to educate the community about unions, and they considered the attitudes and responsibilities of the women workers.

Weaver dropped into church services of various denominations every Sunday. Respecting the mores of the community, she served only non-alcoholic beverages at union meetings. Also, meetings were limited to one hour and were scheduled at times to accommodate family obligations such as caring for children and preparing the evening meal.

THE ORGANIZERS worked to educate the community about the goals and accomplishments of labor unions, including labor's role in such efforts as winning and improving a federal minimum wage law that benefits all workers, Weaver said.

Karen O'Rourke, national representative of the Federation of Nurses & Health Professionals, an affiliate of the Teachers, pointed out that in the health care industry, 80 percent of the workers are unorganized and 90 percent are women.



Among the difficulties facing organizers is the need to hold many union meetings due to shift work and the isolation of workers who are assigned to separate patient units and may work many years in the same facility without knowing another co-worker, O'Rourke said.

One method used to introduce people to the labor movement was for the union to demonstrate its concern for workplace issues. O'Rourke said the union sponsored a seminar on burn trauma. Organizers also worked at building a community coalition of allies among senior citizens, state senators and women's groups, she said.

THE UNION WAS up against a number of management consulting firms including the notorious Modern Management Methods, O'Rourke noted. Employers spent more than $1 million at six facilities during a period of 18 months to defeat the union. Salaries rose by 18 to 24 percent, she said. Of the victories, one of the five hospitals is negotiating and the others are refusing to bargain, O'Rourke added.

THE FAILURE of American television to accurately portray the role of workers and their unions in news and entertainment programs was documented in a 14-month survey project of prime-time programming, Machinists President William W. Winpisinger, center, said on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO vice president was questioned by Philip Shabecoff, left, of the New York Times and Frank Swoboda of the Washington Post. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

VITAL PROGRAMS such as social security, unemployment compensation, welfare and food stamps were discussed by the AFL-CIO Social Security Committee at its meeting at the federation's headquarters in Washington. The committee is headed by AFL-CIO Vice President Sol C. Chaikin, president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Flood of Illegal Aliens Tied To Profits for Employers

Employers will continue to hire and exploit illegal aliens as long as they profit from doing so and aren't penalized when they are caught, the General Accounting Office warned in a report to Congress.

The GAO reported that the flow of "undocumented workers" into the United States is increasing and "in a time of high unemployment, more American citizens are being displaced from the workforce."

EFFORTS TO DEAL with the problem have had only "limited success," the report noted. It said the Labor Dept. "lacks the necessary enforcement tools to deter employers from hiring nonagricultural undocumented workers, and employers making a practice of hiring such workers remain virtually free from punishment."

The Labor Dept. could do a more effective job of wage-hour enforcement targeted to areas where there is extensive hiring of illegal aliens, the GAO suggested. But it conceded that even the most vigorous enforcement of existing law would not "significantly" reduce the flow of undocumented workers into the United States.

THE GAO, an independent agency that is an arm of Congress rather than the Executive Branch of government, strongly suggested the need for legislation imposing sanctions against establishments that knowlingly hire illegal aliens—along lines urged by former President Carter nearly three years ago. But it said consideration of statutory sanctions should be held up pending completion of the study and recommendations of the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy. The commission is expected to submit its report by March.

The GAO recommended a number of administrative improvements and proposed a change in the Fair Labor Standards Act to close a loophole that allows employers to pocket much of the money they have saved by shortchanging undocumented workers.

WHEN A WAGE-HOUR investigation uncovers violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act, employers are required to pay the workers the amounts owed them. But if a former worker can't be located—which is often the case with undocumented—the employer gets to keep the money.

The GAO proposed that back wages due any employees who cannot be located—whether or not they are in the United States legally—be deposited in the U.S. Treasury.

"Such legislative action would create some deterrent to employers who may pay undocumented workers less than the Fair Labor Standards Act requires because of their transitory status in the hope of retaining any back wages the Labor Dept. determines are due," the GAO said.

BUT IT stressed that improved enforcement of the wage-hour law will not of itself make a visible dent in the illegal immigration problem.

"Many undocumented workers earn at or above prevailing minimum wage rates," the GAO noted, "and those who receive less tend to refrain from complaining."

Rail Unions Hit Benefits Denial On Rock Island

Railway union leaders reacted sharply to the refusal of Supreme Court Justice John P. Stevens to lift an injunction against an employee benefits program for laid-off workers of the bankrupt Rock Island Railroad.

Chairman Fred J. Kroll of the Railway Labor Executives Association said the workers are being denied "the kind of economic protection which has been traditional in our industry when railroads terminate their operations."

THE LINE went out of existence early in 1980 as a result of long-time mismanagement and laid off some 8,000 operating and non-operating employees. In April, Congress passed legislation to provide benefits similar to those made available to laid-off employees of the bankrupt Milwaukee Road up to a total of $75 million.

The Rock Island's trustee held that the congressional enactment was unconstitutional and obtained an injunction barring its implementation. The workers' union representatives appealed and the case went to Justice Stevens last fall.

Stevens refused to overturn the federal district court's decision to issue the injunction, saying that if the funds were given to the former workers there would be no way to recover them if the law were later declared unconstitutional.

Congress late last year rewrote the statute in line with Stevens's positions to permit distribution of the funds. At the same time, the trustee of the Rock Island was given authority to use the federal government for recovery of the $75 million if it later proved necessary.

AGAIN, HOWEVER, the Rock Island trustee refused to distribute the congressionally approved funds, and the unions appealed again. The Court of Appeals, in a tied decision, did not overrule, and the case went to Justice Stevens who, without explanation, again refused to rule on it.

The unions are seeking reconsideration of the case from other members of the Supreme Court. Meanwhile, Kroll noted, after nearly 10 months the bankruptcy trustee and his lawyer are each receiving nearly $200,000 a year while the former Rock Island employees have not received a cent of the severance money.

Steelworkers Win Mississippi Election

New Albany, Miss.—A majority of the 145 employees of Mesker Steel Co. here voted to be represented by the Steelworkers in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The USWA election victory capped a four-month organizing campaign coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. with the support of local labor organizations.

Donovan Takes Office as New Labor Secretary

The FBI conducted what the chairman of the Labor & Human Resources Committee, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), termed "the most thorough and exhaustive background investigation ever conducted on a Cabinet nominee." He quoted the supervisor of the investigations as reporting that it developed "no information which would reflect unfavorably upon Mr. Donovan in any manner."

Donovan's nomination was supported by all Senate Republicans and a majority of Democrats. The 17 opposing votes included the five Democrats on the Labor Committee, who voted "present" on the committee's favorable recommendation.

Donovan, 50, earned a degree at a Catholic seminary, and since 1959 has been one of the two top officials of the Schiavonne Construction Co. in New Jersey.

His duties with the firm have included negotiating with building trades unions representing the company's employees.

At Senate hearings, Donovan said he hoped to "build bridges" between management and labor.

He supported Reagan's bid for the 1976 Republican presidential nomination, raised funds for his campaign, and directed Reagan's successful campaign in New Jersey in both the primary and general elections last year.

Index Points To Slowdown Of Economy

A drop in a key government barometer of future economic activity indicated another slowdown may lie ahead for the nation.

After six consecutive months of increase, the Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators declined eight-tenths of 1 percent in December. While a single month's change in the index is inconclusive as far as detecting a trend, the drop seemed to bear out the views of analysts who have held that the runup of interest rates in the past few months is cutting into business expansion.

Felix Tamm, the department's economist in charge of the index, said the December decline "confirms what we've been worried about. Interest rates have been going up, and that's causing huge increases in business costs. That should be viewed with great concern."

SEVEN OF the index's 10 indicators declined in December, including orders to factories for new goods, contracts for new plant and equipment, and issuance of building permits, which represents future construction. Factory layoffs held steady, as did the average workweek of manufacturing workers, at 40.2 hours.

Other components that contributed to the decline were the money supply in 1972 dollars, stock prices, the change in sensitive crude materials prices, and the change in total liquid assets.

Meanwhile, the government announced that sales of new one-family houses dropped 25 percent in 1980, with the downward trend continuing through December. The median sale price, $64,000 for the year, was up only 3 percent from the 1979 median of $62,900. But by December, the average price had risen to $67,900.

The government also released a report showing a drop in American business productivity for the third year in a row. For 1980 as a whole, productivity in private business fell three-tenths of 1 percent, following declines of two-tenths of 1 percent in 1978 and four-tenths of 1 percent in 1979.

Productivity, an important measure of the economy's efficiency, measures the output per hour of the nation's work force.

Workshop Sessions Slated For Regional Conferences

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland announced further details for the federation's seven regional conferences beginning in March and said he had found the union response to the conferences "encouraging."

In a letter to all affiliates, Kirkland said the regional conferences will consist of six workshops on the first full day of the schedule, with eight others offered on the closing morning.

THE CONFERENCE will open with a dinner and address by Kirkland and close with a "summing up" session by him and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. Those are the only two, plenary sessions of the conferences and will be the only two open to the press, Kirkland said.

The full-day schedule calls for one workshop to be presented by Kirkland and Donahue, two by COPE and the other three by the AFL-CIO legal, legislative and organizing departments. All other AFL-CIO departments will be represented on the closing morning, with each session offered twice. All of the sessions will be 50 minutes, Kirkland said, with maximum time allowed for discussion.

In announcing the conferences, Kirkland described them as "a time to re-examine labor's aspirations and challenges, a time to strengthen and nourish the local roots of our movement." Kirkland termed that particularly appropriate for the AFL-CIO during its centennial year.

IN HIS LETTER outlining the conference format, Kirkland thanked the presidents of affiliated unions and of state and local central bodies for the response in registration for the conferences and urged all who had not done so to pre-register by mail so the workshops can be organized at the optimum size to facilitate discussion.

"We are determined to conduct the regional conferences with a maximum of two-way communication and a minimum of speech-making," Kirkland said.

The schedule for the seven conferences is Mar. 5-6-7 in Philadelphia, Mar. 9-10-11 in Boston, Mar. 19-20-21 in Chicago, Mar. 26-27-28 in San Francisco, Mar. 30-31-Apr. 1 in Denver, Apr. 2-3-4 in Atlanta and June 4-5-6 in New Orleans.

Family Budget Costs Outstrip Wages

The income needed for a typical family of four to maintain a moderate standard of living in the United States—$442 a week—is far more than the average worker takes home, AFL-CIO Economist Anne Draper points out in the current issue of the American Federationist.

Draper's article, "Crisis in the Family Budget, 1981," reviews the Labor Dept.'s "urban family budgets" compiled annually to show how much income an urban family of four needs to keep up a lower, intermediate or higher standard of living.

THE MOST recent calculations done by the Bureau of Labor Statistics for Autumn 1979 show national averages of $20,517 needed for the intermediate budget, $12,585 for the lower and $30,217 for the higher.

But by late 1980, Draper points out, the continued rapid rise in consumer prices had driven budget costs even higher. New official figures have not been released, but the AFL-CIO estimates that the intermediate budget would have risen to about $23,000 by September 1980, the lower to about $14,000 and the higher to about $34,500.

Yet an average wage-earner family of four, dependent on a single paycheck, would have an annual income of only $12,464 or $239.69 a week at September 1980 weekly earnings level, Draper notes. Thus, even the lower standard of living described by the government is beyond such a family's reach.

THE SQUEEZE has been tightest over the three years from Autumn 1977 to September 1980, she points out, since the increase in the costs of the urban family budgets would be more than the increase in the entire preceding five years.

The budgets are compiled by BLS for 24 metropolitan areas and Anchorage, Alaska. Averages for non-metropolitan areas are given on a regional basis, and the agency compiles a national average using all the figures.

The budget costs are calculated specifically for an urban family of four consisting of a 38-year-old husband employed full time, a wife who does not work outside the home, a 13-year-old son and an 8-year-old daughter. The budgets cover necessary outlays for living expenses and holding a job as well as social security payments and income taxes.

AMONG THEIR uses, the budgets are reference points in certain types of legislation dealing with eligibility for various benefits and, Draper notes, they are useful in collective bargaining. The intermediate budget, the key figure for wage earners, represents the costs of maintaining an urban family of four at a "modest" American standard of living.

The budgets are based on a list of goods and services, and their quantities, that a family buys to meet its needs. Although the "budget family" was chosen as being fairly representative, there are obviously many other types of families, Draper observes, and, while the intermediate budget is called "moderate," it is neither barebones subsistence nor luxury. It is not intended to describe the buying habits of any particular income class.

Instead, Draper explains, it is a composite of items, such as food, clothing, personal care and shelter, selected on the basis of scientific standards defining necessities for family functioning such as food purchases; on surveys showing trends in basic living arrangements such as homeownership or rental and automobile ownership; and on survey findings that describe quantities of items families consider essential for minimum satisfaction of their wants and needs, such as home furnishings and clothing.

AT THE intermediate level, Draper's article explains, about 75 percent of the "budget families" are considered to be homeowners, and virtually all own an automobile typically described as being two years old when purchased and kept for four years.

The family eats on a "moderate-cost family food plan" established by the Agriculture Dept. which allows for somewhat varied and nutritionally adequate meals, including some higher-priced cuts of meat, some convenience foods and some meals away from home.

The "budget family," Draper observes, is also described in terms of appliances it typically owns or buys, clothing purchases, medical expenses, personal entertainment costs and other typical budget items.

THE LOWER and higher budgets are put together from lists that are variants of the intermediate budget, although the contents of the three lists are similar. Generally, the BLS calculates the lower budget based on the assumption that the "budget family" buys cheaper alternatives or items at lower prices, thus getting poorer quality. The higher budget family is assumed to make more expensive selections where alternatives are available, or to pay above-average prices for items of better quality.

For the intermediate budget in the fall of 1979, the "net" budget after income and social security taxes was $16,230. Food costs took up 31 percent of this and housing costs accounted for another 28 percent, for a total of some 59 percent of spendable income.

Transportation and clothing were the next largest components, taking up some 19 percent of spendable income. The remaining 22 percent was divided among personal care (2.7 percent), medical care (7.2 percent) and a number of other costs.

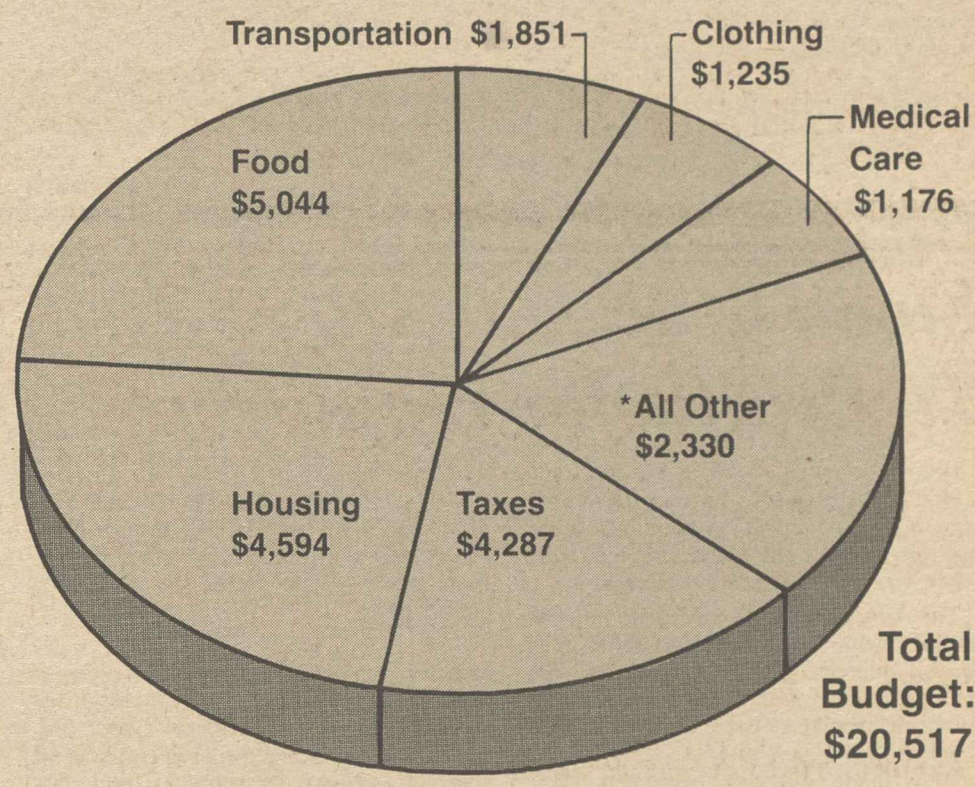
AT THE LOWER budget level, food was even more important, even though costs for this budget are figured on a scaled-down cheaper diet. Out of the total after-tax budget of $10,773, food costs were $3,911 or 36 percent. Housing costs were much lower than the intermediate budget, accounting for about 22 percent.

In the remainder of the lower budget, the most important component was medical care. Draper points out that although the dollar amount spent was similar to that for the intermediate budget, it required a larger percentage (11 percent) of spendable income.

Higher-budget families spend some 31 percent of their after-tax income on housing, the article notes, and while their budgets assign some $6,360 to food costs, this is only 28 percent of the family outlay.

IN HIGHER-BUDGET families, larger percentages of income are available to spend on items such as recreation and personal care, and even though medical costs are more expensive than the other two budgets, they account for only 5.4 percent of the higher budget.

Tax payments, including income and social security, are an important portion of the budgets compiled by the BLS, Draper notes. They are calculated separately to show what a family's total income must be to have enough left over to cover necessary living expenses. Sales and property taxes are not calculated separately, Draper observes, but are included in the prices of items bought and in home ownership costs.



The article also points out that since 1967, when all three family budgets were first priced, costs have more than doubled —up 126 percent for the intermediate, 113 percent for the lower and 132 percent for the higher budget. Nearly one-third of this increase took place between Autumn 1977 and Autumn 1979. In the period from 1978 to 1979 alone, the intermediate budget rose by 10.2 percent, the lower by 9 percent and the higher by 10.6 percent.

TRANSPORTATION costs showed the largest percentage increase in all three budgets, up about 13 percent, primarily in response to a 51-percent increase in the cost of gasoline.

Food, housing and medical care costs were in the 9 to 10 percent increase range, and social security and income taxes were up 12.5 percent in the intermediate budget, 9.6 percent in the lower and 13.8 percent in the higher budgets.

Loan Options Allowed for Pension Investments

A Labor Dept. decision clearing the way for multiemployer pension plans to make loans to participants and beneficiaries at reduced interest rates was welcomed as "a giant step forward" to spur home construction and create jobs for union building trades craftsmen.

Describing the action as a "green light to do really good things with pension money," President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said at a press conference that "we believe this approach provides the flexibility necessary to implement a reasonable and realistic loan program."

THE LABOR DEPT.'s ruling is in response to a July 1980 request by the National Coordinating Committee for Multiemployer Plans which Georgine also heads.

In seeking approval of the program, the Coordinating Committee maintained that residential mortgage loans can be made at below the going interest rate without violating the provisions of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA).

The Labor Dept. concurred, but with the understanding that both the program and the loans meet the "prudent" investment standard of the 1974 law and that a "reasonable rate of interest" be charged for the mortgage loans.

Ian D. Lanoff, administrator of pension programs, said in a letter to Georgine that the Labor Dept. doesn't view the prevailing loan interest rate as a rigid number, but rather as a composite of the rates charged by various lenders.

THESE LOWER rates may be considered a "reasonable rate of interest" under certain circumstances, Lanoff agreed. The circumstances are that the loan involve no greater risk than some other investments and that they be prudent for the overall good of the plan so as not to provide a lesser return than some other investments.

Georgine pointed out that the thrust of a recent series of BCTD seminars was the development of programs to provide maximum benefits for participants and beneficiaries.

"Year after year, the professional investment managers who control the assets in our plans have pursued traditional investment policies that provide miserable returns," Georgine observed.

AT THE SAME TIME, he said, they "undercut not only the social objectives of participants and beneficiaries, but their well-being as well."

Trustees of the collectively bargained pension plans have an obligation to make sound investments that promote the unionized sector of the economy and their particular unionized industry while providing the best return to participants and beneficiaries, Georgine said.

This approach, he stressed, "can also provide additional jobs, which in turn generate additional contributions to the plan and provide participants with additional opportunities to accumulate service credits for vesting and benefit accrual purposes."

GEORGINE estimated that BCTD affiliates are participants in plans holding $50 billion of the $80-$90 billion total assets in multiemployer pension plants.

The percentage of pension funds that will be invested in mortgages will depend on the portfolios of individual pension plans, he said.

"It is not our place to set a rate for the plans. The amounts are judgments of the trustees to make."

Georgine reported that the National Association of Home Builders and mortgage bankers have already expressed support of the low-interest loan program. And he said he doubts employers will have any objection to the ruling since the program will obviously increase business in their area.

IN A RELATED development, the Labor Dept. has granted a class exemption under ERISA permitting employee benefit plans to invest in real estate mortgage pools.

A mortgage pool is an investment fund composed of first mortgages or deeds of trust on single-family residential property which are held by a trustee independent of the pool sponsor. The sponsor of the pool sells certificates representing shares in the fund.

The Labor Dept. said that the exemption, which is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1975, will provide greater freedom and flexibility for pension plans to buy, sell and exchange mortgage pool investment fund certificates.

Cutoff Triggered

215,000 Jobless Lopped From Extended Benefits

A gradual drop in the insured unemployment rate has triggered-off the national extended unemployment benefits program which provides up to 13 weeks of additional payments to persons still jobless after having used up the maximum 26 weeks of state benefits.

The immediate effect is a cutoff of payments to some 215,000 persons in 25 states and the District of Columbia who have been receiving extended benefits.

BUT A LARGER group of 475,000 jobless persons will continue to receive extended benefits because the insured unemployment rate (IUR) in their states is high enough to qualify under the separate state trigger.

The national program ended because the IUR dropped below the 4.5 percent trigger point. The IUR is the percentage of unemployment among persons covered by unemployment insurance. It is always lower than the overall unemployment rate because it does not count persons who are seeking jobs for the first time, reentering the labor force after an absence, or who had been employed in jobs not covered by unemployment insurance.

The IUR has been dipping gradually since the end of September, when it was 4.96 percent. The trigger-off resulted from a 4.49 percent IUR for the week that ended Jan. 3 and the cutoff of benefits became effective Jan. 24.

IF THE IUR again moves up to 4.5 percent or higher, the program will trigger-on again nationally and will remain in effect for at least a 13-week period. Persons who have been cut off from benefits and are still unemployed would have their eligibility restored. However, the insured unemployment rate for the week that ended Jan. 10 showed a continued drop to 4.45 percent.

State programs are touched off by a different trigger—either an IUR of 5 percent or, alternatively, an IUR of 4 percent that is also at least 20 percent higher than the state's average for the previous two years.

Under the state trigger, extended benefit programs remain in effect in Puerto Rico and these 25 states:

ALABAMA, ALASKA, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont, Washington, West Virginia and Wisconsin.

Congress last year imposed more stringent standards for extended benefits than are required for regular state benefits, including the obligation to take jobs at lower pay outside a worker's normal field. Other changes imposed a one-week waiting period for the few states that do not require this for regular state benefits and denied extended benefits, even after a state-imposed waiting period, to persons fired from their job for misconduct.

Debt Limit Vote Agonizing Test For Republicans

On the showdown, the Republicans came to heel and voted 150-36 for the debt limit increase. They were joined by a 154-68 majority of Democrats.

IN THE SENATE, which was to take up the bill later, Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.) also warned bluntly that Reagan can count on Democratic votes only if he can muster support from a majority of his own party.

Sen. Alan Cranston (Calif.) said Democrats were fed up with "totally demagogic, irresponsible" attacks on their past votes for raising the debt limit. And Sen. Ernest Hollings (D-S.C.) recalled that the two North Carolina Republican senators, Jesse Helms and John P. East, ran campaign ads using a debt ceiling vote to help defeat Democrat Robert Morgan.

On the forthcoming debt ceiling bill, Hollings said, "I'll withhold my vote until Jesse Helms votes for it."

Senate Republican Leader Howard Baker (Tenn.) said he thought most Republicans would come around and support the bill. But he asked understanding. It's "a wrenching experience" for many of them, he explained.

Davis Named to Panel On Alcohol Abuse

Walter G. Davis, AFL-CIO Community Services director, has been named to the national advisory council of the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism of the U.S. Health & Human Services Dept. The appointment, made by former HHS Sec. Patricia Harris, was announced Feb. 2.

The 12-member council, established under the Public Health Service Act, reviews programs of the alcohol abuse institute.

LABOR PROBLEMS IN ASIA and other parts of the world were discussed at a planning conference of the AFL-CIO's Asian American Free Labor Institute at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. The meeting was chaired by AAFLI Director Morris Paladino, center, who was joined on the panel by Charles D. Gray, AAFLI deputy director; AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Ernest Lee; Dale Good, assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland; and Robert Wholey, AAFLI deputy for administration and field administration.

Rights Commitment Stressed In Salute to UN Ambassador

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO remains firmly committed to human rights as an integral and governing principle of United States foreign policy, and "strongly asserts that the future of human rights depends on democratic institutions," Federation President Lane Kirkland declared at a luncheon honoring Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, the new U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations.

Kirkland joined some 150 other leaders from the labor, business, professional, and academic communities in paying tribute to the Georgetown University government professor. Sponsored by the Coalition for a Democratic Majority, which she helped to found, the luncheon honored Kirkpatrick "for helping us understand how much a strong America means to the advance of international human rights."

KIRKLAND congratulated the new UN ambassador on her selection to represent the United States before the world body, and noted that she has been "a good friend of the AFL-CIO as well as of what Sen. Moynihan has called the 'liberty party,' " that is, that band of liberty-seeking individuals that knows no national boundaries.

"Your appointment shines especially bright, and we wish you all the best," Kirkland said.

In her remarks, which followed testimonials by several other speakers, Kirkpatrick noted that she has been "in total solidarity" with the AFL-CIO and "I expect to work side by side" with the federation in the future. "I've always insisted on the centrality of human rights in U.S. foreign policy," said Kirkpatrick.

GUESTS INCLUDED Senators Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), and Edward Zorinsky (D-Neb.); British Ambassador Nicholas Henderson; Israeli Ambassador Ephraim Evron; retired Adm. Elmo Zumwalt; Washington attorney Max Kampelman, the co-chairman of the official U.S. delegation to the Madrid review conference of the Helsinki agreement; CDM chairman and political analyst Ben J. Wattenberg, and Cuban freedom fighter Huber Matos, released over a year ago after a 20-year sentence in Castro's jails.

Sen. Jackson pledged his cooperation with the new ambassador, observing that her appointment is a happy occasion, since it gives "one of our members who is joining the new Administration" a chance "to carry on the battle from the inside."

The CDM will have to "watchdog the Republican foreign and defense team," Jackson warned. "And we have to redouble our efforts to bring the Democratic Party into the 1980s, prepared again to govern the country."

MATOS, WHO now lives in Florida as president of the Congress for an Independent and Democratic Cuba, said through an interpreter that the CDM and Kirkpatrick helped obtain his freedom from prison. Freedom-loving Cubans welcomed her nomination to the UN, he said, adding that she "unites in herself the qualities of a fighter for human rights and a strong will against communist expansion." With her in the UN, "we feel represented, too," he said.

The CDM, which has been out front in the struggle for human rights since its formation in the early 1970s, has called for an even-handed, consistent U.S. foreign policy. As Jackson put it, "we have held that something is wrong with a policy on human rights that finds it convenient to criticize the petty dictatorships, with which the world unhappily abounds, but inconvenient to speak out about the Soviet system that inspires repression around the world."

Welles Appointed Chief Of NLRB Law Judges

Melvin J. Welles, 62, a career attorney with the National Labor Relation Board since 1946, was named the agency's chief administrative law judge.

Welles succeeds Arthur Leff, who retired. An associate chief the last two years and an administrative law judge since 1970, Welles will head a corps of more than 100 judges in his new post.

Real Pay Down Sharply in Public Sector

A study of wage movements among state and local public workers over a five-year period, 1974-79, shows a steady loss in buying power due primarily to double-digit inflation.

Published by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., the analysis points out that total average annual earnings for state employees over the five years increased 38.7 percent. But over the same period inflation, as measured by the federal government's consumer price index, surged 47.5 percent.

FOR OTHER public sector workers, the loss in purchasing power was even greater. County employees, for instance, saw their yearly earnings rise an average of only 35.3 percent. Municipal workers' earnings during the five years rose 34.7 percent. For township employees and school district employees, the average five-year rise was 35.5 and 35.8 percent, respectively. The survey is based on figures supplied by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

While both private and public sector workers are being victimized by today's soaring inflation, public sector state and local workers have had to shoulder much more than their share of these wage setbacks, PED Executive Director John Leyden observed.

Updates of wage movements in negotiated settlements show that the trend of lost buying power among state and local workers is increasing rapidly, Leyden said.

DURING THE first half of 1980, he noted, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that state and local government collective bargaining agreements provided an average first-year wage increase of 7 percent. In the same period, Leyden pointed out, the annualized rate of inflation reached 14.7 percent.

"The actual rate of decline in real wages during the first half of 1980 was a devastating 6.7 percent," he said.

"If the wage pattern continues throughout 1980—7 percent first-year wage increases—and with an inflation rate that occurred during 1980 of 12.5 percent, this projects to a loss in real wages and buying power for the state and local public sector workers of 4.9 percent."

LEYDEN SAID that "the losses suggest that some tough collective bargaining will have to take place in the public sector in order to achieve an element of justice and equity for these workers."

The PED analysis, by economist Rick Galleher and Mike Ingrao of the AFL-CIO COPE staff, provides a detailed breakout of earnings changes by state for both state and local employees. The study also includes a comparison of wage movements in the public sector with those in the private sector. Copies are available of both, and may be obtained from Galleher at the PED Research Dept. in Washington.

Cost of Basic Needs Soars 14%

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, February 14, 1981 No. 7

'80 Increase Tops Overall Inflation Rate

Prices of the basic necessities of life—energy, food, shelter, and medical care—outstripped the cost of other goods and items that Americans typically buy in 1980, and the outlook this year is for more of the same.

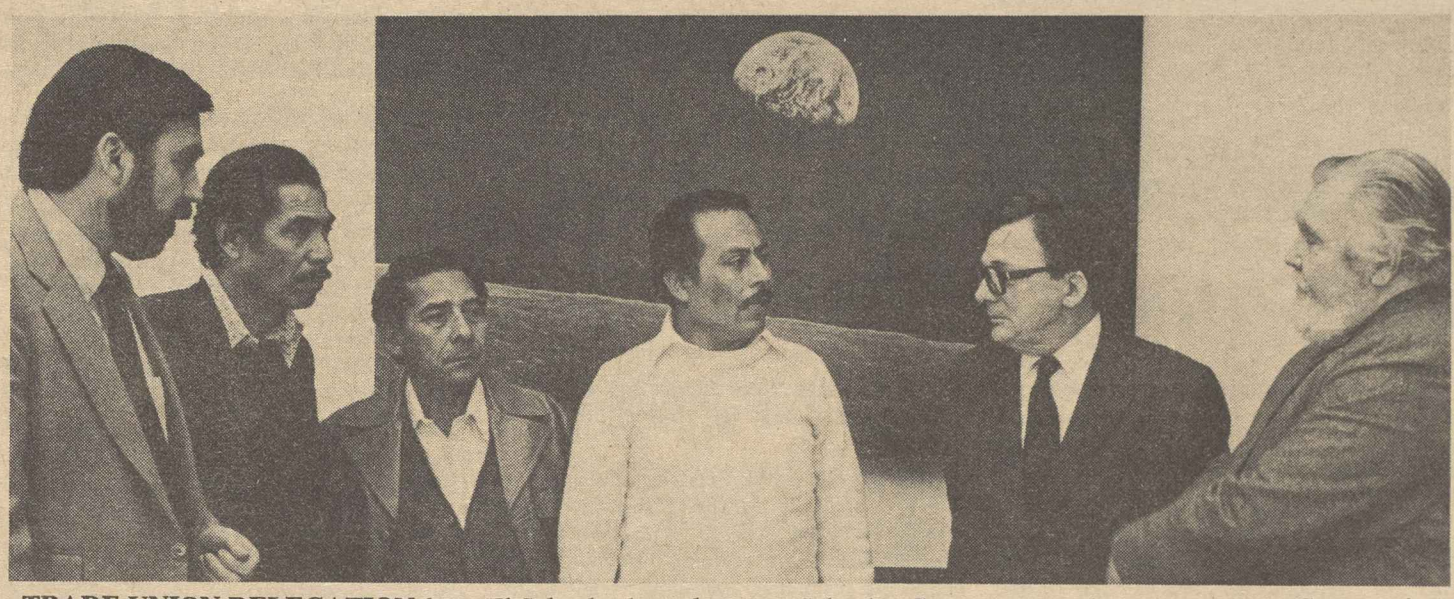
These are the conclusions of two studies of price movements in various sectors of the economy, one by the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Economic Research, the second by the foundation-funded National Center for Economic Alternatives.

THE AFL-CIO ANALYSIS showed that prices of the combined group of necessities rose 14 percent over the twelve months of 1980, while prices of all other non-necessity items went up 9.9 percent. Inflation for the year, as measured by the government's consumer price index, posted a 12.5 percent rate.

A similar study, by the Washington-based National Center for Economic Alternatives, paralleled the federation's findings. Both analyses used data furnished by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Energy prices were the fastest-rising of any sector in 1980, surging 17.9 percent, the AFL-CIO study found. Shelter costs were next, rising 15.4 percent. Food prices were up 10.7 percent, and medical care 10.3 percent. Other items increased at an average of less than 10 percent.

"SINCE 1973, prices of the necessities have persistently risen more than the consumer price index as a whole, except for 1976," the federation study pointed out. "Since 1976, however, prices have been rising at an accelerating rate, paced by food and shelter—and since 1979 by startling increases in energy prices.



"Since 1976, the rise in necessity prices has been well ahead of the rest of the index."

With oil and food prices expected to rise sharply this year and interest rates showing no signs of abating, prices of everyday items are likely to continue to rise faster than other prices in 1981. The necessities—food, housing, energy, and health care—comprise roughly two-thirds of the household budget of the average American family.

ECONOMISTS AT the National Center warned that President Reagan's budget-cutting strategies are not likely to affect price movements in the four key sectors, and that other government policies are likely to make the 1981 inflation picture worse.

"Recent decontrol of crude oil prices,

Vigorous Fight Pledged To Keep OSHA Strong

The AFL-CIO considers the Occupational Safety & Health Act an "indispensable" worker protection and will vigorously oppose any attempt to weaken it, Legislative Director Ray Denison said.

Denison's strong defense of OSHA came in response to a query from Rep. Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.), who is soliciting union views of the effectiveness of OSHA and on legislation that would permanently exempt establishments with 10 or fewer workers in supposedly less-hazardous industries from OSHA safety inspections in the absence of a "reasonable complaint" or serious accident. A similar restriction is currently in effect through an appropriations bill rider.

AS TO OSHA'S enforcement, Denison said it has been vastly improved over the past four years because it has been administered "by a Labor Dept. that believed in the law and tried to make it work."

For the first time, he said, workers and their unions have been consulted on the administration and enforcement of the law. Further, OSHA helped fund programs to train union members "in assessing and dealing with job hazards," and they in turn have trained others.

Long-delayed health and safety standards have been issued, Denison noted, hazardous areas have been identified, and serious injuries have been reduced in targeted areas.

Denison stressed the AFL-CIO's belief that the so-called small business exemption is mere camouflage for "an all-out attack" on the job safety law.

The original intent of Congress, Denison wrote, was to protect all workers from occupational hazards, "not merely some categories defined by occupation, or the number of employees in a workplace, or on an arbitrary determination that some workplaces are more hazardous than others."

DENISON NOTED that America's unions were united in opposition to the bill introduced in the last Congress by former Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.), now Secretary of Health & Human Services in the Reagan Cabinet, to exempt establishments with acceptable safety records, regardless of size.

Forty-one percent of workplace deaths came in those supposedly safe establishments, Denison pointed out.

"OSHA's existence and strong implementation has meant the difference between life and death to thousands of American working men and women," he stressed. "We want to keep the law intact."

Reagan Names Florida Builder To Head OSHA

President Reagan has nominated a Florida construction contractor, Thorne G. Auchter, as assistant secretary of labor and head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Reagan also moved to fill two other key Labor Dept. posts by naming Albert Angrisani as assistant secretary for employment and training and T. Timothy Ryan, Jr. as Labor Dept. solicitor.

Auchter, 35, is executive vice president of the Auchter Co., a Jacksonville, Fla., construction firm which has contracts with Florida building trades unions. His responsibilities in the business have included both labor relations and safety and health issues. He is a director of the Associated General Contractors in Jacksonville.

DURING THE 1980 presidential campaign, Auchter served as director of special events for the Reagan campaign in Florida. In 1972, he was a member of an industry commission that made recommendations on the state's safety and health legislation, and he has served briefly as a legislative coordinator for the state senate rules committee. He is a graduate of Jacksonville University.

Angrisani, 31, has been executive vice president of the Chase Manhattan Bank

House Liberals At Helm of Key Labor Panels

Congressmen with strong records of support for labor's goals will continue to head key subcommittees of the House Education & Labor Committee despite election shakeups.

Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.) will be the new chairman of the Labor-Management Relations subcommittee, replacing Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), who lost his bid for re-election.

Thompson, a champion of worker causes, had a 94 percent "right" voting record by COPE standards. Burton's career voting record is an identical 94 percent.

TO TAKE THE chairmanship, Burton had to give up his chairmanship of the Interior Committee's Subcommittee on National Parks.

He said he agreed to do so because "the

Donovan Follows Through On Freeze of Regulations

Raymond Donovan's first official act as secretary of labor was to follow through on President Reagan's announced freeze of pending regulations by pulling back worker protections on occupational safety, overtime pay and prevailing wages.

The OSHA proposal, on the labeling of toxic substances, was withdrawn, while others were either delayed or "postponed indefinitely." Donovan also announced that the new standard for on-job noise levels, scheduled to take effect Mar. 30, will be "closely scrutinized."

IN ALL, Donovan acted on 19 regulations, with the others delayed for either 60 or 90 days. All of them were items on a list of 101 federal regulations the Chamber of Commerce presented to a Reagan transition team, calling them "costly and burdensome" and urging that they be changed or repealed

The first proposals on which Donovan acted were scheduled to go into effect Feb. 17 under regulations published by the Carter Administration.

The toxic labeling provision was five years in the making and represented what the AFL-CIO has termed a compromise from the best efforts of labor, business, academic and scientific experts. The AFL-CIO had proposed a more thorough labeling system.

THE PROVISIONS for labeling toxic substances were designed to cover hazardous chemicals used in some 328,000 manufacturing facilities employing more than 20 million workers. OSHA's administrator at the time, Eula Bingham, pointed out that a NIOSH study found that only 10 percent of trade name products are labeled when they come on the job, yet such substances account for 70 percent of worker exposure to hazardous materials.

Donovan said the killing of that pro-

LABOR'S INVOLVEMENT in efforts to end discrimination on the job, increase voter participation, improve education opportunities and address economic concerns of minority workers were explored at semi-annual meeting of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee. The committee, headed by Federation Vice President Frederick O'Neal, also reviewed staff reports from the Dept. of Civil Rights and discussed programs for the coming year.

Conservative Budget-Cutting Drive Bypasses True Causes of Inflation

Federal budget deficits are the result of inflation, not the cause of it, and inflation will not be cured simply by balancing the budget or turning the economy over to unregulated "market forces," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald declares in the current issue of the American Federationist.

Oswald's article, "Rebuilding the National Economy," cautions that it is unrealistic to make national economic policy decisions based on "a well-orchestrated right-wing campaign" that preaches indiscriminate slashing of federal budgets at the expense of the poor and jobless and ignores the true causes of inflation—spiraling energy prices and interest rates and the rising costs of food, medical care and housing.

INFLATION MUST be dealt with in terms of the specific problems that cause the inflationary push, Oswald stresses, and balancing the federal budget is only one of numerous factors that must be considered if the nation is going to achieve full employment and balanced growth.

A better program, he suggests is the rejection of inflationary tight-money, high-interest-rate policies and of unjustified budget cuts that ignore human needs. Instead, the AFL-CIO has urged detailed, targeted programs to control both inflation and recession, stabilize prices and create jobs.

The article in the federation's monthly magazine points out that high unemployment itself jolts the federal budget, with each percentage point of unemployment costing the federal treasury $25 to $30 billion in lost tax revenues and related social costs such as unemployment compensation.

"IF UNEMPLOYMENT were one million less in 1982," Oswald observes, "the proposed federal budget would be in balance."

The overall unemployment rate does not reflect discouraged or part-time workers, he notes, nor does it highlight the even bleaker picture for black and minority workers.

While the jobless rate for white workers was 6.5 percent in October 1980, it was 14 percent for blacks and other minorities, and among black teenagers, one out of three was unable to find work.

The job opportunities of black youth will not be improved by a sub-minimum wage for teenagers or increased subsidies for business, Oswald says. Such measures are likely to cause transfer of some jobs from adult workers to teenagers, he notes, but will not create more employment.

RATHER THAN trying to beat inflation by postponing full employment, it is time to adopt the policies and programs of the 1978 Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act, the article maintains.

Among its provisions, the law calls for federal programs to encourage growth and create jobs through the development of energy resources, attention to the needs of urban areas, a national agricultural policy, improved health care and housing, establishment of fair trade policies and encouragement of exports, and others. Thus balancing the federal budget is but one of considerations, Oswald explains.

The law also calls for the development of a variety of specific countercyclical employment programs to aid the jobless and reduce high levels of unemployment, Oswald emphasizes.

"THE FEDERAL budget," he stresses, "should be a tool used to accomplish economic and social goals, not an end unto itself."

With unemployment "at a crisis level" and likely to remain high for several years, Oswald says, "it is time to put serious and realistic efforts into achieving the full employment goals of the Humphrey-Hawkins Act."

The article notes that organized labor stands ready to cooperate with government and business to develop a positive "reindustrialization" program to remedy major economic problems, including targeted investment that would bring together financing from private and public funds

CAPITAL formation, Oswald says, is an integral part of a reindustrialization program, and should be encouraged in the ways suggested by Humphrey-Hawkins rather than a one-dimensional tax solution.

The United States's position as a diversified industrial nation should be strengthened, fair trade policies developed to maintain its economic base and independence, and decaying cities and regions revitalized as part of a reindustrialization program, Oswald says. In addition deficiencies such as deteriorating transportation facilities and obsolete plants and equipment must be remedied and alternative energy sources developed, he stresses.

"That task calls not for the blunt instrument of macro-economic monetary and fiscal policy, but for carefully tailored and targeted micro-economic programs, structures and actions," Oswald observes, adding that it is unrealistic to think that such a task can be accomplished "by simply deregulating. detaxing, and unleashing private enterprise."

AFL-CIO RECOMMENDATIONS, Oswald says, urge pinpointed job stimulus programs, rather than general tax cuts or tax incentives. Such programs, Oswald explains, should include, but not be limited to, public works programs, energy and trasportation development and housing programs that could provide quick relief to those directly injured by loss of jobs while improving the nation's public facilities.

Tax cuts that waste needed revenue by rewarding those sectors of the economy not suffering from high unemployment, and tax cuts that stimulate speculative excesses and inflationary imbalances are opposed by the AFL-CIO, the article stresses.

Lowered interest rates and selective credit programs would be more effective in enhancing productivity and industrial investment than gimmicks such as depreciation speed-ups, Oswald emphasizes.

AT THE SAME time, he says, the government should take over the function of all oil import purchases and reinstitute regulation of gas and oil prices. Food production should be increased with food exports managed by the government, and a national health insurance system should be enacted to assure vital health services for all and control costs.

Such programs are advocated by the AFL-CIO, Oswald emphasizes, as selective approaches that directly address the problems of both inflation and recession in the most equitable way. Solving the nation's economic problems, he says, will require the "full cooperation and concerted efforts" of business, labor and government.

High Court Urged to Uphold Equity's Agent Licensing Plan

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to uphold the position taken by two lower courts and rule that Actors' Equity has valid trade union grounds for requiring its members to deal only with "franchised" theatrical agents who are licensed by the union.

The licensing system is intended to protect Equity members from exploitation and prevent undercutting of salary standards.

IT SETS STANDARD percentage fees for agents and includes a provision that the commission taken by the agent cannot reduce the net salary to the actor below the Equity minimum.

At issue in the case is whether this system violates federal antitrust laws, as a group of dissident agents has charged.

Both U.S. District Judge Constance Baker Motley in New York and a panel of the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals supported Actors' Equity in the case.

The AFL-CIO brief stressed that the conduct being challenged is the unilateral action by a union of disciplining members who use agents not in compliance with franchise standards and therefore is not conduct coming under the antitrust laws.

FURTHER, JUST as collective bargaining agreements between Equity and producers prevent wage undercutting by setting a minimum pay scale, so a standard fee for agents prevents actors from competing with each other for the services of agents by paying bigger commissions.

The appellate court conclusion that "the union cannot eliminate wage competition among its members without regulation of the fees of agents" is valid and should be affirmed, the AFL-CIO urged.

Bill Proposes Quota on Cars From Japan

A bill that would impose a three-year quota on Japanese auto imports has been introduced in the Senate by the Republican chairman and the senior Democrat on the Senate Finance subcommittee that has jurisdiction over trade issues.

Subcommittee Chairman John C. Danforth (R-Mo.) and Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.) proposed to set the import quota at 1.6 million cars a year. That's the average number imported in 1978 and 1979, but 300,000 fewer than Japan sent to the United States last year.

THE BILL WOULD not, however, set a quota on importation of auto parts as the AFL-CIO had urged.

Danforth said import relief is needed to give the U.S. auto industry the breathing spell it needs to retool and get back on its feet. He pointed to the industry's high unemployment, heavy losses by major U.S. auto producers, and a more than twofold rise in auto imports from Japan since 1976.

While the United States has been an open market for Japan, he said, it has faced trade barriers against U.S.-made vehicles in most parts of the world, including Japan.

The new U.S. trade representative, former Republican National Chairman Bill Brock, issued a cautiously worded statement on the Danforth-Bentsen proposal.

HE TERMED introduction of the legislation "understandable in light of the current distress in our automotive industry." The two senators have "performed a useful service in beginning a national debate" on the issue.

But Brock went on to say that imports are not the only cause of the auto industry crisis and other aspects including "tax and regulatory policy . . . require equal and urgent attention."

The sponsoring senators said the legislation they are proposing has strong bipartisan support in Congress.

Danforth said he expects it to pass overwhelmingly if the Reagan Administration is not able to negotiate voluntary trade restraints on Japanese auto imports in the next few months.

Donovan Blocks Key Regulations On Safety, Wages

vision would "permit a more complete analysis of a number of issues, including overlap with other regulatory programs and the preparation of a new proposal."

The pay provision affects the wage level above which workers classified as "executive, administrative and professional" can be exempted from the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act on overtime pay.

The current exemption point is only $155 a week, or slightly above the FLSA minimum wage.

THE PROVISION Donovan postponed indefinitely would have raised that level to $225 a week now and to $250 in 1983. Donovan said the change would "aggravate already intolerable levels of unemployment and inflation and exacerbate business costs."

The third standard—this one delayed until Apr. 17—called for the payment of prevailing wage rates to service workers who work for firms with federal contracts in research, timber sales and data processing.

Other standards delayed—some until Apr. 29—cover eligibility for federal protections against discrimination and other new provisions on the rights of veterans, the handicapped, pregnant workers and protection against sexual harassment.

Screen Actors Endorse Plan for Merger Talks

Hollywood, Calif.—Members of the Screen Actors Guild gave an enthusiastic endorsement to a scenario calling for closer ties with the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists and an eventual merger of SAG, AFTRA and the Screen Extras Guild.

Executive Sec. Charles L. Migden told more than 800 SAG members at the union's annual meeting that solidarity forged on the picket line during a 12-week strike by both unions last year could cement unity after several false starts in the past.

THE PLAN HE outlined, approved unanimously by the SAG's 85-member board of directors, looks to a first phase in which contract proposals would be made by a joint SAG-AFTRA board and the membership of both unions would vote together on authorizing a strike or ratifying a contract. AFTRA leaders have also urged such a move and a constitutional amendment authorizing joint action will be submitted to the AFTRA convention in July.

The SAG board directed President William Schallert to meet with AFTRA President Bill Hillman to set up a Joint National Coordinating Committee that would make recommendations for resolving differences to the governing boards of the two unions.

"I can no longer accept the possibility of one of our two unions voting to strike and the other not," Migden said. "I can no longer accept the possibility of one union terminating a strike and not the other . . . of one union accepting a contract and not the other."

AFTRA PRESIDENT Hillman, speaking later that week in San Francisco to AFTRA's Conference of Local Unions, said he personally favors merger but there remain problems of meshing the two organizations that must still be resolved.

Both he and AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff expressed optimism that differences can be worked out and urged the local leaders to stimulate discussions among their membership as a prelude to "the important decisions that will be required of us in the near future."

Wolff noted that the two unions negotiate many of their contracts jointly and AFTRA has invited the SAG "to join with us as interested observers" in negotiations involving home box office and cable television.

At the SAG membership meeting, Migden said he hoped merger could be complete before the next motion picture and television negotiations in mid-1983.

THE SAG BOARD also voted to initiate renewed discussions of merger with the Screen Extras Guild "as expeditiously as possible."

The three unions are all part of the Associated Actors & Artistes of America, and many members hold cards in more than one performers' union.

A highlight of the SAG annual meeting was the presentation by Schallert of the union's "outstanding achievement" award to veteran actor and union activist Leon Ames.

AMES, WHOSE screen acting career dates back to 1932, was one of the founders of SAG and holds membership card 15. He served on the union's board for 34 years and was president in 1957-58.

The SAG board, in addition to acting on merger proposals, took "carrot and stick" approaches to equal opportunity issues.

It reaffirmed the union's support for affirmative action programs, voted to award citations honoring producers for positive affirmative action achievements, and called for establishment of a national holiday honoring the memory of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The board also voted to institute nationally a program based on what its New York branch calls the "pass system."

THIS IS A special number that members may call if sexually harassed in connection with a job. A confidential report form is then filled out by SAG, and the union's staff determines if legal action is appropriate. Even if not, the report is kept on file to determine if there is a pattern of behavior for a particular employer. If so, further action can be considered.

The board approved branch status for San Diego and Houston, which entitles those units to elect representatives to the board. It also agreed to add a vice president so that both San Francisco and Florida can hold permanent seats. They currently share one position and alternate terms.

New Handbook Issued On Building Trades Pay

The Labor Dept. has issued its second handbook of union pay scales and fringe benefits in the construction industry, which summarizes about 5,000 collective bargaining agreements in 800 U.S. cities.

The second edition of the Handbook of Wages and Benefits for Construction Unions is based on data compiled by the department's Construction Industry Stabilization Committee. It contains contract information for 33 construction crafts including wages in effect on Jan. 1, 1981, health and welfare benefits, pension, vacation and other fringe benefit data.

Copies are available from the Office of Construction Industry Services, U.S. Dept. of Labor, Room N5655, Washington, D.C. 20216.

Metal Trades Cite Dangers Posed by Shrinking U.S. Fleet

America's "shocking and largely unrecognized" shortage of seagoing vessels of all kinds and sizes represents the gravest weakness in U.S. military security and a continuing drain on the nation's economy, the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. warned Congress.

In letters to every representative and senator, MTD President Paul J. Burnsky said the U.S. Navy began 1981 with 446 ships in active service, up seven from last year, but less than half the 926 it had in 1969.

TWO YEARS AGO, the Navy said that it would need about 800 ships in the mid-1980s, Burnsky observed. Thirty ships a year is the most that can be built if 22 of the country's 25 qualified shipyards work on nothing else, he added.

"At best, starting today, the Navy's goal for the mid-1980s could not be met until the early 1990s," he said.

"The shortages are greater yet in the merchant marine," Burnsky pointed out. "Thirty years ago, nearly 4,000 American-flag vessels carried 60 percent of the nation's export-import cargo. Today, fewer than 600 carry 4 percent of it. Only 30 of these ships are dry bulk carriers, and all but two of them are 18 or more years old."

BURNSKY MAINTAINED that overcoming these shortages, both military and civilian, is infinitely more vital to U.S. national defense than the outcome of the debates over the MX missile system, the B-1 bomber, the neutron bomb, and other weapons now being contemplated.

"We are confident that if this picture could be reviewed by the Congress and the American people, they would be virtually unanimous in demanding a Navy and a merchant fleet capable of meeting any rational challenge to the security and prosperity of the nation," he said.

The MTD, whose 23 affiliated unions include among their 5 million members most of the country's shipyard workers, has no list of sure-fire remedies to the problem, Burnsky said, but two measures have obvious priority:

- An acceleration and broadening of the present Navy construction program, with emphasis on mobile, adaptable conventional forces.
- Establishing and guaranteeing funds for a long-range merchant marine construction program.

"Together, these could halt the erosion of the shipbuilding industry's industrial base, and stem its loss of manpower," Burnsky said.

CWA Wins Vote At Plant Owned By Japanese Firm

San Diego—Employees of the Japanese-owned Sanyo & E. E. Corp. chose the Communications Workers as their bargaining representative in a National Labor Relations Board election, overcoming intense management efforts to keep the union out.

The election victory at the refrigerator manufacturing plant came on a vote of 294 to 245, CWA District Vice President W. C. Demers reported.

Officials of the plant hired a union-busting consulting firm in an effort to turn back the organizing drive. But the CWA, with the cooperation of the Japanese Productive Center in Los Angeles, responded by producing an educational film showing business leaders in Japan describing the benefits of unionization.

Although virtually every major corporation in Japan is unionized, Japanese firms that have set up operations in the United States have at times conducted aggressive campaigns to prevent their workers from gaining union representation.

In seeking CWA representation, workers at the Sanyo plant cited efforts to correct low wages, lack of job security and seniority rights and unsafe working conditions.

NLRB Ruling Hits Struck Poultry Firm

Striking workers at Sanderson Farms' Laurel, Miss., plant were justified in their action against the firm by management's unfair practices, a National Labor Relations Board administrative law judge ruled.

Judge James M. Fitzpatrick also found that, by adopting an inflexible position and engaging in "surface bargaining," the company prolonged the February 1979 strike by Chemical Workers Local 882. He ordered the company to engage in good-faith bargaining and to reinstate the strikers on their application to return to work.

BASIC ISSUES in the dispute included working conditions, work rules, wages, and sexual harassment. Most of the workers at the poultry processing facility are women.

When the union sought to renew its contract with the firm two years ago, company negotiators took on a hardened attitude, flatly rejecting any extension, and indicated certain major provisions would cease to apply.

"Resort to economic pressure by either or both parties in support of bargaining demands is not in itself conduct indicative of bad faith," Fitzpatrick observed. "But here the company, in the process of hardening its position, also kept shifting its position, apparently to avoid terms to which the union might agree. This shifting of position was conduct evidencing a desire to avoid agreement.

"WHILE IT IS true that progressively shifting to harder positions is consistent with hard bargaining, it is also consistent with an ultimate purpose of not reaching agreement, and getting rid of the union."

Several months after the strike began, the company withdrew recognition of the union and unilaterally granted a wage increase to workers who stayed at their jobs in spite of the continuing strike.

ICWU President Frank D. Martino hailed the decision as "a monument" to the workers' perseverance, adding that "poor, simple workers are entitled to equity within the collective bargaining process." He criticized the firm's use of a highly paid "labor consultant," and noted that the strike of nearly two years has cost ICWU members considerable wage losses.

MARTINO SAID he has attempted to contact the company's owner, Joe Sanderson, to meet with the union bargaining committee to resume negotiations, as directed by the NLRB judge.

"We urge Joe Sanderson to repudiate the so-called advice of his 'labor consultants,' and deal with his employees on terms which recognize their dignity as human beings," Martino said. "Meanwhile, we call upon our striking members in Laurel to hold their heads high. Their faith and belief in what is right is vindicated."

A Clearly Defined Role

THIS YEAR is the 100th anniversary of the founding of the national trade union center which evolved over the years into the present AFL-CIO.

This celebration gives us an opportunity to rededicate ourselves to the basic, fundamental purpose of our labor movement—the protection and promotion of the human rights, freedom, dignity and welfare of working people.

The existence of free, democratic labor unions is a fundamental and essential component of a free, democratic society. Where workers do not have the right to organize and bargain with their employers through institutions and leaders of their own choosing, there is no democracy. That is why the AFL-CIO continues to support the creation and development of free trade unions among the workers of all countries, wherever our help is needed and wherever that help is requested.

DEMOCRACY NEEDS free trade unions, and free trade unions can flourish and perform their proper role only in a democratic society. Democracy and free trade unions strengthen and reinforce each other. What weakens one, weakens the other and what strengthens one, strengthens the other.

In the United States there is a revival of anti-union attacks from right-wing forces which seek to turn back the clock on the achievements and improvements in labor-management relations developed over the 45 years since our basic labor law was enacted.

These attacks on unions will not succeed in weakening our determination to effectively represent the working people of America at the bargaining table, on the shop floor and in the halls of the national and the state legislatures.

These attacks will not stop the growth and progress of the American labor movement. There will be substantial gains in union membership in the 1980s—continued growth in sectors in which unions have been gaining members, and expansion in industries and geographic areas where progress has been slow.

WORKERS, whose buying power is falling daily because of inflation and whose jobs are threatened by growing unemployment, are more likely to seek the income protection and the job protection provided by union membership and by union contracts.

The aging of the workforce and the changing role of women will also encourage union membership. Older workers with family and community ties are more inclined to look to collective action to try to improve the jobs they have. As more women are heading households or are assuming a larger share of the breadwinner's role, women workers also can be expected to want the job security and improved wages that depend on collective action through labor unions.

In spite of the sniping of the right wing, the need for a labor movement in America has never been greater and our role never more clearly defined. Through collective bargaining, we seek to improve the lives and conditions of our members; through political education, we seek to protect those who are unorganized from economic or political exploitation.

Import Surge Can Be Checked By Heeding Consumer Gripes

By Gus Tyler

BUSINESS PEOPLE should not be unhappy with the consumer movement. They should encourage it. In the long run, active consumerism is in the best interest of business itself.

The proposition sounds perverse. Yet, it was seriously advanced at this year's annual meeting of the American Marketing Association by Robert R. Reich, director of the Federal Trade Commission's office of policy planning.

In a forthright statement, Reich maintained that consumers have a lot to teach companies that produce products. "Consumer complaints," he says, "are one of the most important marketing assets available. They can serve as early warning devices—signalling that brand loyalty may be in danger unless certain changes are made. Business should actively solicit complaints, using them as part of their marketing strategy, putting toll free numbers on packages and labels, and instructing consumers to call in immediately with any problems they have."

ONE OF THE REASONS that American companies are losing out to foreign competitors in the American market is the insensitivity of too many U.S. companies to the needs and reactions of consumers.

The American shopper gets fed up with "products that are unsafe, defective, shoddy, that fail to live up to their advertising claims, or manufacturers who neglect to disclose important information to purchasers." The consumer buys an "import," not necessarily for lower price, but for higher quality.

While cheap labor, international trade arrangements, and other factors undoubtedly influence the flow of imports into the United States, there is no doubt that, in some product areas, American producers have been losing out because they insult the intelligence of the American consumer.

FOR MANY YEARS, American producers indulged in the policy of "planned obsolescence." The idea was to plan the predictable breakdown of the commodity—usually a fairly heavy piece of equipment like a kitchen appliance or an automobile. The plot to calculate the collapse seemed to make sense.

First, a part would go—and the manufacturer could make profit by selling and installing the broken piece. Then the whole machine would go—and there would be more profit in a new sale for replacement.

This sorry scheme worked, until some American consumers discovered that they could buy the same product from an overseas producer with a measure of certainty that it would last. So they switched.

SUPERIOR QUALITY control is, obviously, not the sole way that overseas producers have penetrated the American market deeply. Many "imports" are dumped here below the price in the country of origin; many are subsidized; many are made with incredibly exploited labor. But, some are winning because they are better.

The moral of Reich's story is one that American companies can only ignore at their own peril: if the manufacturers don't give a damn about consumers, they cannot expect consumers to give a damn about them.

Federal Protection— A Species in Danger

We will stand with you to see that protection for the consumer, protection in the workplace, protection for the environment do not go the way of the dodo bird on the pretext of "getting government off the backs of American business."

All Americans are eager to slay the inflationary dragon, but the burdens of that battle should not fall most heavily on those least able to bear them.

The current movement against government regulation has very much the look of a desire by the strong to regain prerogatives over the weak.

Individual regulations can and should be subject to criticism. But this all-out attack on the concept of health and safety regulation must be resisted if we are to continue to be a decent people living in a decent society.

Myth vs. Reality

Decontrol More Likely to Spur Oil Profits Than Exploration

The following is excerpted from an article in the New York Times, Jan. 11, 1981, by Joel R. Jacobson, commissioner of New Jersey's Dept. of Energy. Jacobson headed the New Jersey Industrial Union Council prior to the merger of the State AFL-CIO in 1961.

WITHIN THE LAST DECADE, Americans have experienced major shortages of gasoline in 1974 and 1979 and in natural gas in 1977. The specter of closed factories and long lines at gasoline stations still lingers in our memories and haunts our future.

The major domestic oil companies have charged that government price controls and supply allocations have caused the shortages and that the ultimate solution is to "get the government off the back of the oil industry."

Let's compare the myth with reality.

The Myth: Government interference with the free market has precipitated the energy shortages.

The Reality: There is validity to the argument that a free industry operating in a free market is more efficient. A vital corollary ignored by the vocal free marketeers is that a controlled industry in a free market almost always is an economic disaster. Even its most lusty defenders will concede that the oil industry—both foreign and domestic—is anything but free.

WITH ACCESS to crude oil severely limited, with market areas and shares defined with clinical precision, with growth rates, distribution patterns and prices established in tandem and with admission to this cozy cousins club denied to outsiders, the oil industry meets the freshman economics classroom description of a cartel, monopoly and/or oligopoly.

Against this backdrop of a smooth partnership, an examination of statistical data reported by the American Petroleum Institute and the U.S. Dept. of Energy reveals that it was the combined manipulation of the market by the domestic majors that caused the gasoline shortages, not government regulations.

The oil industry attributed the shortage to the disruption of oil imports from Iran. The blunt fact is that many majors were hardly affected at all. Mobil, Texaco and Shell imports from Iran were an infinitesimal percentage of their total domestic refinery capacity. The total nationwide shortfall from Iran amounted to 5 percent of normal imports.

THE MYTH: The current levels of earnings and cash-flow of America's major oil companies are insufficient to finance expanded exploration and production.

The Reality: An analysis of reports filed with the Securities & Exchange Commission offers a ringing refutation of this myth. For example:

The combined net earnings of the five largest domestic oil companies (Exxon, Mobil, Socal, Gulf and Texaco) amounted to $6.6 billion in 1978 and $11.2 billion in 1979, an increase of 70 percent. Last year will be the most lucrative year in the industry's history. In the first nine months of 1980, the combined earnings of $12 billion already had exceeded the record-high, entire-year earnings of 1979.

The Myth: Decontrols, higher prices and greater profits will create an "incentive" for the oil companies to drill for new resources.

The Reality: The Mobil Oil Corp.'s higher profits stimulated its "incentive" to drill, to probe, to dig, to explore until it struck Montgomery-Ward, which it promptly purchased and has since magnanimously presented with an "interest-free loan" of $200 million.

EXXON HAS purchased a manufacturer of electric engines, Atlantic Richfield has bought a London newspaper, Tenneco has acquired an almond orchard, Texaco has expanded into a veterinary chemicals operation and the Sun Oil Co. now owns a grocery chain and a manufacturer of fever thermometers.

The Myth: The new oil industry "incentive" created by decontrols, higher prices and greater profits will increase exploration for, and the production of, new resources.

The Reality: Within the last 10 years, the price of crude oil has increased 1,600 percent, but the number of exploratory wells drilled increased by only 10 percent. While the number of wells explored within the last three years has remained constant, the drilling activity has only now begun to regain the levels of more than a decade ago.

While the domestic majors boast that they are spending more money today than before, the lion's share has been allocated for the purchase of, and/or production at, oil fields with known reserves, rather than exploring for new resources.

IN 1979, the five largest domestic oil companies spent only half of their available cash-flow of $19 billion on production, with the remaining portion used to pay $2.7 billion in dividends, $1.9 billion to buy other companies, $2.8 billion for retained earnings and $1.5 billion for other disbursements.

Despite the record-breaking profits, higher retained earnings, startling inventory profits, expanded dividend payments and massive diversification expenditures, the domestic oil majors have spent a declining share of their cash-flow on exploratory drilling.

One gnawing question remains: If the major American companies are reluctant to search for new sources of domestic oil and natural gas at their current record-high level of riches, why should the rest of us believe that decontrols, higher prices and still greater profits will provide any new "incentive" to drill for more?

Counterproductive Move

Reagan Job Freeze Lengthens Backlog at Federal Agencies

FEDERAL AGENCIES, already operating shorthanded, will fall even further behind their workload under the Reagan Administration's job freeze without substantially cutting payroll costs, President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees predicted.

He stressed that the Reagan freeze order will only worsen the problems that resulted from President Carter's directive a year ago that agencies could fill only one of every two vacancies that occurred. He added that the action will prove to be little more than a "counterproductive symbolic gesture" to fulfill a campaign pledge.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Blaylock said AFGE strongly believes that the retroactivity aspect of the freeze won't stand up and is prepared to bring court challenges in cases where people already on the job are harmed by the backdating. He said that there is also serious doubt in the legal community that Reagan's attempt to make the freeze apply to a period before he took office will withstand a court test.

Blaylock turned aside the contention that there are far more federal workers than are needed to do the job. "In reality," he declared, "there are fewer federal workers on the rolls today than there were in 1961." He said that the real problem is the "imbalance" in the federal workforce that has grown since the mid-Sixties, with a "dramatic shift" of workers into statistical and reporting jobs.

THE PROBLEM of a short workforce is severe in field positions "where there is direct contact between federal workers and citizens."

Blaylock said that as a result of the year-long Carter hiring freeze, many branch offices have been forced to schedule heavy overtime for regular employees and have added a large number of students and other part-time workers. He said that these conditions have produced a higher rate of errors, longer delays and much of the "dissatisfaction with government."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

CHAIRMAN-DESIGNATE Murray Weidenbaum of the President's Council of Economic Advisers has had an obsession with "cost-benefit" analysis for the past decade, especially while he headed the business-financed Center for the Study of American Business at Washington University in St. Louis.

Weidenbaum became a hero to business because his "cost-benefit" approach almost always finds the cost of government regulations outweighing the benefits.

The Weidenbaum cost-benefit approach was devastated in hearings before a House subcommittee last year.

SUBCOMMITTEE Chairman Bob Eckhardt (D-Tex.) reported the panel found the cost-benefit approach "far too primitive" at this stage. The panel said it should be used only if its shortcomings are recognized and only in the context of full and open rule-making.

Not only was the cost-benefit approach reborn with the selection of Weidenbaum as President Reagan's chief economic adviser, but the President himself relied on Weidenbaum's dubious data in his "economic calamity" speech of Feb. 5.

The subcommittee report observed that the most widely publicized "number" in the cost-benefit analysis proposals is Weidenbaum's estimate that the aggregate costs of issuing and complying with federal regulations totaled $121 billion in Fiscal 1979 or about $500 per capita.

Reagan used this in his TV speech, saying "it is estimated" that regulations add $100 billion to the cost of the goods and services we buy and "another $20 billion is spent by government handling the paperwork created by those regulations."

THE ECKHARDT PANEL examined Weidenbaum's study and found it "meaningless." In adding up regulatory costs, Weidenbaum neglected to show whether the benefits of regulations exceeded their costs.

In calculating costs, Weidenbaum "mixes apples and oranges," the report noted. He includes old-line cartel regulatory agencies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission with newer social regulatory agencies such as the Environmental Protection Agency, Occupational Safety & Health Administration and others.

Weidenbaum arrived at his cost totals by comparing the estimated cost of regulation with the budget of an agency. He then developed a multiplier of 20—the cost to the private sector being 20 times that of the budget.

Even here, his method was questioned. Weidenbaum used figures for 1976 showing a cost of $25 billion imposed by paperwork required by government for IRS forms, Census forms, and forms needed for government contracts, subsidies and loans, as well as for EPA, OSHA and other programs.

BUT CRITICS of Weidenbaum's methods cited a General Accounting Office report estimating the paperwork burden for federal programs monitored by GAO and the Office of Management & Budget at $1 billion and the total cost of federal paperwork at $5 billion. This would mean the real cost is only one-fifth of what Weidenbaum claimed and it also would force a drastic cut in his multiplier of 20.

In addition, the critics note that of the $1 billion monitored by GAO and OMB, the job health, safety and environmental regulation portion is under 10 percent or "less than one-half of 1 percent of Weidenbaum's figure" for the burden of paperwork.

Another factor contaminating cost-benefit studies is that the regulated industry usually is the source of the cost data. In the famous case of OSHA's vinyl chloride regulation, the industry protested it would cost $90 billion and 2.2 million jobs. As it turned out, the total cost of compliance came to $300 million, no jobs were lost and operating costs declined as industry devised emission controls.

GOVERNMENT JOB FREEZE ordered by the Reagan Administration will throw shorthanded federal agencies even further behind their workload without cutting payroll costs, President Kenneth T. Blaylock, center, of the Government Employees warned on Labor News Conference. Reporters questioning the AFL-CIO vice president were Philip Shandler, left, of the Washington Star and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Creditors Must Refund Gains On Sale of Repossessed Cars

By Esther Margolius

BERT ZIPHER poured his hard-earned money into his 1978 Chrysler. Unfortunately, his money ran out and Bert fell behind on his payments to Chrysler Credit Corp. As his car was being towed away, repossessed by the finance company, Bert figured that was the last he would ever see of his car. And it was.

But he didn't know that he was entitled to any profits realized by the auto company after the resale of the car and after repossession charges had been deducted.

Over the past three years, the Federal Trade Commission has charged that the finance companies owned by the big three auto manufacturers have failed to disclose to consumers that they are entitled to the profits left over from the resale of their cars.

Chrysler has become the latest of the major auto makers to adopt accounting procedures which, it is hoped, will protect the rights of future credit consumers if their cars or trucks are repossessed. This consent agreement is the third worked out by the FTC since 1976, when parallel cases were started against General Motors and Ford and their credit subsidiaries. Ford settled in April 1979 and General Motors in July 1980.

REFUNDS AVERAGING $200 each are to be paid by Chrysler-owned dealerships to those whose Chrysler cars and trucks have been repossessed since 1974, according to the FTC.

Future defaulting customers must be made aware of their rights to receive surpluses and to redeem or buy back their vehicles. From now on, car dealers must get the best possible resale price and pay any resulting surplus, less expenses, within 45 days after resale.

Many installment contracts have what is called an "acceleration clause" which says the finance company can make a delinquent debtor pay the entire balance or lose the car or other purchase. This provision is not only unfair; it's actually in conflict with the laws of some states.

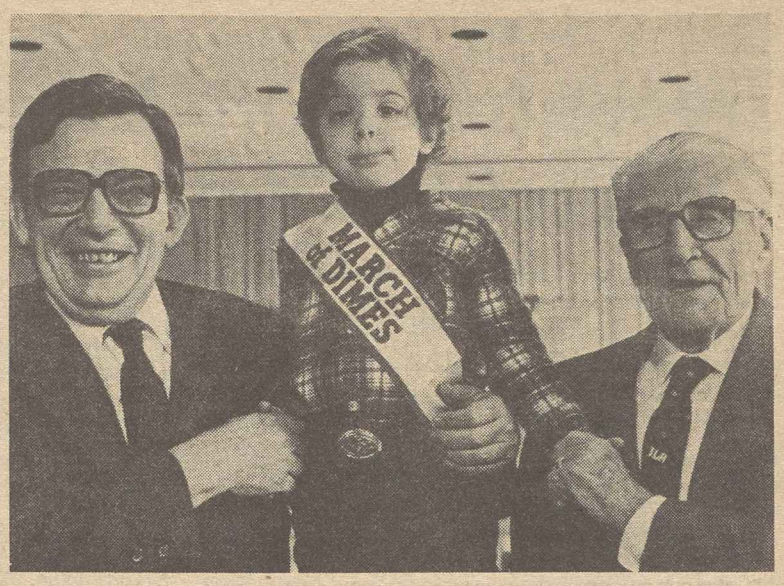
The Uniform Commercial Code states clearly that repossessed vehicles must be sold in a "commercial reasonable manner," credit union authorities point out.

State laws covering the repossession of property may vary, so it is suggested you check with your state's attorney general's office to find out the procedure for redeeming your car.

In New York, a delinquent debtor may redeem his car by paying only the past due installments and repossession expenses. In addition, a finance company that repossesses or accepts a voluntary surrender of a car must, within 24 hours, deliver or mail to the debtor a notice of his right to redeem the vehicle and the dollar amount needed.

Chrysler Credit Corp., according to FTC records, repossesses some 12,000 to 16,000 cars and trucks annually. Higher car prices and surging inflation are sure to drive the repossession percentages to the auto manufacturers even higher.

To many people, a car is an economic necessity, therefore the threat of repossession can have tremendous repercussions. If your car is taken away from you, it may still be possible to redeem it, acting quickly enough.



GET IN TOUCH with the finance company and find out what the terms are for redemption of the car, and how much time you have to act. If you do not receive notice from the finance company at the time of repossession, or otherwise receive no satisfaction from dealing with them, it is suggested that you get in touch with the state attorney general's office, the FTC or your local department of consumer affairs.

When closing any deal with a finance company, whether it is for a new automobile, a major appliance, a home improvement loan or whatever, take the time to read the contract carefully. Understanding the terms of the contract, your responsibility, and the ramifications for defaulting, may save you some grief.

Ask for an explanation of your rights as a consumer in the event of defaulting, and get a copy of those rights in print. Be careful that you do not sign a waiver to those rights.

It may be small solace to Mr. Zipher or anybody else in that uncomfortable position, but a check for the resale profits on a repossessed car may come in handy one day. Perhaps when he has to make a down payment on a new one.

Job Health Hazards Shared by Families

By Dr. Phillip L. Polakoff

HOW BIG is the problem of job-related diseases? In a report to Congress last year, the Labor Dept. estimated that nearly two million workers are severely or partially disabled because of illnesses connected with their jobs.

Approximately 700,000 of these workers suffer long-term total disability. Another 1.2 million are partially disabled and temporarily out of the labor force, or limited in the kind or amount of work they can perform.

The Labor Dept. based its estimate on information obtained from an interview survey of disabled individuals between the ages of 20 and 65. Besides not counting workers over the age of 65, the survey also does not include persons who may have died from occupational diseases. Occupational cancer deaths, therefore, are omitted from the data.

FOR THESE REASONS, the estimate of nearly two million workers whose health is being impaired by their jobs would appear to be conservative. There is another side to this problem that magnifies its severity. Occupational hazards pose threats to health that extend beyond the workplace itself.

For example, workers sometimes expose their families to health risks by carrying toxic substances home on their clothing. Studies have shown that children of workers involved with lead dust have higher levels of lead in their blood than normal.

Even worse than lead poisoning is the threat to life from exposure to asbestos dust brought home from work. There are documented cases of death from cancer among women who washed their husbands' dusty clothes, and even among children who played with their fathers after work.

THE LONG REACH of occupational diseases even extends to future generations. The National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH) has estimated that of the 16 million working women of child-bearing age about one million are exposed to substances that could harm their unborn children.

And reproductive hazards are not limited to women. Substances such as lead and the pesticide DBCP can cause sterility and impotence in men. Both sexes are susceptible to genetic damage that can show up as birth defects in their children.

Wives of workers exposed to lead, vinyl chloride and anesthetic gases used in hospital operating rooms often have higher than average rates of miscarriages and birth defects among their children.

There is still another factor that further enlarges the problem of work and health. Factories that are hazardous places to work, also can pollute the entire community.

IN ADDITION TO the ill effects on individuals caused by DBCP, the pesticide also has been found contaminating drinking water supplies in a number of communities.

Likewise, the chemical kepone represented a hazard for the general population of a sizable area along the James River in Virginia as well as for the people who manufactured it.

In fairness, it must be said that health problems that originate outside the workplace can contribute to occupational illnesses and injuries. We bring to our jobs our own genetic makeup; our eating, drinking and smoking habits; our personal family problems, and our particular way of looking at and reacting to health and sickness.

One example of this interrelationship between occupational and non-occupational factors is the dramatic increases in the risk of lung cancer among asbestos workers who smoke.

Job-related disease is a personal tragedy for workers and their families. But when we multiply these individual calamities by the nearly two million estimated victims, the problem widens to national scope. The quality of life in America then becomes the issue.

Soup to Nonsense

Simple Revamping of Calendar Can Ease February's Misery

By Jane Goodsell

WITH HEMLINES on the rise again and a new administration in the White House, it's high time to make some changes in the calendar. Do you realize that the one we're using now, in the last quarter of the 20th Century, was dreamed up by the early Romans in the time of Julius Caesar? This makes no sense. For one thing, the climate in Italy bears no resemblance to the weather in, say, Minnesota and Vermont where February is not just another month but a calamity.

I can't understand why we've put up with that calendar down through the centuries. We aren't still using Roman numerals and running around in togas. Why then are we living our lives according to a system that made sense to Julius Caesar who, incidentally, wasn't all that sensible. If he'd used his head, he'd have stayed at home on the Ides of March as he was warned to do.

AS A FIRST STEP, I suggest switching the start of the year to the first of September. Certainly there could be no more unsuitable time to begin a new year than the first of January. Who feels like taking on anything new by the time that lackluster, anti-climactic month rolls around? Having exhausted our energies and our bank accounts getting through the holidays, we are in some doubt about whether there actually is a life after Christmas, and we are in no mood for fresh starts and firm resolves.

September is the right and proper time for the start of a new year. Heralding as it does the end of summer and the beginning of school, it is a season of renewal. There is a tang in the air and a quickening of tempo that makes a brighter future seem quite possible.

THE BEST SOLUTION to February would be to eliminate it entirely, but if that's not possible it should be moved to some more convenient time of year. Say, for instance, in between June and July.

On top of having miserable weather, February is ruinously expensive. Its fuel bills alone are exorbitant, not to mention the staggering costs of antibiotics, fever thermometers, cough syrups, snow shovels, tow trucks, boots, mittens and cords of firewood. It is outrageous that this terribly costly month should come right on the heels of January bills, and only a few weeks before income taxes are due.

A COUPLE OF other suggestions: Right after the blustery month of March would be a nice time for the hot, lazy month of August. This, in turn, would leave open an interval between July and September when refreshing April showers would be a welcome and needed change.

These suggestions are only a beginning, and a study committee could surely come up with some other ideas. I suppose these adjustments will have to be worked out to jibe with the phases of the moon and the equinoxes, but I shouldn't think that would be an insurmountable problem. The way I look at it, if they can monkey around with George Washington's birthday, they can surely do something about the winter solstice, right?

PROGRAMS TO SPUR increased participation of women in their unions and to help women staff members advance their position within the labor movement were explored at recent Washington conferences. More than 50 representatives from 30 unions took part in seminars conducted by the Coalition of Labor Union Women, left. Thirty-five women staffers of international unions also participated in a three-day conference for affiliates of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, right. Key conference speakers included, seated from left, Ellen Wernick, DPE Women's Project coordinator; DPE Executive Director Jack Golodner; AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, who also is president of CLUW and a vice president of Clothing & Textile Workers. Standing from left are Gloria Johnson, director of education and women's activities for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Regina Canuso, research assistant for DPE's Women's Project, and President Rodney A. Bower of the Professional & Technical Engineers. Workshops and discussions of women's issues highlighted both conferences.

Court Ruling Slaps Stance Of Struck Glassware Firm

Denver—A federal court has upheld a ruling that the Bartlett-Collins Co. illegally refused to bargain in good faith with the Flint Glass Workers by insisting that all negotiations be recorded by a court stenographer.

Workers at the company were forced to strike in late 1974 after repeated attempts to bargain failed, and in 1977 the AFL-CIO Executive Council endorsed the Flint Glass Workers' nationwide boycott of Bartlett-Collins products.

The decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit upheld the 1977 finding by the National Labor Relations Board that the stand of the Sapulpa, Okla. glassware manufacturer constituted an unfair labor practice.

THE NLRB AND the court agreed with the union's position that the presence of a court reporter was not a mandatory subject of bargaining and there is "no significant relationship" between stenographic recording of the meetings and the terms and conditions of employment.

The Flint Glass Workers were certified as the bargaining agent for Bartlett-Collins employees in 1974, but have been unable to reach an agreement with the company despite an earlier NLRB order instructing the company to bargain after finding it guilty of other unfair labor practices.

Following that decision, the company told the union that it would not engage in bargaining unless a court reporter was present at all further meetings.

THE UNION rejected this demand, declaring that it would create "a courtroom atmosphere" that could chill negotiations and frank discussion, and create "feelings of discomfort, tension and reluctance to state their views" among members of the bargaining committee.

Although the union suggested that an electronic recording of the meeting would be acceptable, Bartlett-Collins refused and insisted that the presence of the court reporter was necessary before any further bargaining could take place, prompting the union to file the new charges.

new political climate in Washington makes it imperative for me to focus my primary efforts on the rights of the American worker."

Burton pledged to work for the goals of "a decent wage, fair collective bargaining, adequate pension benefits, and a safe and healthful workplace."

The Labor Standards subcommittee also lost a chairman in the election, Edward P. Beard (D-R.I.), who had an 88 percent "right" COPE voting score. His successor, George Miller (D-Calif.), is in the same ballpark with an 85 percent "right" voting record.

OTHER SUBCOMMITTEE chairmanship changes are in two of the education panels. Rep. Paul Simon (D-Ill.) switched to head the Postsecondary Education subcommittee and Rep. Austin J. Murphy (D-Pa.) replaces him as chairman of the Select Education subcommittee.

The other chairmanships are unchanged. Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), who heads the full committee, remains also as chairman of the Elementary, Secondary & Vocational Education subcommittee.

REP. AUGUSTUS F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) continues as chairman of the Employment Opportunities subcommittee. The Health & Safety subcommittee remains under Rep. Joseph M. Gaydos (D-Pa.), and Rep. Ike Andrews (D-N.C.) continues to head the Human Resources subcommittee.

The Republicans were still in the process of choosing ranking minority members for the various subcommittees. Each party completed its roster of committee members by filling a vacancy. The new Democrat is Dennis Eckart (D-Ohio), who was elected last November to the seat held by Charles Vanik, who retired after more than 25 years in Congress. Republicans named a conservative first-termer, Wendell Bailey of Missouri, to the GOP vacancy.

5th Graders Raise Funds for Cambodia

San Francisco—Fifth-graders at San Fernando Valley Elementary School, who were touched by the plight of other youngsters halfway around the world, raised $106.17 for the AFL-CIO Cambodia Crisis Campaign.

The 28 students in Mrs. Virginia Krussow's class earned the money by selling minature Christmas trees they had made from pine cones. It was part of a three-week project in which they dipped the cones in plaster and decorated them with tissue paper.

Mrs. Krussow suggested the fund-raising project to the students after reading about the federation's Cambodia campaign in the weekly Los Angeles United Teacher newspaper.

Panel to Probe New Allegations Against Donovan

New allegations against Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan will be examined "in a thoroughly bipartisan manner" by the staff of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said.

Hatch declined the request of five committee Democrats that the committee ask the FBI to reopen its investigation of reports linking Donovan and the New Jersey construction company, with which he was associated, of ties to organized crime figures. But he said that any "substantive" findings by the committee staff would be passed on to federal law enforcement agencies.

DONOVAN, WHO was confirmed for the Cabinet post by an 80-17 vote after an extensive FBI investigation found no evidence to support similar allegations, termed the new accusations "false, unfounded and unsubstantiated."

The letter to Hatch, signed by Senators Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Claiborne Pell (R.I.), Thomas F. Eagleton (Mo.), Howard Metzenbaum (Ohio) and Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (Mich.), cited previously undisclosed information that Donovan had testified as a witness in a 1973 trial of New Jersey public officials in relation to purchase of top soil from what may have been public property. Neither Donovan nor the Schiavone Construction Co. were defendants in the case.

The five committee members also cited what they termed "serious inaccuracies" in an FBI report that it was unable to confirm allegations of an association between a reputed crime figure and Donovan's firm. They said a reporter for a New Jersey newspaper, the Bergen Record, had uncovered links that added credence to the allegation.

Prevailing Wage Law Upheld by Missouri Court

Jefferson City, Mo.—Missouri's highest court has upheld the state's "little Davis-Bacon Act," which requires payment of prevailing wages on public construction projects.

The state Supreme Court unanimously rejected a legal challenge by the city of Kennett, in the southeast part of the state, which protested wage determinations involving a water and sewer project and a street resurfacing project. The city had questioned both the procedure for setting prevailing wages and the constitutionality of the "arbitrary" classification of projects as either "building construction" or "heavy construction."

IN DISMISSING the challenge, the Missouri Supreme Court said the city had not made a case for questioning the law's constitutionality, and the record showed that the city had ample opportunity to challenge the preliminary wage determinations by introducing evidence and questioning witnesses.

The State Building & Construction Trades Council, which entered the case at the request of the Eastern Missouri Laborers' District Council, welcomed the ruling as "a victory for all construction workers."

But State Council President E. J. Cantrell noted that one of the seven justices, in a concurring opinion, suggested the desirability of changing the law. Cantrell said such comments make it clear that the building trades affiliates "will have to be ever-vigilant" against attempts to weaken labor standards in the state legislature.

A recent national newsletter of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. noted that bills to repeal the prevailing wage laws have already been introduced in a number of legislatures that have begun their 1981 sessions, and a labor-opposed repeal bill was given quick committee approval in the Colorado House of Representatives.

Revised Guide Issued For Union Meetings

A revised and updated edition of the 64-page booklet, "How to Run a Union Meeting," is available from the AFL-CIO as a guide to help local union leaders conduct orderly sessions and boost membership interest, participation and attendance.

The handbook outlines duties of officers and parliamentary rules, and provides suggestions on planning meetings and improving agendas.

Copies of the pamphlet, Publication No. 81, are available at 20 cents each from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. The charge for additional copies is $15 per 100.

'Rocky Road Ahead'

Wynn Warns of Threat To Consumer Progress

By James M. Shevis

AFL-CIO Vice President William H. Wynn warned consumer leaders from around the country that implementation of the conservative economic policies of the Reagan Administration will mean "a rocky road ahead" for both labor and consumers. He called for strengthened ties between the two groups.

Noting the long tradition of cooperation between the labor and consumer movements, Wynn said that while "we have written a record in which both labor and consumers can, and should, take great pride. . . . I fear much of the progress for which we fought so long and so hard is in danger of being sacrificed on the altar of supply-side economics."

WYNN, WHO is president of the Food & Commercial Workers, told some 300 delegates to the annual Consumer Assembly of the Consumer Federation of America that he was concerned over the rightward swing of the political pendulum in Congress.

"Neither labor nor consumer groups can match the money which special interests and their political action committees can pour into lobbying efforts and elective politics. Surely we have learned that by now," he said. "Surely we now know that if we do not hang together, we will most assuredly hang separately. Let us join together to make sure that doesn't happen."

Wynn expressed concern over reports that the Reagan Administration plans to cut back the nation's food stamp program, restrict student loans, and reduce other "people" programs in the fiscal 1982 budget. Oil has been decontrolled ahead of schedule, and this can only pump up the price of gasoline and home heating oil, he noted.

Addressing another sectoral cause of inflation, Director Henry B. Schechter of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy warned that the Federal Reserve Board's determination to maintain a tight-money, high interest rate policy practically assures a significant decline in housing construction in 1981.

"WHILE THE Federal Reserve policy is intended to fight inflation, it will be self-defeating," Schechter warned, adding that credit policies that restrict housing construction fuel inflation in the rest of the economy.

Schechter reiterated the federation's call for reactivation of the 1969 Credit Control Act to regulate credit. Used for the first time early last year, the measure's credit control mechanisms helped bring the prime rate down from 20 percent to 11 percent over a four-month period, and aided in the housing pickup that followed, he observed. Since then, interest rates have again climbed and housing is about to decline, he pointed out.

"IF IT BECAME an announced, established policy that the previously mentioned credit control powers would be employed from time to time to dampen future economic overheating," Schechter said, "there would be more acceptance of measures to counteract the prolongation and intensification of the recession."

Schechter, who participated in a panel discussion led by Sen. James Sasser (D-Tenn.) on the current economic crisis, endorsed the senator's proposal for a restructuring of the Federal Reserve Board.

He expressed doubt, however, as to whether a proposed dual interest rate policy would be workable, since investors would shift most of their funds into loans that would bear the higher interest rate.

'He Says Not to Worry . . .'

Cost of Necessities Exceeds 1980 Overall Inflation Rate

new tax cuts, and military spending increases will intensify inflation in general," said the center's directors, Gar Alperovitz and Jeff Faux. "Interest rates are back up and show no signs of coming down to mid-1980 levels, and the Agriculture Dept. is predicting food inflation in the 15-percent range for the coming year.

"Budget-cutting will alter none of this. In the absence of carefully targeted strategies to moderate prices in the specific sectors, there is no way to avoid an inflation calamity."

MEANWHILE, there is little apparently that the average family can do to shield itself from the steady rise in prices in the key sectors. As Alperovitz and Faux put it, "When heating oil and food bills go up, they must be paid as they come due."

The food, energy, medical care, housing and interest rates sectors are areas where labor costs have little or no impact on prices, the AFL-CIO study noted.

"Wage-push does not explain current inflation," it observed. "Wage increases for the average worker have been eroded over the past two years, particularly by inflation and secondarily by taxes. Real earnings are down substantially from a year earlier, and well below the level of two years ago."

The National Center's study showed that the rise in prices of necessities was at an even steeper rate in the final quarter of 1980 than for the year as a whole. Seasonally adjusted prices in the four key sectors rose at a combined 15.2 percent annual rate, almost 75 percent higher than the 8.7 percent inflation rate for other items.

Building Trades to Press Quick Solution of Disputes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Building trades unions will seek to resolve a greater share of their jurisdictional disputes through direct on-the-spot or union-to-union settlements, reserving the more formal disputes settlement procedures for those issues that cannot be more simply resolved.

The 15 union presidents who make up the governing body of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., agreed to continue to explore pragmatic approaches that would lead to earlier-stage settlements.

BCTD PRESIDENT Robert A. Georgine said the consensus was that the present impartial board for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes serves an essential function, but that agreements worked out directly by the parties closest to the situation are generally preferable.

Former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, in his professional role as an economist, discussed with the building trades presidents the outlook for the economy as he sees it. Marshall expressed concern that a "supply-side" economic strategy will push up the already high level of unemployment.

Another speaker during the three-day meeting was California's Director of Housing & Community Development, I. Donald Terner, who described the state's experimental "equity sharing" program to assist first-time, moderate income homebuyers who otherwise would be unable to afford a home.

The demonstration project allows the state to purchase a "share" of the home, up to 49 percent of its cost, thus reducing the mortgage burden and down payment. When the home is eventually resold, the state claims its share of the proceeds, including any profits from appreciation of value.

THE DEMONSTRATION project, helped by a federal grant as well as state funds, is now limited to families below the median income level who are facing displacement from rental units because of condominium conversions.

Terner told the building trades leaders that he hopes for private-sector funding to expand the program to reach a larger number of "frustrated home buyers."

The BCTD governing body also heard a report on another type of co-venture between government and the private sector.

THE DEPARTMENT gave its endorsement and urged its affiliates to support the Building Arts Museum which Congress has authorized to be established in one of the historic structures of the nation's capital, the former Pension Building.

Georgine is vice president of the board which is planning the project, and Bricklayers President John T. Joyce is one of the directors.

The museum will spotlight the history and development of architecture and building construction.

7.4% Jobless Rate Sends 'Mixed Signals'

The nation's jobless rate remained unchanged in January at 7.4 percent, but there were disturbing trends that stood out against the apparent statistical stability.

For one thing, a sharp 1.2-percentage point increase in teenage unemployment brought the rate for that category to 19 percent for the month. The last time teenage joblessness was that high was in December 1976 near the end of a major recession.

ALSO, JOBLESSNESS among Hispanic workers rose sharply, from 9.8 to 11.1 percent over the month. Unemployment among blacks, however, fell to 12.9 percent from 14 percent in December. And the rate for black teenagers was down one percentage point to 36.5 percent.

In addition, the monthly figures issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed the average duration of unemployment increased by almost a week to 14.4 weeks in January, the highest level in three and a half years, reflecting a substantial increase in those unemployed for six months or more. The median jobless period, which is little affected by movements in long-term unemployment, was about unchanged at 7.4 weeks.

The overall jobless rate has remained in the narrow range of 7.4 to 7.6 percent since last May. The January rate was the second consecutive month at that level. In all, 7,847,000 Americans were out of work last month—62,000 more than in December, but not enough to change the rate.

BLS COMMISSIONER Janet L. Norwood testified at a congressional Joint Economic Committee hearing that the January statistics "provide mixed signals on the economy."

"When adjusted for seasonal movements, both the payroll and the household surveys showed some evidence of strength," she said. "Employment increased and the factory workweek continued to rise."

Total employment, as measured by the household survey, rose 410,000 over the month to 97.7 million. Nonfarm payroll employment, as measured by the government's monthly survey of establishments, increased by 375,000 to 91.5 million. Meanwhile, the size of the labor force swelled by 475,000 to 105.5 million, the first sizable increase since July.

"MOST OF THE over-the-month gain occurred among adult women, whose labor force participation rate was at an all-time high of 51.8 percent," BLS said. Over the year, the labor force advanced by 1.5 million, a slower pace than in recent years, the report said.

Average weekly hours in manufacturing rose sharply to 40.4, the highest level since early 1979, BLS said. This measure has been rising steadily since last summer.

Council Calls Reagan Plan Unfair, 'High-Risk Gamble'

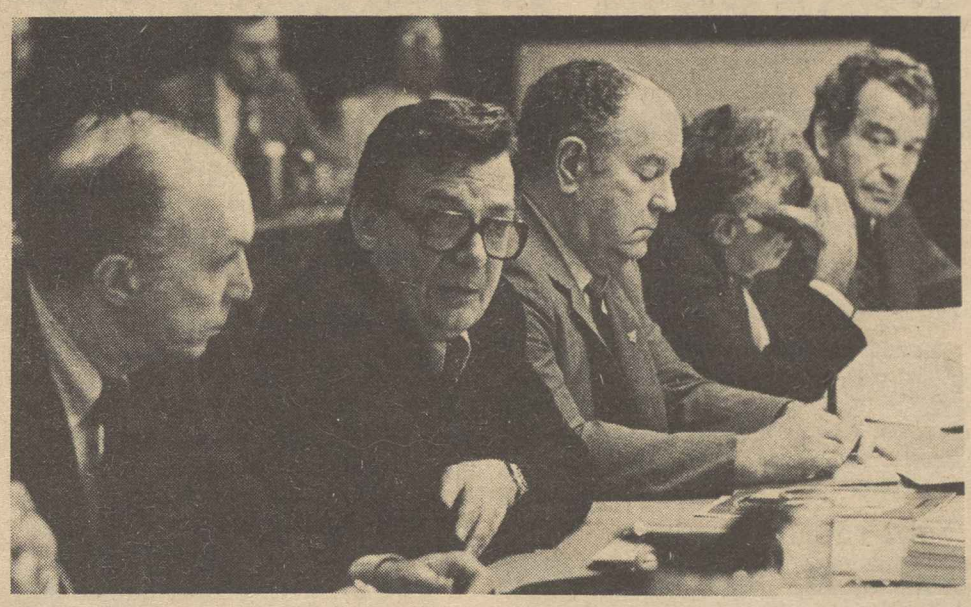
AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 | Saturday, February 21, 1981 | No. 8

Steelworkers Score Gains In Can Pacts

Costa Mesa, Calif.—The Steelworkers approved new three-year contracts with the nation's major can companies that will provide substantial wage and benefit improvements for some 20,000 workers.

Members of the union's Container Industry Conference ratified the settlements three days before the old contracts were to expire. The terms closely track the gains negotiated by the USWA last year in the basic steel, aluminum, and copper industries, the union said.



THE AGREEMENT, which is expected to set the pattern for about 20,000 other workers at smaller metal container firms, is with Continental Can Co., American Can Co., National Can Corp., and Crown Cork & Seal Co., Inc. The four companies bargained jointly with the union.

The new contracts provide general wage increases of 25 cents an hour in the first year of the agreement, 20 cents an hour the second year, and 15 cents in the final year. In addition, the increment between wage classifications will increase 2.5 cents over the term of the agreement, for an average wage improvement of 27.5 cents an hour.

The parties agreed to retain the same cost-of-living formula as in the old contracts. The formula automatically triggers a one-cent hourly wage adjustment for every three-tenths of a point increase in the government's consumer price index. The 23-cent hourly adjustment due Feb. 15 on the basis of price rises over the past three months was "rolled in" to workers' base pay.

MONTHLY PENSION benefits will be raised $1 for each year of service in the LABOR'S PROGRAM to combat the nation's nagging unemployment and inflation problems was the central topic at opening sessions of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla. Joining Federation President Lane Kirkland in the discussions are Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, left, and Vice Presidents Lloyd McBride, Jerry Wurf and Sol C. Chaikin.

Job Creation Measures Key Labor's Alternative

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO advanced its own comprehensive program to counter unemployment and inflation—the twin economic ills that plague the American economy.

Federation President Lane Kirkland termed the comprehensive Executive Council statement on the national economy "a positive, constructive and affirmative program"—in effect, the trade union movement's alternative to the Reagan Administration's economic proposals.

IT CALLED FOR a social security tax credit—a rebate equal to 20 percent of the employee's share of the payroll tax and 5 percent of the employer contribution. This would be healthier for the national economy and better for America's workers than the Kemp-Roth proposal for an across-the-board tax cut, the Executive Council said.

It urged that business tax reductions be targeted to stimulate investments that will create jobs and help revive recession-battered industries and communities. But tax revenues that are needed to sustain "basic income-support programs for the unemployed, the poor and the elderly" should not be sacrificed to give bigger windfalls to hugely profitable oil companies or to enable conglomerates to "invest" in new corporate takeovers, the council stressed.

The policy statement called for balancing the budget by bringing down unemployment. It urged that inflation be brought down by specific steps to moderate energy price increases, by credit controls and by government measures that would make housing more affordable.

ESPECIALLY, it stressed, inflation should be fought by reducing rather than pushing up the "high interest rates that choke the economy."

The council reiterated labor's call for a reindustrialization program that would reverse the erosion of goods-producing industries and the transportation system necessary to sustain them. It urged the formal joining of government, business and labor in a Reindustrialization Board that would include the mechanism for investing both public and private funds in the most needed areas.

Other ingredients of its prescription for reducing unemployment and rebuilding the economy include:

- Public sector jobs for both adult

Support for Aid to Poland Tied to Free Union Rights

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO is prepared to support an extension of American credits to Poland, but only if such aid is conditioned on the continued survival of that country's new free trade union movement.

"Only then can we be assured that the Polish workers, through their free unions, will be in a position to defend their gains and to struggle for a fair share of the benefits of Western aid," the Executive Council said in a statement here.

POLAND'S DEBT to the West already amounts to more than $20 billion, the largest of any of the East bloc countries. In the past, to insure repayment, the international banking community has pressured the Polish government into policies of austerity, which have been borne by the workers in the form of higher prices and longer work weeks.

"The extension of credits or rescheduling of Poland's debt could intensify the exploitation of Polish workers, and threaten their hard-won gains," the council statement observed.

IT SAID the reason that the Polish economy is on the verge of bankruptcy is mismanagement by the Polish government and the inefficiencies inherent in the Soviet-imposed economic system. Yet, the communist government cites Poland's economic troubles to counter the demands of the Polish free trade union coalition, Solidarity, for a 40-hour week, better wages, and lower prices, the AFL-CIO pointed out.

In a salute to "the brave men and

Cites Lack Of Equity in Budget Cuts

By David L. Perlman

Bal Harbour, Fla.—President Reagan's economic program is unfair and unworkable, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said, and labor will join with other concerned Americans to press alternatives that will meet the nation's needs "with true equality of sacrifice."

There is no such equity in the President's proposals to Congress, the Executive Council charged.

REAGAN'S TAX, budget, monetary and regulatory proposals would require "more sacrifice from those who have little," the council said. And those who are already wealthy—both individuals and corporations—would be the only "sure winners" in a hazardous "high-risk gamble with the future of America."

The council stressed labor's agreement with the goals of bringing down inflation, increasing employment, strengthening U.S. industries and making the federal government more efficient.

But it sharply disputed Reagan's proposed remedies and readily accepted his challenge that those who disagree with his program should come up with an alternative.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL did so, in a detailed economic policy statement proposing tax relief to those most squeezed by inflation, business incentives targeted to creating new jobs, and government programs designed to shore up America's industrial base. (Story, this page.)

Reagan's program, the council protested, would "substitute unrestrained market power for social responsibility and human concerns."

HIS PROPOSED budget cuts, which the council termed "the centerpiece of his program" include a slash of $17.5 billion from assistance to the jobless and the poor.

"For nearly 50 years, this country has built a network of social programs to improve the lot of the disadvantaged, provide support in times of adversity and

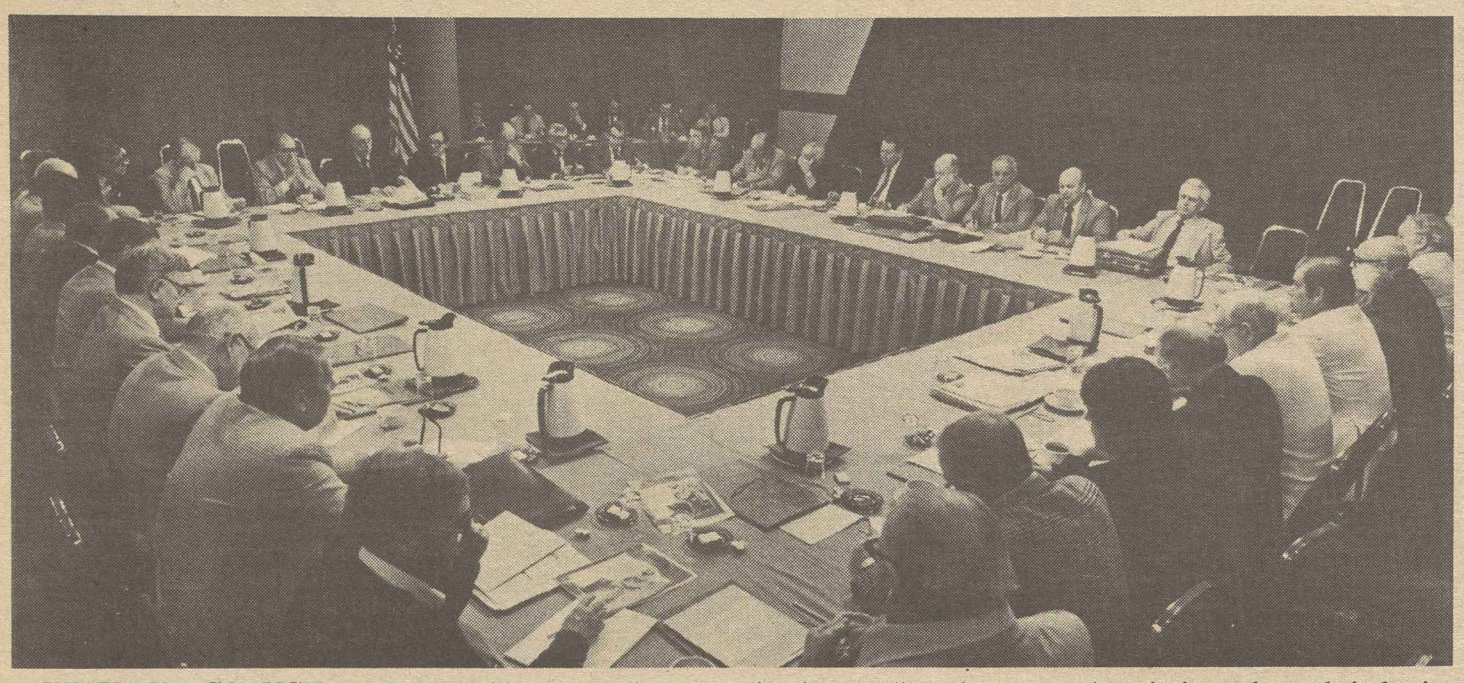
New Price Burst To Follow Lifting Natural Gas Lid



Bal Harbour, Fla.—Decontrol of natural gas prices would fuel a new burst of inflation that would prove even more costly to consumers than President Reagan's decision to end oil price controls, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

Natural gas prices flared up this winter even with price controls limiting the amount of increase. But the council cautioned that the Administration's plan to do away with all controls on natural gas prices by the end of September—more than three years ahead of schedule—would more than double home heating costs.

THE CUMULATIVE effect of premature decontrol of fuel prices amounts to a consumer price rise of $3,500 for every family, the council said.

Decontrol would also inflict "severe hardships" on moderate-income families, the AFL-CIO statement noted. But it would further enlarge the profits of energy companies, which already far exceed the profits of other industries.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL drafted a wide range of statements at its mid-winter meeting, addressing national issues that have a direct impact on America's workers, their families, the poor and the elderly.

Alternative Program Proposed To Revitalize Economy, Spur Jobs

workers and youth to provide new job skills and open up employment opportunities.

- A review of existing investment tax credits and other special tax breaks for business to plug the loss of billions of dollars in needed revenues and to channel business incentives into needed areas. Tax benefits of state and local industrial development bonds should be curtailed and integrated into the reindustrialization goals.

OVERALL, the council said, "direct, targeted jobs programs tailored to the specific needs of unemployed workers" are many times more effective in creating jobs than generalized tax cuts.

To restore buying power, the council said, tax benefits should be concentrated on middle-income and low-income wage earners, "those who have suffered the most from high inflation."

The 20-percent rebate on social security tax deductions, the statement noted, "would more than offset the recent increases in social security taxes on workers and have no adverse effect on the financial stability of the social security trust fund." And the employer 5 percent credit would help especially "employers in labor-intensive industries," the council pointed out.

Urging continued income support programs, the statement noted that for those without jobs buying power is dependent on such programs as unemployment assistance, trade adjustment assistance and food stamps.

"THE PROBLEMS of the poor in our society must be solved, not aggravated," the council said.

The anti-inflation recommendations included measures to hold down energy costs ranging from weatherization programs for public buildings and low-income housing to a government agency to purchase and distribute all oil imports.

The council also asked continued controls on natural gas prices and standby oil price controls.

It urged steps to expand the supply of low-income and middle-income housing, including below-market interest rates on mortgages. And it called for discouragement of conversion of rental housing to condominiums in localities where housing is short.

THE COUNCIL also proposed that foreign sales of U.S. grain be handled by a federal board, as is done in Canada. Other proposals included health care reforms to hold down costs as well as improve services.

Kirkland stressed at a news conference that labor's program is not a partisan challenge to the Reagan Administration.

"We wish the new Administration success," he said. "We have a stake in their success as citizens. We want to cooperate to the maximum extent possible."

But the labor movement has a program that it believes "would be effective in turning this economy around and reviving our industrial base," he said.

IT IS IN everybody's interests, Kirkland suggested, that the issues of economic policy be debated fully and that alternatives be presented. Then, "out of that traditional democratic process, we would hope that progress would emerge," he said.

He cited the political fact of life that "fiscal conservatism is dominant" today, in Congress as well as in the Administration. But if cuts are made, he said, there is a difference between "ratcheting everything down a bit, on an equitable basis," and the unacceptable alternative of "killing vital programs."

Gas Decontrol Seen Fueling Price Surge

The AFL-CIO statement scoffed at the suggestion that decontrol will spur oil and gas companies to new exploration and production. More likely, "the new profits from decontrol would enable the oil and gas companies to continue buying competitive energy sources."

ALREADY, the council said, oil prices "are no longer based on production costs, but are dictated to the United States by the OPEC cartel." Decontrol of natural gas would amount to allowing OPEC to dictate that price as well, the AFL-CIO charged.

The council resolution said it would be "false economy for the United States to contract abroad for the equipment to develop synthetic fuels when that equipment is available here."

To develop the technology this country needs for the future, the council urged, "the principle of 'Buy American' must be a major part of the synthetic fuels program."

ADOPTION OF the council statement here was followed in Washington by AFL-CIO testimony along the same lines before a House Energy subcommittee. Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe warned the panel that if controls on natural gas are allowed to expire next September, the government will be powerless in efforts to halt price gouging and profiteering during shortages.

Marlowe estimated that Reagan's decision to lift controls on oil will cost Americans about $12 billion in 1981.

"Decontrol of oil prices has allowed oil companies to raise gasoline prices 8-10 cents over the last two weeks—considerably more than the 3-5 cents predicted by the Administration," he noted.

Additional increases in wholesale prices have already been announced by some oil companies, Marlowe said, and "there is no reason to expect that prices will not rise even further as a result of decontrol."

DATA FROM various U.S. petroleum firms show that oil can be produced at prices far below the world market level, he noted.

"In a statement in 1979, Mobil said the cost of producing crude oil was $6.87 a barrel, including $1.52 of direct production cost; $4 for exploration, development, lease and royalty costs, and $1.35 for taxes. At that time, U.S. crude sold for an average of $8.33 a barrel. With decontrol, it can now be priced at the world market price of about $39 per barrel," Marlowe reported.

Free Unions, Press Basic To Liberty, Kirkland Says

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The most valid test of a nation's respect for human rights is the presence or absence of free institutions, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said at a news conference here.

Kirkland was asked his opinion of the Reagan Administration's human rights policy.

THAT WON'T be determined by rhetoric, he responded, but "by the extent to which they are prepared to engage in the promotion and support of free institutions within the societies that exist around the world."

There aren't many countries that are fully democratic in the American ideal, he said, and progress is not necessarily achieved by replacing one leader with another "while leaving the fundamental nature of a society unchanged."

The AFL-CIO's approach to advancing human rights is to advance the development of free institutions within societies, Kirkland said, adding: "That's the role that we are trying to play in our international activities." The name of the head of government "doesn't matter," he observed.

Free institutions, Kirkland made clear, include both trade unions and the press.

ALONG THESE lines, he said the AFL-CIO hopes for a stronger response from the new Administration than the Carter Administration made to a "press-control doctrine" being considered by UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization.

If carried out, Kirkland said, it would put the endorsement of an international organization on a press-control doctrine that would eliminate any role for a free press over much of the world.

Kirkland noted that the AFL-CIO had urged the previous Administration to serve a bold notice that the United States would "cease all support" of UNESCO if it adopted such a position.

The labor movement wasn't satisfied with the Carter Administration's response he said, and would welcome such a stand by the current Administration.

Public Sector Unions Post Membership Gains

Public employee union membership continues to grow with nearly half the nation's full-time state and local government employees represented by unions or employee associations in 1979, according to a report released by the U.S. Commerce Dept.

Of some 10.2 million full-time state and local government workers, 4.9 million or 48 percent were members of labor organizations in 1979, an increase of 2 percent over the previous year, the department's Bureau of the Census reported. Workers were covered by a total of 32,528 collective bargaining agreements during the year.

About a third of all full-time state and local workers, are teachers, and some 65 percent of them belong to unions or employee associations.

Congress Pressed to Halt Erosion of Minimum Wage

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO pressed Congress to stop the erosion of the federal minimum wage and reject any attempt to legislate a subminimum youth wage.

An Executive Council resolution endorsed the concept of indexing the minimum wage by keeping it at a constant percentage of average hourly earnings in manufacturing.

CONGRESS rejected the index concept in its 1977 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act. Instead, it opted for four annual step-ups that brought the wage floor to $3.35 an hour in the final step, which took effect at the start of this year.

Despite the series of increases, the council noted, the minimum wage has dropped from 50 percent of hourly earnings in manufacturing in 1967 to 43 percent currently. A wage floor of $3.72 an hour would have been needed last December to maintain purchasing power.

Lowering the minimum wage for youth would be an incentive for employers to replace older workers who have family obligations in order to hire teenagers at lower pay, the council statement charged.

THE AFL-CIO urged job programs for younger workers, but noted that 70 percent of the workers paid the minimum wage are adults, and a large portion of them are women who are the heads of households.

A fact sheet accompanying the resolution challenged the assertion that a subminimum wage would enable employers to "train" younger workers.

"How much training is required to turn a hamburger?" the minimum wage document asked. It noted that the McDonald's chain "is now a larger employer than U.S. Steel."

Employers even now are able to employ students at less than the minimum wage and, under the Targeted Jobs Credit program, can get a large tax credit for hiring economically disadvantaged youths. But older workers should not be "shoved to the end of the line of jobseekers," the council insisted.

The Executive Council statement also urged "adequate funding for aggressive enforcement of wage and hour laws."

Council Scores Reagan Economic Plan

strengthen the American economy," the AFL-CIO council stressed. "To destroy or weaken these programs is to weaken America."

Another $24 billion in proposed budget cuts would come from programs needed for economic recovery. If Congress goes along with the President's cuts, the council said, more than one million jobs will be sacrificed. In program terms, the cuts would set back goals for energy security, transportation improvements, environmental safeguards and urban development.

A related council statement firmly rejected the contention that budget limitations compel a choice between social programs and the national defense.

IN THE LAST Congress, the AFL-CIO opposed proposals for a percentage cut in the defense budget and the "transfer" of those funds to social programs.

"With equal vigor," the Executive Council said, it opposes the Reagan Administration view that social programs must be reduced to allow funds for military needs.

The Constitution mandates the government to "provide for the common defense" and to "promote the general welfare," not either-or, the council stressed.

REAGAN'S proposed cuts would come on top of the already heavily trimmed budget proposals made by the Carter Administration shortly before it left office. That Carter budget proposal skimped on the nation's needs, the AFL-CIO charged at the time. But the Reagan budget takes a meat ax to many labor-supported programs.

Food stamp eligibility would be slashed, and low-income families whose children get free school lunches would have to pay for them through a reduced food stamp allotment. Child nutrition programs would be cut nearly $1.7 billion.

A broad range of federal aid to education programs would be reduced. But as Reagan expressed it in his televised message to Congress, less federal money will mean less federal "control" over state and local school systems.

LIKEWISE, a reduction of $85 million in federal assistance to the arts and humanities is explained by Reagan as a reinforcement of the tradition of "voluntary contributions" by Americans to support cultural activities.

Proposed cuts in funds authorized for synthetic fuels programs will cost the economy $4.2 billion in plant construction next year and 69,000 jobs, according to an analysis by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research. Solar energy programs would also be reduced.

Social security disability payments would be further cut, and other benefit reductions that Congress refused to enact when they had been proposed by the Carter Administration are included in the Reagan budget.

MEDICAID WOULD be reduced, all Public Health Service hospitals would be closed, subsidized housing reduced, and Amtrak funding sharply cut back.

More than 340,000 persons in CETA job and training programs with state and local governments would lose their jobs, and two youth job programs would be ended.

Trade adjustment benefits, which unions have urged be expanded to include workers in supplier industries hurt by imports, would be drastically curtailed.

Severe postal cuts would raise rates sharply while curtailing service and employment. The already battered pay comparability system for federal workers would be further gutted.

THE AFL-CIO Executive Council statement sharply questioned the President's claim that his proposed pullbacks and revisions of government regulations will make American industry more competitive and productive. In attacking measures enacted to protect health, safety, the environment and consumers, "he ignores the contributions these laws have made to a higher quality of life," the council declared.

It agreed with Reagan's description of the current high interest rates as "absurd," but noted that they are largely the result of the tight-money policy Reagan has advocated.

Labor's alternative to a tight-money squeeze is selective credit controls "that would direct capital to productive investments while curbing speculation," the statement said.

THE COUNCIL challenged as misleading the President's statement that the across-the-board tax cut he proposed amounts to "an equal reduction in everyone's tax rates."

A family earning $10,000 a year would get a $52 tax break; the family earning $100,000 would get $1,840. It contrasted this with the AFL-CIO's proposal for a 20-percent tax credit on the social security payroll tax paid by workers.

Fully 60 percent of Reagan's proposed individual tax cut would go to the top 20 percent of taxpayers, the council noted. And more than 11 percent would go to a mere 1 percent of taxpayers.

AT A NEWS conference, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland voiced deep concern that Reagan's economic program with its "euphoric promise" that budget slashes and tax cuts combine to spell prosperity—is based on "exceedingly dubious economic theories that have not been adequately tested."

The risk of a grim economic downturn —as occurred in Britain under the similar doctrinaire approach of the Conservative Party government—should give Congress pause, Kirkland suggested.

Few economists give credence to the so-called Laffer Curve that is the theory behind the Kemp-Roth tax cut bill, Kirkland noted. And the monetary advice that economist Milton Friedman has handed out in his role as a consultant to governments in various countries has generally been followed by a new wave of inflation, he said.

AS TO THE social consequences of the Reagan Administration's proposals, Kirkland suggested that its authors have "short memories" and don't remember the grim conditions that led to their enactment, including the despair of the poor, burning inner cities and "long, hot summers."

He said the AFL-CIO has already initiated a revival of the budget coalition that was formed last year by labor, church, civil rights, senior citizen and community groups with a common concern for defending needed social programs.

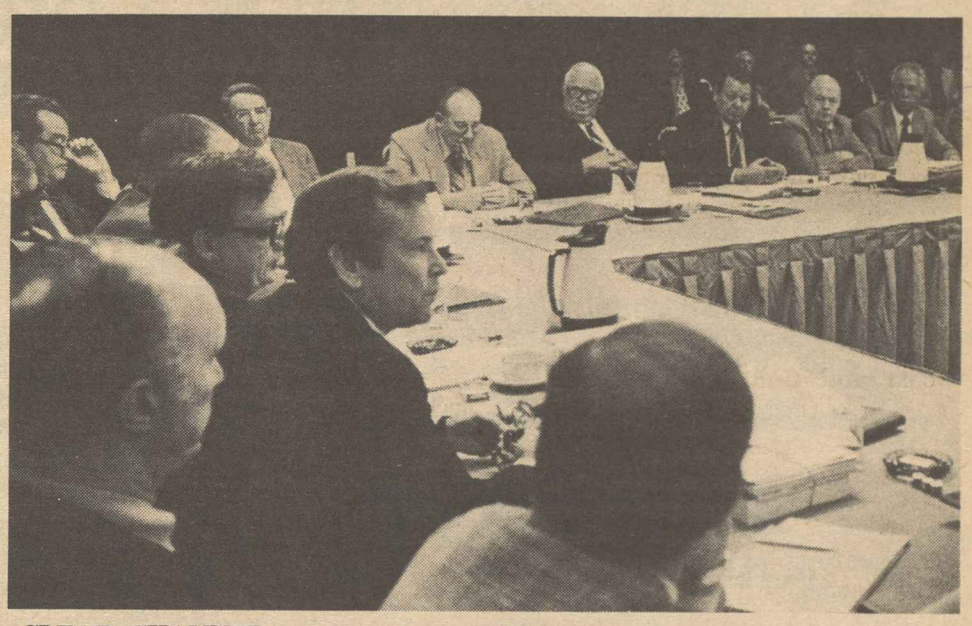
women of Solidarity," the council pledged full support of their cause in whatever ways they deem useful. Already, it noted, more than $200,000 has been raised by the AFL-CIO since the federation's General Board established a Polish Workers Aid Fund last September. This money is being used, in accordance with Solidarity's wishes, to buy much needed office equipment and supplies.

"This fund, built from contributions from every level of our trade union movement, demonstrates the strong solidarity of American workers with the struggle of their Polish brothers and sisters," the council said.

At a news conference, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland strongly rejected a suggestion that American labor's assistance to the Polish free trade union movement could be interpreted as "provocative." The AFL-CIO does not consider it provocative "to assist a brother union in its formative stages to exercise the rights of free association guaranteed by solemn international conventions," he said.



AND SINCE the Polish government has borrowed large sums from the West, Kirkland observed, "it seems passing strange that grants of assistance from Western trade unions—exceedingly modest in amount for very basic needs and supplies —should be condemned while living off of the largess or the loans of Western capitalists is perfectly okay."

The council statement pointed out that despite its pledges, the Polish government continues to obstruct Solidarity's growth. It still has not lived up to its side of the 21-point agreement with the union coalition signed last August in Gdansk. Media censorship has not been eliminated; Solidarity has been denied means to publish a weekly magazine; provincial chapters of Solidarity have been harassed by authorities; the government has refused to publish trade union legislation, and members of KOR—the Social Self-Defense Committee allied with Solidarity—are being persecuted.

"These actions can only fuel worker unrest," the council said. "The Polish Communist Party appears intent either on provoking a confrontation or on undermining Solidarity's position."

ADDING TO the tension, the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies have conducted a relentless campaign of intimidation aimed at frightening the Polish workers, the AFL-CIO charged. It noted that some 20 Soviet divisions have massed along the Polish border while the Soviet propaganda apparatus fires verbal threats, attacks on Solidarity's leadership, and denunciations of "subversive, anti-socialist forces" in the Polish unions.

As for the "massive and slanderous propaganda attack" that the USSR and its satellites have launched in recent months against the AFL-CIO because of its assistance to the Polish workers, the council declared: "We will be no more intimidated by these predictable tactics than the Polish workers have been."

CLEAR CHANNELS of communication should be open between the leadership of the Senate and organized labor, Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker (R-Tenn.) told the AFL-CIO Executive Council. Baker became majority leader in January, when Republicans took control of the Senate.

Two More Unions Join TV Monitoring Project

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Members of the Operating Engineers and the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers will join the Machinists in monitoring television news and entertainment shows in April on their portrayal of workers and unions.

Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner and BCT President John DeConcini announced at a joint news conference here that their members would participate in the Union Television Monitoring Project originated by the Machinists in 1980. Participants in the project systematically monitor national network news and entertainment programs and local news broadcasts to determine whether workers and their organizations are dealt with fairly.

Operating Engineers in San Francisco and Cleveland and BCT members in Richmond, Va., will join in the latest round of monitoring. The Machinists' 1980 project found that workers were rarely represented in TV programming, that newscasts were frequently biased against unions and that job categories in most TV shows are out of proportion to reality.

Republican Officials Promise Attention to Labor's Views

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor's views will be listened to in the Reagan Administration and in the Republican-controlled Senate, two guests at the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting promised.

Bill Brock, who holds the Cabinet-level post of U.S. special trade representative, told reporters that he will need the help of the nation's union leaders in dealing with complex trade negotiations and issues because "they know the problems."

AND SENATE Majority Leader Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) said he came to the Executive Council meeting "to explore future areas of cooperation and make sure that this group understands we wish to have a clear channel of communication."

Baker termed his meeting with the council "very positive" and said he saw a chance for labor and Senate Republicans to "narrow our differences" over labor law reform. It was a Republican filibuster that blocked passage of labor law reform in 1978.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said Baker personally has always given "thoughtful consideration" to labor's views.

"I don't automatically reject the notion of progress in the next couple of years," Kirkland commented. "I think there may be areas where we can reach some understanding, some agreement. And we're certainly open-minded and prepared to explore those possible areas to the fullest extent."

HE NOTED that there are no ideological or partisan lineups on a number of issues important to the nation.

On trade, Kirkland said the council's meeting with Brock was basically "an exploratory session." But on at least one issue, "I think we were in full agreement, at least on the nature of the problem."

Kirkland said Brock and the AFL-CIO are in accord on the potential for a large-scale export trade in U.S. coal.

The need, Kirkland stressed, is to remove "the barriers and impediments" which include "wholly inadequate" port and rail facilities, and "an adequate role for the American merchant marine in the transport of that cargo."

The Sagging Wage Floor

CONTINUED INFLATION has wiped out the purchasing power provided minimum wage workers by the 1977 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The current minimum wage of $3.35 an hour, which went into effect on Jan. 1, 1981, as the fourth and final step of the 1977 increases, was outdated by inflation before it reached the workers' paychecks. A minimum wage of $3.72 an hour would have been required in December 1980 in order to yield the same purchasing power as the $1.40 an hour minimum wage had in 1967.

Today's minimum wage is continuing to fall in purchasing power and threatens its five million recipients with becoming more dependent upon supplemental government support, such as food stamps and welfare assistance. The historic role of the federal minimum wage has been to set a floor under the level of wages an employer must pay so that he is not subsidized by tax-supported federal aid and community programs.

IF CONGRESS had accepted the 1977 proposals to index the minimum wage to average hourly earnings in manufacturing, minimum wage workers would be keeping pace with all other workers. The 1967 minimum wage of $1.40 an hour equaled 50 percent of gross average hourly earnings in manufacturing; the $3.35 minimum wage only equals about 43 percent of that standard.

The erosion of the buying power of the minimum wage makes a strong case for indexing it for the future.

A two-tier minimum wage or a subminimum wage for youth would encourage employers to fire older minimum wage workers with family obligations in order to hire younger workers at less pay. Minimum wage workers desperately need increased buying power to support themselves and their families, not a revolving door to the unemployment line.

While the teenage unemployment rate is disastrously high and demands effective programs to provide jobs for younger workers, we adamantly reject the contention that those jobs must come at the expense of older workers. Four of every five unemployed workers are not teenagers, yet older workers would be shoved to the end of the line of jobseekers so that employers could pay a lower wage to teenagers.

SEVENTY PERCENT of the workers who are paid the minimum wage are adults, and two-thirds of them are women, many of whom are heads of households. Clearly, their jobs would be jeopardized by a subminimum wage for teenagers.

The creation of age discrimination within the minimum wage structure could lead to further erosion of the wage floor based on race or sex with the specious justification that their higher unemployment rates require discriminatory wages. The federal government must not promote wage discrimination on any grounds, for any purpose.

Billions Spent Annually

Corporations Stick Consumers With Costs of Take-Over Wars

By Gus Tyler

McDERMOTT INC. wanted to take over Pullman Inc. The latter fought back and finally won, making an amicable deal with Wheelabrator-Frye Inc.

That sort of thing has, of course, been going on with many companies in this age of the conglomerate grab. But now, it seems, a vast expensive dimension has been added to the corporate combat: the fees for professionals.

In the one small instance noted above, the cost for lawyers, accountants, investment bankers and public relations experts came to more than $17 million. That bill was run up in a brief four months.

THE COMMENT of the chairman of Wheelabrator was simple: "That's obscene."

Actually, it's worse than "obscene," if we think about it. "Obscenity" is a moral notion that—repulsive as it may be—costs nothing as a rule. But this "obscenity" is very costly—not to the three great corporations who were the gory gladiators in the event, but to you and me.

First of all, these millions of dollars are pure waste. They produce nothing. They are the costs of a war—a war among corporate giants. They are no more productive than the weapons and ammunition in any war.

Second, you and I will ultimately have to pay for this waste. As far as the corporations are concerned, the costs of this combat are part of operating expenses. They add to the cost of production of whatever commodity or whatever service these outfits put on the market. As costs go up, so do prices for the consumers. So you and I ultimately subsidize this totally nonproductive struggle.

OBVIOUSLY, such an expensive expenditure must be inflationary. It adds to costs without producing anything that any consumer wants.

Third, this bit of extravagance once more makes it clear that when businessmen have oodles of capital on hand, they do not necessarily use that wealth to "invest" in production—to increase supply and to create jobs. As likely as not, they will use their riches to engage in wars to extend their empires without allocating even a penny to putting up a new facility, turning out another item, or employing another soul.

The $17 million spent on professionals, on mercenaries to do combat in the corporate conflict, is but a tiny piece of the total sum involved in this useless undertaking. The company was bought for the sum of $646 million.

What great good thing did this $646 million bring to you and me?

FROM THE CORPORATE view, somebody is happy: the Wheelabrator people must be happy with their extended empire; the Pullman people must be happy because the price was right. But from the view of the people—the worker looking for a job or the consumer looking for lower prices—the takeover brought more tears than cheer.

The case of Pullman is not unique. We mention it because it got front page treatment in the Wall Street Journal. Pullman is just one of many, suggesting that billions are spent every year in hiring armies of mercenaries for corporate empire building—all of it at our expense.

Polish Workers Saluted, Supported

The historic achievement of the Polish workers in creating and sustaining the first free and independent trade union movement in the communist world has excited the deep admiration of free trade unionists everywhere.

Since its birth in the strike of last August, Solidarity's membership has rapidly grown to ten million—three times the membership of the Polish Communist Party. With the collapse of the old official "unions," abandoned by the workers, Solidarity now incontestably represents the workers of Poland. This triumph is a tribute to the courage, skill and discipline of Lech Walesa and the Solidarity leadership, and the valiant working people of Poland.

The AFL-CIO salutes the brave men and women of Solidarity, and pledges full support of their cause in whatever ways they deem useful.

Costly High Interest Rates

Misguided Monetary Policies Worsen Inflationary Burden

Statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on high interest rate policies adopted Feb. 16, 1981, in Bal Harbour, Fla.

HIGH INTEREST rates, resulting from the monetary policies of the Federal Reserve Board, are counterproductive as weapons in the fight against inflation. They are inflicting both long- and short-term damage to the economy without reducing the inflationary forces of energy, food, housing and medical care. Rather, one of the leading sources of inflation is the high interest rates that add to the cost of everything.

High interest rates cause particular hardship for small businesses, homebuyers and consumers who, unlike multinational corporations and banks, do not have the ability to shop for credit around the world.

HIGH INTEREST rates and tight money cause the following economic damage:

- They increase unemployment, reduce government revenue and increase the cost of social programs.
- Interest payments on the federal debt, the fastest rising item in the federal budget, contribute to the deficit and divert funds needed for other vital programs.
- Exorbitant interest rates have created a depression in the housing industry. In housing, high interest rates contribute a triple-dose of inflationary pressure: through a housing shortage that drives up prices and rents; through higher purchase prices reflecting the added cost of interest on the construction loans, and through higher monthly payments and rents for the life of the mortgage.
- Needed investment in modernization of American industry is short-changed as businesses are confronted by 19 percent prime interest rates. Productivity improvements are postponed, perpetuating higher unit costs and impairing the ability of American industry to compete. Particularly hard hit have been the steel, automobile and related industries.
- High interest rates contribute to higher food prices and the sharp increase in farm bankruptcies.
- Tight money encourages capital investment in high-yield but high-risk ventures unrelated to the needs of the economy, including: financing company takeovers; apartment conversions to condominiums which yield capital gains rather than new housing; financing of gambling casinos and luxury resorts, and speculation in commodities, such as the attempt by the Hunt brothers to corner the silver market.

AS AN ANTI-INFLATION policy, high interest rates and tight money can neither reduce the inflationary impetus resulting from worldwide food demands brought on by drought and increased population, nor reduce the energy prices dictated by the OPEC cartel.

The Federal Reserve's policies are wasting America's capital and human resources, prolonging the recession and aggravating inflation. These policies must be changed and the financial structure of the United States adapted to overcome impediments to stable economic growth. In a democratic society, credit policy must not be the exclusive domain of the central bank and its banking constituency.

Credit management measures must be used to allocate available capital resources. Japan, France, West Germany and Holland have made effective use of credit management techniques to achieve better economic growth. The U.S. experience is limited to the spring of 1980 when, for the first time, the Credit Control Act of 1969 was invoked.

While there were unfair retroactive changes of outstanding credit arrangements and preemption of some state consumer credit safeguards, the restrictions on total bank credit extensions helped bring the prime rate down from 20 to 11 percent in four months.

UNFORTUNATELY, as the economy began its temporary recovery, the credit management measures were rescinded and there was a return to the overall tight money policy.

It is imperative that the United States turn away from the disastrous reliance on tight money and high interest rates. Specifically, the AFL-CIO urges the following immediate actions:

1. Channel credit to high-priority areas.
2. Curtail the use of credit by speculators.
3. Limit the extension of credit for overseas ventures.
4. Make the Federal Reserve Board more representative of American society.
5. Encourage use of pension funds for home mortgage loans.

Achieving these goals will require:

- Making the Credit Control Act of 1969 permanent in order to channel available credit to high-priority areas and to discourage excessive speculation. The Act should be amended to prevent lender abuses in consumer credit and to require the Federal Reserve Board to promptly report to Congress on its credit control activities.
- Giving the President authority to restrict U.S. capital investment abroad and curb the extension of credit to foreign ventures whenever it is deemed necessary to increase investment in domestic plant and equipment.
- Amending the Federal Reserve Act to enlarge the Board of Governors to 11 members and broaden its representation to include industry, labor, agriculture and consumers. The Federal Reserve Board should then assume the duties of the Open Market Committee.
- Encouraging the investment of pension funds in long-term, fixed payment mortgages, with appropriate insurance against loss, in order to help more families purchase housing.

20-Year Outlook

Safety Role of Pilots Essential In Coming Surge of Air Traffic

MAINTAINING air safety in future decades hinges on effective input from the nation's professional pilots, President John J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots declared on Labor News Conference.

Pointing out that air traffic volume is expected to double in the next 20 years, O'Donnell urged that new models of aircraft for commercial passenger and freight service undergo more comprehensive, realistic and objective evaluation than the current "backroom" certification process conducted by the Federal Aviation Administration and the manufacturers.

He said that "full-mission simulations," a procedure urged by the union but rejected by the FAA, are the only sure way to determine how many qualified pilots are needed in the cockpit crews of the larger and more sophisticated aircraft that will be flying in a more crowded air space.

Safety is a top priority for the pilots who will be flying those aircraft, and they should be part of the process that determines how the planes can be most safely operated, O'Donnell declared.

HE SAID the union's national campaign to alert both pilots and the public to the issues involved in air safety, dubbed "Operation USA," is now well under way in 16 major U.S. cities. He said the union's goal is to persuade the Reagan Administration to "create a commission to do fair and effective evaluation" of the crew-size issue.

Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis has since assured the ALPA executive board that the Administration will appoint a three-member panel of impartial experts within the next two weeks to investigate the crew-size issue.

"Let professional pilots make our points to a fair and objective body and we will live with the results," O'Donnell asserted.

IN A NATION blessed with abundant resources and highly productive farms and factories, perhaps nowhere is the sad fact of poverty in the midst of plenty more starkly illustrated than in rural America. Some facts:

- The rural areas, with nearly a third of the nation's population, account for almost half of the officially recognized poor; about two-thirds of the population receive inadequate medical services, and about half are poorly housed. As many as 10 million rural Americans live in homes with no indoor plumbing.
- Rural black workers earn only half as much as the national average for all workers.
- About half of the rural Hispanic families headed by women live in poverty.
- About 60 percent of all Native American families on reservations live in substandard or overcrowded housing.

Numbers, however, tell only part of the story about being poor or powerless in a rural America still nostalgically romanticized as a place of rustic charm or looked upon as a recreational playground void of real inhabitants.

BUT IF YOU WORK for the Zenith Corp. in Watsontown, Pa., being powerless means watching helplessly as the plant is closed and your job is moved to Taiwan. In Kodak, Ky., it means seeing your home bulldozed away to get the coal beneath the surface. In Madera, Calif., if you're a farmworker, it means living with the daily fear that your family may be poisoned by the careless use of pesticides.

Problems such as these have resulted largely from public policies designed to support narrow economic interests engaged in the exploitation of rural resources and people. Tax laws, government subsidies, research and so-called development programs have been tailored to these corporate interests.

ON THE OTHER SIDE of the coin, public policy has been one of systematic neglect of the needs of rural people despite their disproportionate share of social and economic problems. Public investment in housing, health care, education, transportation, job-creation and job training programs has been minimal. For example, since the 1930s, less than 20 percent of the nation's major housing support funds went to rural areas.

In another instance, one of President Carter's first acts after taking office in 1977 was to launch an emergency program to pump $4 billion into municipal public works. But the Administration casually excluded from eligibility all towns with populations under 50,000.

It was this state of affairs which brought to Washington more than a thousand persons from throughout the nation for the fifth national conference sponsored by Rural America, which has been laboring since 1975 to organize communities and to give rural issues a national focus.

DURING THE three-day conference in early February, delgates from over a hundred rural organizations and coalitions met in workshops on a wide range of issues—production and marketing co-ops, community control through land trusts, community development block grants, federal programs for economic development, the use of rural dumping grounds for hazardous wastes—to name a few.

To increase their level of organization and political influence, the delegates launched a National Alliance for Rural Action (NARA), which will strive to become "a visible national movement" beginning at the level of grass roots coalitions. NARA leaders said plans include setting up an independent political action committee in addition to seeking alliances with progressive forces in urban areas. These would include labor, minorities and women.

The recognition at the Rural America conference that stronger bonds must be forged with natural allies is part of a welcome trend among progressive interests, including organized labor, environmentalists, consumers and minorities.

A FULL ROLE in commercial airline safety must be played by the professionals who fly the aircraft, President John J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Martha Hamilton of the Washington Post and Drew Von Bergen, right, of the United Press International. The program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

UNION LABEL AND SHOP CARD promotion at the AFL-CIO Union Industries Show scheduled for Baltimore in May was on the agenda of the AFL-CIO Union Label Dept.'s board meeting in Florida. Seated at the head of the table are Department President John E. Mara and Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid.

U.S. Urged to Condition Aid To El Salvador on Reforms

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Any future U.S. assistance to strife-ridden El Salvador should be conditioned on reciprocal action by that country's government to bring domestic violence under control and institute democratic reforms that improve the conditions of workers, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

"The years of oppression that have helped create a revolutionary situation in El Salvador will not be corrected by more repression or continued failures to improve living and working conditions," the Executive Council observed in a statement at its winter meeting.

IT CALLED for immediate consultation and dialogue between the government of El Salvador and private democratic organizations, including free rural and urban trade unions, on plans to guarantee free elections monitored by the Organization of American States as soon as possible.

The AFL-CIO renewed its support of democratic land reform to improve the lives of hundreds of thousands of Salvadoran campesinos, a cause for which two representatives of the American Institute for Free Labor Development gave their lives last month. The two, Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman, were assassinated with the president of the country's largest democratic framers' organization, Jose Rodolfo Viera, by unknown gunmen.

"Bullets cannot kill the dreams they shared with the farmers of El Salvador for their own land," the council said. "More than six weeks have passed since the assassinations. As yet, the government of El Salvador has not brought to justice those who are responsible for the murders.

"THIS INACTION only encourages the senseless violence of both communist and reactionary terrorist groups, which has resulted in the wanton slaying of many other innocent victims."

The land reform program has the full support of the democratic urban and agrarian trade union organizations in El Salvador, and is a major step toward satisfying the aspirations and needs of the peasants, the council observed.

It noted also that the country's interim government has begun the titling process giving land to individual peasants and peasant cooperatives, with compensation to the old owners, thus making the long-overdue land reform a reality.

EXPRESSING condolences to the families of "our slain brothers" who died for the land-reform project, the council said the labor movement has a special obligation to Hammer's family and noted that the AIFLD has established a scholarship fund to assure the education of his 17-year-old son, Michael, Jr. It invited AFL-CIO affiiliates and others to contribute to the fund.

Council Supports Efforts of Cuban Freedom Group

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The objectives of Cuba Independent and Democratic (CID) were endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its winter meeting here.

CID was founded at a congress held in October 1980 in Caracas, Venezuela, with the aim of working for establishment in Cuba of "a society consecrated to freedom and human dignity, totally democratic and sovereign, socially balanced and just," the council noted.

It cited particularly the CID's founding principles calling for guarantees of a free trade union movement in Cuba.

Huber Matos, who was held prisoner in Cuba for 20 years for his opposition to increasing communist domination of the Castro regime, is general secretary of CID. Matos addressed the delegates to the 1979 AFL-CIO convention some three weeks after his release from Cuban jails.

"The AFL-CIO endorses the objectives of CID," the council's statement said, "and wishes it well in its efforts to free the Cuban people from the Castro tyranny." Castro has permitted Cuba to serve as a base for the Soviet Union in Latin America, the council said, and has sent troops to Africa to aid other Soviet-supported regimes while attempting to thwart democratic governments elsewhere in the Caribbean and Latin America.

Steelworkers Win Container Pacts

first and second years of the agreement and by $2 in the third year. The monthly supplement for early and disability retirees was raised from $300 to $360.

Increases for workers who are already retired range from 8 to 70 percent of their pensions. Those who retired before 1964 will receive a boost of 70 percent, or an additional $140 to $145 a month. The industry has an unusually high ratio of retired workers to active employees.

Other improvements include increases in the weekly sickness and accident insurance in three annual steps by amounts ranging from $59 to $71 a week, expanded health insurance benefits as well as a score of other changes in contract language dealing with such matters as safety and health, grievance procedure, arbitration, and benefits to spouses and survivors.

The union succeeded in establishing a program for "Justice and Dignity on the Job," which prohibits a company from removing an employee from active work pending the final resolution of any grievance challenging his or her discharge or suspension. Such a worker will remain on the payroll until the grievance is settled or decided in arbitration.

U.S. Relief Asked For Refugees of Somali Conflict

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The U.S. government should step up its emergency relief assistance to some 1.5 million refugees from war and drought in the African nation of Somalia, the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged.

The federation will help publicize the need for aid, particularly vaccines and medical supplies, and will ask its affiliates to give financial assistance to private organizations working on Somali relief, the council pledged.

The council applauded the efforts of the Teachers and the Graphic Arts International Union to focus attention on the need for medical care and supplies, food, clothing and shelter for the refugees.

United Nations estimates are that more than 90 percent of the refugees in Somalia are women or children under 15, the council pointed out. The more than 300,000 children under six suffer the highest mortality rate, primarily from measles and diarrhea.

Despite its limited resources, the government of Somalia has allocated some assistance to the refugees, the council noted, but because the country is a net importer of food, the provision of any food to the refugees creates shortages among the rest of Somalia's population.

Trickle-Down Scheme Cited In 'Urban Enterprise Zones'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The "urban jobs and enterprise zone" proposal is little more than a localized version of "trickle-down" economics and would not correct problems of decay and high unemployment in the cities, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The measure, introduced in the last Congress by Rep. Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.), "is based exclusively on the simplistic but false notion that local economic problems will disappear if government would spend less, tax less, and protect less," the council statement said.

THE PROPOSAL is really a tax package, the council observed. It would cut local real estate taxes, regardless of the tax base or public service needs. Social security contributions would be reduced, the capital gains loophole widened, business depreciation write-offs speeded up, and corporate tax rates slashed.

"There is no requirement that the business recipients of such special tax largess add to their workforce or increase investment levels," the statement pointed out. "And there is no provision to compensate localities for lost property tax revenue. Existing firms in zone areas may well reap a windfall for what they were already doing. Landlords are not required to pass property tax reductions on to tenants.

"Because the plan lacks a mechanism to deny benefits to firms that move from other areas into 'enterprise zones' merely to exploit the tax breaks, the result could be shifting unemployment from one area to another rather than a net increase in jobs."

A KEY PROVISION in the measure would permit a 90-percent reduction in employer and employee social security taxes for workers in the "zone" under the age of 21 and a 50 percent reduction for all other workers. This would endanger the social insurance principles of the social security system and undercut its financing, the council warned.

"It would constitute a clear inducement for employers to fire parents to hire their children and add another form of discrimination based on age," it added.

THE AFL-CIO has supported selectively targeted policies for particular areas, industries, and people—including tax concessions, the council noted.

"But we are convinced that any tax reductions must take place within the framework of a coordinated national economic revitalization program involving all sectors of the economy and using the government's full range of economic tools—training, public facilities, and direct loans or grants," it said.

Tight Money Seen Fanning Inflation Fire

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The high interest rates imposed by the tight-money policies of the Federal Reserve Board are "counter-productive" in the battle against inflation, the AFL-CIO declared.

Interest rates "add to the cost of everything," the Executive Council noted. But the high rates "cause particular hardship for small businesses, homebuyers and consumers who, unlike multinational corporations and banks, do not have the ability to shop for credit around the world."

HIGH INTEREST rates and tight money leave the real causes of current inflation virtually unscathed, the AFL-CIO said. But they do "increase unemployment, reduce government revenue and increase the cost of social programs."

Further, "exorbitant interest rates have created a depression in the housing industry, made needed investment in modernization of American industry too costly and sent capital scurrying to high-risk, high-profit speculative ventures," the council pointed out.

On top of that, the statement noted, interest payments on the federal debt have been "the fastest rising items in the federal budget," adding to deficits.

"As an anti-inflation policy, high interest rates and tight money can neither reduce the inflationary impetus resulting from worldwide food demands brought on by drought and increased population nor reduce the energy prices dictated by the OPEC cartel," the council observed.

CALLING FOR a turnabout in policy, the AFL-CIO statement urged:

- Strengthening and making permanent the Credit Control Act "in order to channel available credit to high-priority areas and to discourage excessive speculation."
- Giving the President authority to restrict U.S. capital investment abroad and curb extension of credit to foreign ventures whenever it is deemed necessary to increase investment in domestic plant and equipment.
- Amending the Federal Reserve Act to enlarge the Board of Governors to include representatives from industry, labor, agriculture and consumers.
- Encouraging investment of pension funds in long-term, fixed payment mortgages to help more families purchase housing.

Imports Batter Economy

New Trade Policy Urged To Stem Industrial Skid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—U.S. foreign trade and investment policies must put greater stress on American interests because the worsening impact of imports is compounding the nation's domestic economic problems, the Executive Council declared.

The council called for a series of remedies, including immediate import relief for the U.S. auto industry and parts suppliers, renegotiation of improved marketing agreements on textiles and apparel, extension of import restraints on shoes and steel, promotion of U.S. exports and wider use of American-flag shipping, as well as improved adjustment assistance for workers who lose their jobs to imports.

WHILE AMERICAN exports confront new barriers abroad, an increase in imports is encouraged by easy access to U.S. markets, the council's statement observed.

"This is leading to heightened awareness of the major role international trade is playing in the continued erosion of America's industrial base," the council said.

"The United States must remain a major maritime, agricultural and manufacturing nation, and it needs a foreign trade policy that will insure—not undercut—that goal."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned at a press conference that the United States—taking into account the state of its economy—could not absorb the collapse of one or two major corporations in its basic industrial base.

"THE BIG American market depends in the last analysis on employment and on jobs and on incomes," Kirkland asserted. "If those jobs collapse and those sources of employment collapse, the market's going to collapse," he said in warning that the impact will be felt worldwide.

"The consequencies and the shock waves will not be confined to the shores of the United States," he said. "It will wash over to Japan, as it did during the Thirties, and there will not be any market for Japanese products, or German products, or Swiss products, or anybody's products."

The council adopted its statement on foreign trade and investment after conferring with President Reagan's special trade representative, Bill Brock.

BROCK TOLD reporters that "it would be difficult to support legislated quotas" on imports, but suggested that relief for struggling American industries might be achieved through the negotiation of marketing agreements.

The council statement noted that the most severe impact from imports is being felt by America's basic industries—autos and auto parts, steel, textiles, shoes, electronics and new-technology products.

It also cited developing problems for U.S. industries, such as banking, transportation, insurance, communications and engineering that seek to expand abroad, but are often stymied by foreign laws and practices.

"ON THE OTHER hand," the statement observed, "the relatively open U.S. investment market encourages foreign investors in real estate, building and construction, banking and retail stores to expand here."

The council called for swift passage of the Danforth-Bentsen bill in the Senate that would impose a three-year quota on Japanese auto imports and urged that relief be extended to auto parts manufacturers.

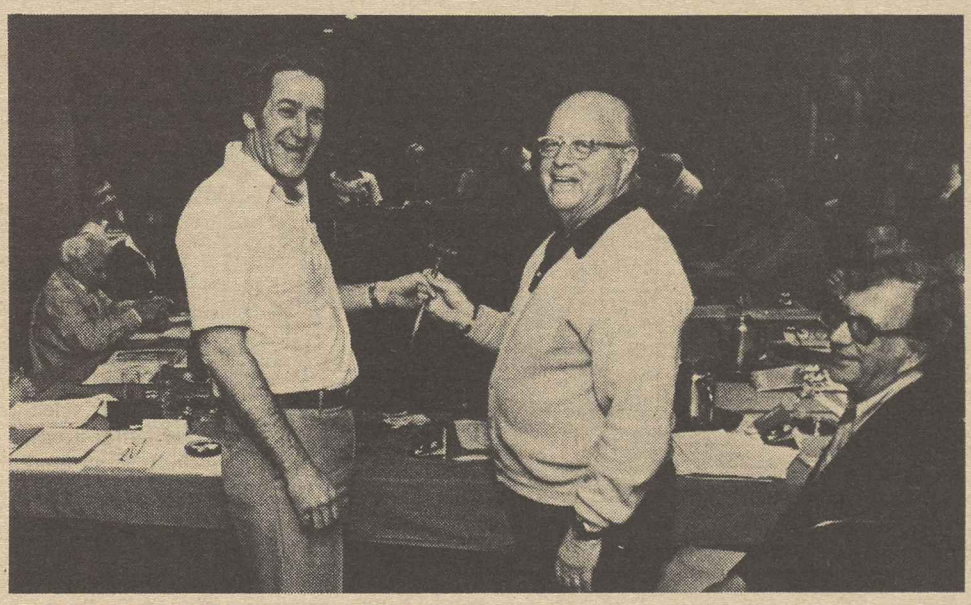
In another area, the statement called for repeal of the Generalized System of Preferences under which zero-tariff status is given to hundreds of products imported from so-called developing countries.

"At a bare minimum," the council said, "Congress and the Administration should remove import-sensitive products from the list, guarantee that only the neediest countries receive benefits, and exclude communist countries."

ADDRESSING the growing problem of import-caused job losses, the council called for improvements in trade adjustment assistance to insure that all affected workers receive prompt aid.

"Legislation should ease the overly stringent requirements for proving injury and provide relief for those who make parts or components or provide services. Benefits should not be contingent on exhaustion of unemployment benefits, and training and relocation support should be expanded."

Blaylock Elected To Head Public Employee Dept.



Bal Harbour, Fla.—William H. McClennan retired as president of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., which he had headed since its founding in 1974, and Kenneth Blaylock was elected to fill out his term.

Blaylock is president of the Government Employees and has been treasurer of the department. McClennan is president-emeritus of the Fire Fighters.

In other action, the department's executive board named Teachers President Albert Shanker to succeed Blaylock as treasurer and designated Service Employees President John Sweeney chairman of the department's newly formed organizing committee. The department now has 35 affiliates representing some 2 million federal, local and state government workers.

The terms of Blaylock and Shanker will run until the department convention next June.

The executive board also adopted a resolution supporting the boycott of Perdue poultry and released a new booklet on job safety and health issues in the public sector.

NEW PRESIDENT of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., President Kenneth Blaylock of the American Federation of Government Employees, receives the gavel from his predecessor, William H. McClennan, president-emeritus of the Fire Fighters who had headed the PED since its founding in 1974.

PREVAILING WAGE protections for workers on federally funded construction projects were a major topic at the executive board meeting of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. This discussion between formal sessions of the board drew Asbestos Workers President Andrew T. Haas, left, BCTD President Robert A. Georgine, and Plasterers' President Joseph T. Power.

Program Mapped to Assist Black South African Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO pledged renewed support for the development of free trade unions in South Africa.

The federation's Executive Council spelled out a specific program of financial and technical aid to help black workers in South Africa organize functioning trade unions as a means of improving their social and economic conditions.

TRADE UNION activity, the council emphasized, must be keyed to the need for basic changes that will lead to increased participation by blacks in the country's government and elimination of the official policy of racial segregation and discrimination known as apartheid.

The program endorsed by the council calls for establishment of a central office to coordinate all U.S. labor activities in support of trade unions in South Africa. The new unit will be set up within the African-American Labor Center, an auxiliary organization of the AFL-CIO. It will work in cooperation with other international labor bodies and trade secretariats.

The council also called for creation of a special fund to aid unions in South Africa which will include a legal defense fund. The federation also pledged to help to publicize South African labor developments in the United States.

Specific programs will be developed to provide training and direct assistance in organizing, collective bargaining, and leadership and membership training, the council said. These programs will include training and study programs in both the United States and South Africa, help in gathering and using collective bargaining information, assignment of an AALC representative to South Africa and other U.S. trade unionists to special short-term projects in the country.

CERTAIN schools and institutions in South Africa will be urged and helped to devise educational programs and skill-training activities, the council said, with emphasis on selective scholarship aid for black workers.

No specific dollar amounts have been set for the new program, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said at a news conference during the council's meeting. He pointed out that it is still unclear what the total needs of the program will be and what barriers may be raised by South African authorities to the increase in trade union activities.

In its statement outlining the program, the council noted that it is not enough for the government of South Africa to simply say it is moving toward recognition of black trade unions. "The basic unqualified trade union rights of every worker in South Africa irrespective of race must be accepted," the council said, emphasizing that "any attempts to tamper with these rights, either by diluting or qualifying them," would be unacceptable.

THE COUNCIL noted that support of trade union rights for black South Africans is part of the AFL-CIO's "long-standing commitment to social change." Such rights, the council observed, "are an integral part of the basic freedoms which have been denied to blacks in South Africa."

The AFL-CIO's program in South Africa will focus first on the development of strong, united black trade unions to help ease the "tremendous disparity" between black and white workers, the council said.

When black workers have established a labor movement with trained leadership "that can fully represent its members and bargain freely for them," the federation will be able to work with the South African labor movement "as an entity," it said.

Council Scores Bid to Undercut Wage Standards

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Prevailing wage laws such as the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contract Act "must not be weakened at the federal or state level through legislative or administrative actions," the AFL-CIO Executive Council affirmed.

Conservative and business organizations have masqueraded their attack on federal and state prevailing wage laws as a battle against inflation, the council noted. But "undercutting community wage standards and weakening working conditions" won't dent the inflation rate, the council said. The only impact will be harm to both workers and their communities, it warned.

"Prevailing wage laws are based upon community wage scales and are established to discourage employers from importing cheap labor from outside the community," the council noted. In fact, it pointed out, "the majority of wage determinations are below those negotiated by unions for their members."

Where union scales are the prevailing wage in a locality, anti-union groups have charged that the wage structure freezes minorities out of construction jobs. The truth is, the council said, that "union apprenticeship programs have a far better record in recruiting and training minorities than non-union apprenticeship programs."

Drive Opens to Fund Paul Hall Studies Chair

National business, labor, and government officials have opened a drive to fund a permanent program in marine transportation studies at the University of Southern California in memory of the late Seafarers' president, Paul Hall.

Heading the drive as co-chairmen are Frank Drozak, who succeeded Hall as SIU president, and Herbert Brand, chairman of the Transportation Institute board of trustees. Hall, an AFL-CIO vice president, died last June.

Broad Program Outlined

U.S. Shipping Revival Linked to Coal Exports

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Increased coal exports could be the catalyst for a shipping and shipbuilding revival that would spur the entire U.S. economy, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the executive board of the Maritime Trades Dept.

Kirkland said the department is on the right course in stressing the potential for increasing coal exports from the United States to an energy-hungry world.

THE DEPARTMENT'S 43 affiliated unions joined in calling for a national commitment to improve inland waterways for cheaper and more efficient transport of coal, a construction program to build up the depleted and antiquated bulk cargo fleet, and bilateral agreements with coal-purchasing nations to assure that an equitable share of coal exports is carried on American-flag vessels.

"There was never a better time for America to revitalize her shipping and shipbuilding industries," Kirkland said.

Such a program, he stressed, would enhance the national security and stimulate the entire economy. "It would mean enhanced profits, as well as paychecks."

He promised the MTD leaders that "in the months ahead, as you try to impress those facts on the new Administration and the new Congress, the AFL-CIO will be at your side all the way."

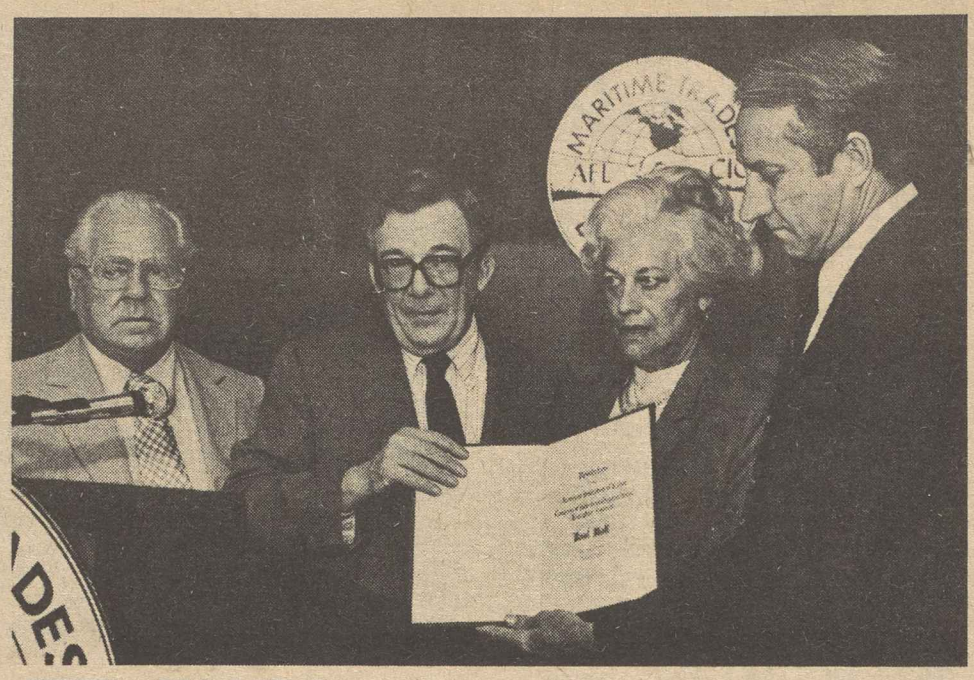
THE TWO-DAY board meeting was the occasion for the reaffiliation of the Longshoremen. The ILA was one of the department's founding unions in 1946, but withdrew over jurisdictional and policy differences in 1967.

MTD President Frank Drozak, who is also president of the Seafarers, welcomed the ILA's reaffiliation as strengthening labor's campaign for "a strong and healthy maritime industry."

The board meeting also marked the first occasion for Rep. Walter B. Jones (D-N.C.) to meet with the board in his new role as chairman of the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee.

Jones made clear that he shares labor's concern at the wide gap between promise and performance in carrying out the goals of the Merchant Marine Act. That law, he stressed, terms it necessary "that the United States shall have a merchant marine sufficient to carry its domestic water-borne commerce and a substantial portion of the water-borne export and import foreign commerce . . . owned by U.S. citizens, built in the United States and manned by citizen crews."

ANOTHER congressional ally, Rep. Leo C. Zeferetti (D-N.Y.), backed the department's goal of an equitable share of coal exports to be carried in U.S. vessels. He voiced concern at the fact that the few U.S. bulk carriers average 30 years old and transport only 2 percent of dry bulk cargo.



More than two dozen resolutions and policy statements were adopted by the board, some dealing with specific maritime concerns such as strong support for negotiation of bilateral shipping agreements with this country's trading partners, and others covering a broad scope of labor movement concerns—from opposition to a subminimum youth wage to support for the boycott of Perdue poultry products.

The more than 200 delegates and guests gave affectionate ovations to Rose Hall, widow of longtime MTD president Paul Hall, during presentations of plaques and scrolls from the AFL-CIO Executive Council and from the department. Mrs. Hall was also made an honorary member of the board.

PAUL BURNSKY, president of the Metal Trades Dept., which represents a large share of the nation's shipyard workers, stressed in remarks to the board that a merchant fleet under the U.S. flag is essential to the nation's security.

Scoring the so-called "flags of convenience" that carry most of the commerce to and from the United States, Burnsky said "there are no countries anywhere to which we can entrust control of the U.S. merchant fleet." And, he added, "on the high seas and in the shipyards, what is good for Exxon is not good for the security of the United States."

Other speakers included AFL-CIO department heads dealing with legislation, political education, research, education and field services. Former Maritime Administrator Andrew Gibson addressed the board in his role as president of Delta Steamship Lines.

SPECIAL RESOLUTION honoring the service and dedication to the labor movement of Paul Hall, late president of the Seafarers and the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., is presented to Hall's widow, Rose, during the department's executive board meeting in Florida. Joining AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in the presentation are MTD Vice President Stephen J. Leslie, left, and MTD President Frank Drozak.

Don Shasteen Named To Labor Dept. Post

Don Shasteen has been appointed deputy Under Secretary of Labor for legislation and intergovernmental relations. His appointment was announced by President Reagan and Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan.

A former newsman, Shasteen was the Republican nominee for the U.S. Senate in Nebraska in 1978. He was an assistant to Sen. Carl T. Curtis (R-Neb.) from 1966 to 1978 and to Sen. Gordon J. Humphrey (R-N.H.) in 1979-80.

Spurting Fuel Prices Pace New Rise in Wholesale Index

Wholesale prices, which nearly doubled their rate of increase in January, could go even higher in coming months because of President Reagan's recent decontrol of U.S. crude-oil prices.

About 40 percent of last month's overall increase of nine-tenths of 1 percent in the government's producer price index resulted from higher prices for gasoline, home-heating oil, and natural gas, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said in releasing its monthly report on wholesale price movements.

CRUDE OIL price increases recently imposed by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries were reflected in the January data, but the figures did not include the effects of Reagan's Jan. 28 decision to decontrol domestic oil prices. These will begin to show up in next month's statistics.

Adding to the prospects for continued high inflation is the effect of the cold weather in Florida. While this has not been a factor in the index in recent months, prices of oranges, orange juice, and other fruits and vegetables grown in Florida have already begun to rise, and are likely to add inflationary pressure to producer price levels before long.

The January increase in wholesale prices was the largest monthly rise since last August, when prices at the producer level rose 1.2 percent. Producer prices rose five-tenths of 1 percent in December and seven-tenths of 1 percent in both October and November.

WHOLESALE energy prices increased 2.7 percent over the month, almost twice as fast as in December. Gasoline sold to dealers was up 2.5 percent and home-heating oil rose 5.7 percent. From October through January, finished energy prices climbed at an annual rate of 26.2 percent, far more than the 4.5 percent annual rate of increase for the six months ended in October, BLS observed.

Energy prices at the crude and intermediate stages also rose sharply in January—2.2 and 2.8 percent, respectively. The crude energy component has risen at an accelerating rate in the past few months. It went up 1.2 percent in November and 1.7 percent in December.

The major bright spot in the January wholesale figures was the stability in food prices. Prices for finished consumer foods were unchanged after climbing six-tenths of 1 percent in the preceding month.

THE ONLY substantial food price increases were for milled rice, fish, and soft drinks. Prices of such finished food items as fresh fruits, eggs, processed poultry, pork, and roasted coffee all fell by 2.5 percent or more. Yet many analysts, including government officials, expect food prices to climb by as much as 15 percent at the consumer level for the year as a whole.

Capital equipment prices rose 1 percent in January, about the same as in December. Prices for durable goods were unchanged for the second month in a row, but prices for nondurables jumped 1.7 percent after rising eight-tenths of 1 percent in December.

Prices for intermediate goods—items such as flour and fabric which require further processing—were up 1.2 percent, matching December's rise. Prices of crude goods fell 1 percent due mainly to declines for foodstuffs and nonfood materials other than energy.

Task Force to Study Airline Crew Issue

The Air Line Pilots air safety public information campaign has spurred the Reagan Administration to appoint a task force to investigate the controversial issue of cockpit crew complement in new jet aircraft. In response, the union has called off a nationwide "suspension of service" it had scheduled for Mar. 2 to dramatize the safety issue.

Plans to appoint the Presidential task force were announced by Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis following a meeting with ALPA President John J. O'Donnell and the union's executive board. Getting a task force formed to study the crew complement issue was a major objective of ALPA's Operation USA (Unity for Safe Airtravel) publicity effort launched in January.

MEMBERS OF the panel will be independent experts who will determine whether or not newly designed high technology jet aircraft should be flown by two or three crew members for maximum safety. Appointments to the three-member task force will be made in two weeks, and a report will be issued in 120 days, Lewis said.

The ALPA has challenged manufacturers' claims that the new aircraft, such as the recently certified McDonnell Douglas Super 80, are so advanced that they can be flown by a crew of two rather than three as is now standard practice in the industry. The new technology will actually increase the pilots' workload, the ALPA contends, and a third crew member is needed for a full margin of safety.

Lewis also assured the union's board that other safety and regulatory questions raised by the Operation USA campaign will be handled by the incoming administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration who will be instructed to "pay particular attention" to such issues as improvements in air traffic control systems and airport safety facilities.

The ALPA board praised this "responsiveness" to the concerns of airline pilots and said the government's actions would make a strike "unnecessary at this time."

The union, which represents 33,000 pilots, has been critical of the FAA's handling of the aircraft certification process of new model jets, charging that it has been a closed procedure between the agency and the aircraft manufacturers. The agency has been swayed by company pressure to accept certain relaxed safety standards, such as cockpits designed for only two crew members, without adequate testing, the union contends.

THE PILOTS also are concerned that proposed rule changes sought by the FAA could create hazards by increasing the number of hours a pilot can be required to fly without rest. In addition, the union opposes FAA proposals to increase fines or possible prison terms for violation of aviation regulations, and the pilots object to an agency proposal to have access to cockpit voice recordings of all flights.

Polish Labor Cited For 1st Meany Award

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Solidarity, the free trade union federation of Poland, has been selected as the first recipient of the AFL-CIO's George Meany International Human Rights Award, which the Executive Council established last year.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the award to Solidarity was recommended by the council's international affairs committee and will be presented during this centennial year of the American labor movement "at an appropriate time and manner to be worked out later."

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, February 28, 1981 No. 9

FORMER HOSTAGE Kathryn L. Koob came to the AFL-CIO Executive Council to thank the labor movement for its support of No Greater Love, an organization that assisted the families of the hostages during the 444 days of captivity as it has helped veterans and their families over the years. The yellow tablecloth she presented to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland was signed by all 52 former hostages. Koob, who was an International Communication Agency employee in Tehran, is a former member of the American Federation of Teachers and AFT President Albert Shanker, right, joins in welcoming her.

Approach to Reagan Will Focus on Issues

By David L. Perlman

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO considers a strong government role essential to get the nation back on the road to full employment, and labor isn't prepared to leave worker health, safety and wage protections to the vagaries of the marketplace.

Key resolutions adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council during six days of meetings reflected those basic principles—and the issue-oriented approach that the AFL-CIO is bringing into the Reagan years.

Conflict with the new Administration won't be sought out. Nor will it be avoided when principle is at stake, the council made clear.

Thus, the council protested the social security cutbacks proposed by the President as "a breach of faith" with America's workers and pledged that the AFL-CIO will "vigorously oppose" their adoption.

EARLIER, THE Executive Council had sharply questioned President Reagan's economic package, contending that it demands heavy sacrifices from those with the least and rewards the wealthy.

But other important policy statements covered areas that are not necessarily sources of conflict, including foreign policy positions and domestic issues on which Administration policy is still being formulated.

In the sensitive area of immigration policy and the problem of illegal aliens, the council urged a crackdown on employers who hire and exploit illegal aliens as the first step in stemming a flood that is depressing wages and job opportunities for those at the bottom rung of the job ladder. The Reagan Administration has not yet taken a position in this area.

TWO CABINET members and the Senate majority leader brought assurances to the Executive Council that labor's voice will be listened to and its views taken into consideration.

But AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland made clear at a news conference that he did not agree with the assessment of labor Sec. Ray Donovan that labor leaders recognize that the President has an election mandate to put his economic program into effect.

"Do you agree with that?" Kirkland was asked.

"No, I don't," he replied. "I doubt very much whether the working people of the state of Michigan thought they were voting for severe cutbacks in unemployment compensation or severe cutbacks in trade adjustment assistance. I doubt very much if people with children in the public schools thought they were voting for cutbacks in federal aid to education."

Kirkland said council members found

Oil Industry's Profits Register 30% Gain in 1980

The major American oil firms boosted their profits 30 percent in 1980—a year of recession for other industries—after racking up record profit gains in 1979.

This was done despite the windfall profits tax, which was in effect for almost all of 1980, and in the face of reduced heating oil and gasoline consumption.

THE FINDINGS are from a special Democratic Study Group report on oil company profits. The income information was gathered by the Congressional Research Service from data supplied by the oil companies themselves. CRS is the research arm of the Library of Congress. Other highlights of the report:

- Oil company profits accounted for 40 percent of all profits earned by U.S. industrial firms in 1980, up from their 18 percent share just two years earlier.
- Profits of the nation's 20 largest oil companies have risen 404 percent since 1972, or 188 percent when adjusted for inflation.
- Oil companies have considerably more money available for their use than profit figures indicate. In most years, the actual cash available was twice as much as net profits.

The study reports that profits of the 20 top firms last year were in excess of $29 billion, or $7 billion more than in 1979. The increase is especially impressive in light of the fact that 1979 was itself a spectacularly profitable year for oil companies, and that the crude oil windfall

Employer Role Blamed For Illegal Alien Flood

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The United States should combine a "compassionate" immigration policy with strong measures to stem the flood of illegal immigrants and crack down on employers who profit by exploiting them, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

Millions of illegal aliens constitute a large "sub-class," without rights, prey to unscrupulous employers and subject to the constant fear of discovery," the council noted. "Minorities, women and unemployed workers who are legal aliens or citizens see their own opportunities for a better life threatened by a frightened and docile illegal workforce."

THE COUNCIL statement expressed general agreement with the preliminary recommendations of the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy, which will submit its final report in the near future.

But the AFL-CIO stressed that labor rejects any "inference" that might be drawn from the report "that the primary goal of immigration policy should be fostering economic growth through the use of low-skilled and low-paid immigrants."

It welcomed, however, recommendations for sanctions against employers who regularly harbor illegal aliens and frequently flout wage-hour laws and other worker protections.

THE PROBLEM is serious enough "to warrant development of a more secure identification mechanism to enable employers to readily determine the legal status of job applicants," the AFL-CIO said. But "there must also be stringent, effective enforcement of civil rights laws to protect workers against employer discrimination."

The Executive Council also heard a report on immigration issues and labor's concerns from J. F. Otero, a vice president of

Real Earnings Continue Slump

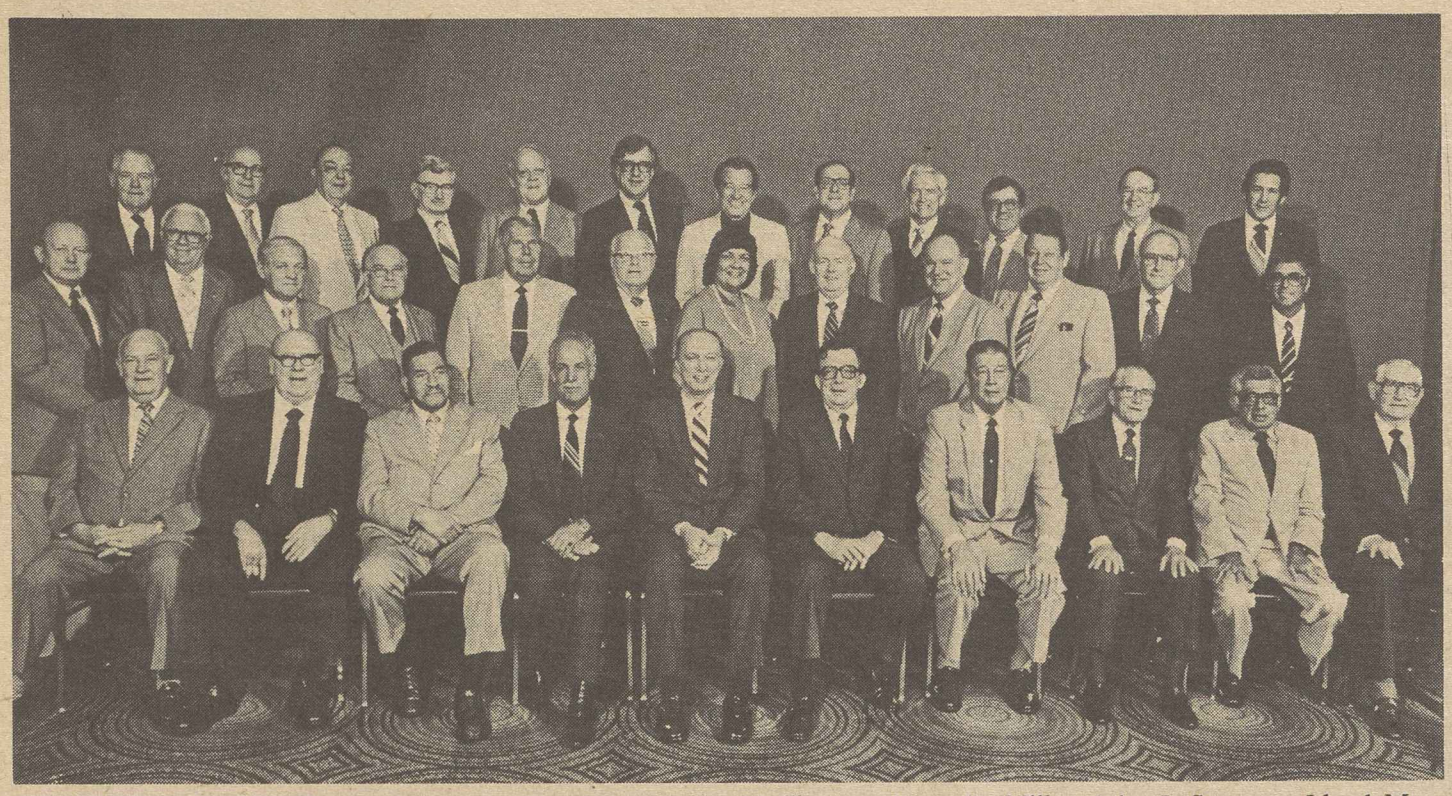
Welcome declines in grocery prices—the first in nearly a year—held down the rise in the nation's inflation rate last month but still kept working Americans from breaking even, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Workers' buying power, expressed as "real spendable earnings," fell one-tenth of 1 percent in January, and was down 4 percent over the year, BLS said. Real spendable earnings are take-home pay adjusted for the impact of inflation since 1967.

LAST MONTH'S drop in purchasing power was due to an eight-tenths of 1 percent increase in consumer prices, a jump that lifted the government's consumer price index 11.7 percent above its year-earlier level. The January rise compared with increases of about 1 percent in each of the preceding four months.

Despite the drop in the inflation rate, Chairman Murray Weidenbaum of the President's Council of Economic Advisers was not optimistic. The five-tenths of 1 percent decline in food and beverage prices was heavily outweighed by a sharp rise in energy costs, leaving the country "still in a double-digit inflationary environment," he said.

The average earnings of all non-supervisory workers in private, non-farm jobs in January were $249.21 a week in current dollars, or $21.01 higher than a year earlier. Adjusted for inflation, and expressed in terms of 1967 dollars, however, the average worker's "real" weekly pay was only $95.19—a decrease of $2.25 from a year earlier.



SLOWING FOOD and housing costs accounted for nearly all of the overall improvement in the January price picture. The drop in grocery-store prices was the first since February 1980. Prices of meats, poultry, fish, eggs, and fresh fruits and vegetables all contributed to the decline.

The sharpest price drops were for cured pork items and eggs. Shank portion hams went down 6.5 cents a pound and grade A eggs were 8.8 cents lower than in December. Bacon was down 6 cents a pound; the price of a pound of ground chuck was down a penny, and porterhouse steak was off 2.8 cents. The largest drop for any item was a 20.1-cent decline in the price of instant coffee. White sugar was down 2.7 cents a pound.

On the other hand, higher prices were posted for cereals and bakery products, and dairy product prices rose substantially. Fresh tomatoes were up 13 cents.

ABOUT 40 PERCENT of the seven-tenths of 1 percent rise in housing costs was due to higher shelter costs. Home financing rose 1.3 percent as an increase

Fight Pledged Against Move To Gut OSHA

Bal Harbour, Fla.—America's workers need the protections of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, and the trade union movement will resist any attempt to weaken the law or its enforcement, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation's Executive Council expressed concern that the Reagan Administration's holdup of job safety and health regulations will be interpreted by foes of OSHA as "a green light to launch renewed legislative attacks on the law."

OSHA HAS proven its effectiveness, the council stressed. In its first 10 years of operation, it reduced serious workplace injuries by 15 percent and cut fatalities 10 percent. Its accomplishments have been especially noteworthy "in the most hazardous industries, where OSHA enforcement activity has been most intensive," the council said.

Right-wing groups that lash out at "big government" have tried to make OSHA a symbol of excessive government regulation, but workers view it as "more than a symbol," the Executive Council noted. It is an essential safeguard.

"This lifeline must not be cut by administrative or legislative pruning shears, nor evaluated solely by dollars and cents calculations that inadequately measure the value of life and health," the council insisted.

IT REITERATED labor's opposition to exclusion of small enterprises from OSHA enforcement.

"All workers need the protection of OSHA," the council said. "Injury and illness do not respect smaller employers any more than larger ones."

The labor movement is concerned about both safety and health on the job, the council said. Labor's goal, it stressed, is the same as that which is written into the law, "a safe and healthful workplace for every American worker."

Danny Thomas Picked For Top Labor Award

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Danny Thomas, the entertainer who has almost single-handedly raised funds to establish and maintain St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital in Memphis, Tenn., has been chosen to receive the 1981 Murray-Green-Meany Award, the AFL-CIO's highest honor.

The selection of Thomas was recommended by the Community Services Committee and unanimously approved by the AFL-CIO Council.

United Way Local Chapters Urged to Uphold Union Rights

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council praised the leadership of the United Way of America for its continuing policy of respecting the right of its employees to join unions. The council called on the United Way to have its affiliates and voluntary agencies that receive United Way funding adopt similar formal understandings on the rights of their workers.

THE UNITED WAY policy was formalized in 1979 in a memorandum of understanding with the AFL-CIO which, in part, spelled out the agency's support of the rights of its workers to organize and bargain and urged the use of union products and union labor in its activities.

While this policy has been "faithfully adhered to" by the United Way's national and regional staff, the council expressed concern that the principles "have not always been honored at the local levels."

Union-busting law firms have been hired by some local United Way agencies to keep unions out, the council said, and workers in those agencies have encountered "stiff resistance" to their attempts to organize.

The Executive Council praised the efforts of the federation's Dept. of Community Services as well as local AFL-CIO councils in resolving these disputes.

The most troublesome area has been in local agencies funded by local United Way organizations, the council emphasized. It recommended that the 1979 understanding "be applied to all agency applications for United Way funding" as a condition for receiving funds.

About 50 percent of United Way's annual budget of $1.6 billion comes from American workers. In addition to substantial contributions, American workers "have proven a commitment" to community service by volunteering time and effort to agencies that offer needed health, welfare and recreation services, the council noted.

Stressing the AFL-CIO's "deep commitment to extending a helping hand to all citizens in need," the council said that "labor support for the mission of the United Way and its affiliates carries with it a concern that actions not be taken by the United Way or its affiliates contrary to the well-being of organized labor."

the Railway & Airline Clerks and a public member of the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy. Otero is also the author of a major article in the February issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist, entitled "Immigration Policy: Drifting Toward Disaster."

THE COUNCIL urged additional funding and upgrading of the Immigration & Naturalization Service and cautioned against making INS employees as a group scapegoats for management failures in the agency.

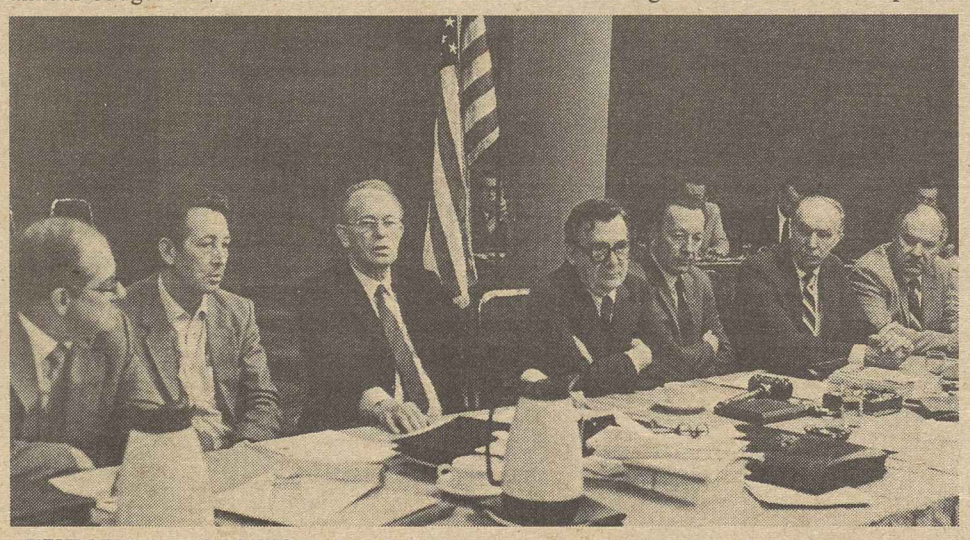
It welcomed the select commission's rejection of proposals for a large-scale bracero or guest-worker program. And the council agreed with the concept of cooperation by government, employers and unions to end the dependence of any industry on an annual influx of temporary workers from other countries.

"Any new immigration policy should foster reunification of families and offer haven for refugees from persecution, while adhering to the principle of concern for the welfare of American workers," the council said. "The United States is, and must remain, a pluralistic society."

THE STATEMENT stressed that the AFL-CIO also shares the select commission's view that the United States "cannot and should not be expected to accommodate the more than 15 million refugees now scattered throughout the world. An international problem demands international responsibility," and the United States should join with other nations in seeking solutions, the Executive Council said.

In Congress, the AFL-CIO will participate in the effort "to shape a new immigration policy that is compassionate and fair," the statement said.

Labor Renews Commitment To Equal Job Opportunity



Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO renewed its commitment to wiping out discrimination in the workplace and pledged an intensified effort to achieve equal employment opportunity in all sectors of the economy.

Labor will work both for enforcement of the equal employment rights guaranteed by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and for development and voluntary affirmative action programs, the Executive Council said.

THE FEDERATION said it will:

- Oppose efforts to weaken the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.
- Expand the compilation and dissemination through the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights of information about programs by affiliates to expand equal job opportunities, affirmative action and "participation of minorities and women in their unions and their communities."
- Continue to support apprenticeship outreach programs.
- Work for continued funding under Title III of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act to continue national union and community-based job programs such as those conducted by a number of affiliates and by the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, the National Urban League's Labor Education Advancement Program, the Recruitment & Training Program and the Opportunities Industrialization Centers.
- Continue labor's close alliance with the civil rights movement, through the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, on legislative measures to insure equal opportunity.
- Maintain AFL-CIO support for activities of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement and the Coalition of Labor Union Women in order "to encourage greater participation by women and minorities in the labor movement and in the community."
- Strengthen coalitions with such groups as the NAACP, the National Urban League and the Southern Regional Council "in progressive programs to eliminate segregation in education, housing, jobs and voting."

The council urged affiliates to work with the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee "in carrying out an aggressive program to eliminate discrimination in the workplace and to enhance the civil rights of all Americans."

Issue-Oriented Approach Adopted for Reagan Years

Donovan's assertion at a new conference that many of them had spoken up for the President's program "rather puzzling" since nothing of the sort happened. "Not while I was there, and I didn't leave the room," Kirkland assured reporters.

The council statements also covered a broad array of foreign policy issues.

In one, the AFL-CIO urged that the United States withdraw from UNESCO if that UN body should give its support to a doctrine that would limit freedom of the press by imposing standards of government-determined "responsibility" for journalists who would be allowed to report news from developing nations.

EARLIER THE council had urged that extension of American credits to Poland be conditioned on continued survival of that country's free trade union movement.

In El Salvador, the council said, U.S. assistance should require in return effective action to bring domestic violence under control and institute democratic reforms.

The council voted financial and technical assistance to help black workers in South Africa organize functioning trade unions. It asked emergency relief for refugees from war and drought in Somalia, and it endorsed the goals of a Cuban freedom group headed by Huber Matos.

On trade issues, the Executive Council stressed the need to maintain the U.S. industrial base against rising imports.

IT REITERATED, strongly, the AFL-CIO's conviction that the government has an obligation to provide both for the nation's defense and the general welfare, as the Constitution mandates, not one or the other.

One day of the council meeting was set aside for a session of the COPE Administrative Committee, which includes all council members as well as COPE groups.

In addition to an election analysis by COPE Director Al Barkan, the group also heard a report on checkoff procedures for voluntary contributions to COPE from a council subcommittee headed by Vice President J. C. Turner, and an evaluation of reapportionment and congressional redistricting issues from David Wells, an authority in the area who was "loaned" to COPE by the Ladies' Garment Workers.

KIRKLAND TOLD a news conference that the council is exploring means of increasing union influence in the selection of candidates in both political parties and the possibility of pre-convention consensus among unions on support of a candidate.

The council unanimously agreed to set up a committee to make recommendations on these issues. Kirkland will serve as chairman and the members are Vice Presidents John H. Lyons, Jerry Wurf, S. Frank Raftery, Murray H. Finley, Albert Shanker, Glenn E. Watts, Sol C. Chaikin, J. C. Turner, Lloyd McBride, William W. Winpisinger, William H. Wynn, Fred J. Kroll and John J. Sweeney.

THE COUNCIL placed New York Air, the cut-rate Washington-New York-Boston air service that the Pilots branded a "runaway shop," on the AFL-CIO's "unfair list." It also voted formal endorsement of the boycott of Perdue poultry products by the Food & Commercial Workers.

Entertainer Danny Thomas, the moving spirit behind St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital, was chosen to receive this year's Murray-Green-Meany Award. The United Way of America was praised for its own policy upholding the right of its employees to join unions, but the council expressed concern that these principles "have not always been honored at the local levels."

The council also set up a committee to develop procedures to encourage voluntary union mergers.

VICE PRESIDENT Lloyd McBride presented a committee report on cooperative organizing activities under way and being planned. The George Meany Memorial Committee reported on previously announced plans for establishing an archives at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue formally announced the dissolution of the federation's Railway Employes' Dept.

The council sent back to an impartial umpire a dispute over representation rights for a group of state employees whose previously unaffiliated association had acted to join one of three AFL-CIO unions that were parties to the case. The umpire had declined to rule on the legitimacy of the affiliation because it is before the courts.

Such an approach, the Executive Council held, "encourages litigation over bargaining rights" and thus is contrary to the intent of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution that disputes be resolved through internal processes. The umpire was asked to determine the affiliation issue in accord with previous Executive Council policy and to decide other issues "to the extent necessary."

THE EXECUTIVE Council approved contributions to the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, National Council of Senior Citizens, Coalition of Labor Union Women, Committee for National Health Insurance, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, National Urban League LEAP program, National Urban Coalition, National Council of Negro Women, Southern Regional Council, Coalition to Protect Social Security, National Assembly of Voluntary Health & Social Welfare Organizations, and the Consumer Federation of America.

The council will hold its next meeting in Baltimore on May 7 and 8, in conjunction with the Union-Industries Show which will be held there.

AT NEWS CONFERENCE following an Executive Council session, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland answers questions on actions the council took covering economic issues, foreign affairs and labor's political role.

Economic Woes Compounded By Jobless Benefit Cutbacks

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The nation's recession-battered economy could be in critical trouble if Congress continues to weaken the unemployment insurance program, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

With joblessness at near-record levels, the cushion of unemployment compensation is as necessary to the economy as to the families of millions of unemployed workers, the council stressed.

ITS STATEMENT contrasted the recommendations for federal minimum standards of benefits that were made last year by the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation with the regressive legislation that Congress ended up adopting.

The last Congress weakened "suitability" of work standards and said the long-term unemployed must be willing to take almost any type of work paying the minimum wage. It imposed a mandatory waiting period for benefits, barred extended benefits to a worker who "voluntarily" leaves a job or is fired for "misconduct," and cut jobless benefits by 50 percent of any pension or social security benefit.

A host of other cutback measures are likely to be considered in this Congress, the council noted, including elimination of the national "trigger" that puts the extended benefits program into effect in every state when the insured unemployment rate is high.

ALSO, the council said, one "budget-balancing" proposal would "juggle unemployment figures by treating the long-term unemployed as if they didn't exist." The effect would be to end the extended benefit program in 18 of the 26 states where it now exists.

The council also protested an Administration proposal that it said would compel jobless workers, "regardless of their skills or experience," to take minimum wage jobs after three months or lose their unemployment insurance.

Congress should reject any further cutbacks in unemployment insurance, the AFL-CIO urged. "Instead of cutting down on the program, both its financing and its basic protection should be strengthened."

LABOR SEC. Raymond Donovan expanded on the Administration proposal in testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee. He argued that unemployment benefits to workers should be cut off if they refuse to accept job offers in a different occupation at or above minimum wage after 13 weeks of joblessness.

Donovan noted that the current system commonly allows workers to receive benefits for up to six months if they cannot find a job in their old occupation.

This "does not make sense," he contended. He said "workers must be challenged to adjust their lives and their careers to meet changing conditions."

Donovan said that the Administration was proposing that, beginning in October 1982, workers be allowed to draw their first 13 weeks of unemployment compensation while searching for a job in their customary occupation at prevailing rates.

"AFTER THIS initial period, workers whose prospects of returning to their old line of work are not good would be denied benefits if they refused written offers of work which would pay wages at least as high as the minimum wage or their current UI (unemployment insurance) benefits, whichever is higher," he said.

Donovan estimated that the annual savings to the government would be $285 million if the Administration's proposal were adopted.

Mediation Role Vital in Settling Internal Disputes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Most disputes between AFL-CIO affiliates continue to be resolved through mediation—the first step in the federation's Internal Disputes Plan.

A report to the AFL-CIO Executive Council noted that 56.7 percent of the 2,091 cases dealt with since the plan was initiated in 1962 were settled with the assistance of a mediator drawn from a panel of union officials.

Cases not resolved at that level are assigned to one of the federation's three impartial umpires, with a further appeal to the Executive Council allowed only on the recommendation of a council subcommittee.

DURING 1980, 50 cases were settled in mediation with 25 pending at the end of the report period. Umpires issued rulings in 46 cases, with eight pending. Executive Council subcommittees sustained 14 determinations that were appealed, referred four to the Executive Council, and four others were withdrawn. Twelve appeals were pending. The council set aside or modified four determinations by umpires.

In the 18 years of the program, 15 affiliates have been found to have failed to comply with final decisions, but in 13 cases compliance was later achieved and the affiliates' rights under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution were restored.

Two organizations are now under sanctions — the International Typographical Union and the Graphic Arts International Union.

UNESCO's Threat to Press Prompts Call for U.S. Pullout

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The United States should withdraw from UNESCO if that international body endorses restrictions on freedom of the press, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

UNESCO, the initials of the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization, has been flirting with approval of governmental control of access to news and the dissemination of news under the guise of enhancing coverage of the developing nations of the Third World and "protecting" journalists.

The council noted that last October a UNESCO conference barely stopped short of supporting "licensing" of journalists whose coverage of news meets a government test of "responsibility."

The most recent attempt to promote the authoritarian "responsibility" doctrine was thwarted while the council was in session, when Western protests forced the expansion of a UNESCO conference of non-governmental journalist groups to include organizations opposed to press restrictions.

THE ORIGINAL invitation list by the UNESCO secretariat was limited to supporters of the responsibility doctrine.

"The United States must not be a party to any international support of policies that flout our own constitutional liberties," the Executive Council insisted. "Our government should serve firm notice that the United States will withdraw from UNESCO if that body endorses restrictions on press freedom."

The Jobless Aid Cushion

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE is essential to the millions of American workers and their families who are out of work. With the persistence of the second highest unemployment levels since the Depression, an effective and sound unemployment insurance system is critical to the economy.

But efforts are continuing to deny benefits to large numbers of workers and to reduce the duration of payments for many others. The only result can be added pressure on welfare programs and a serious deterioration in the skills of workers by forcing them to accept inappropriate, unskilled jobs.

The AFL-CIO has long advocated establishment of federal minimum benefit standards that would assure all workers an adequate replacement of their lost wages if they are out of work and seeking suitable work commensurate with their experience and skills.

THE NATIONAL COMMISSION on Unemployment Compensation, composed of labor, management and public representatives, recommended federal minimum benefit standards last year. Even though the recommendations were not up to the levels advocated by the AFL-CIO, Congress ignored the proposals and instead enacted harsh provisions that virtually force states to slash existing unemployment insurance protections.

Still other backward steps are being advocated by the Administration and Sen. David Boren (D-Okla.) and others, including sharp curtailment of the benefits paid to those workers unemployed the longest during periods of severe economic recession. By eliminating the national "trigger," under which up to 13 additional weeks of benefits are paid to long-term jobless workers who exhaust their benefits when insured unemployment reaches 4.5 percent, long-term jobless workers and their families would be denied benefits unless their state was suffering calamitous unemployment.

So-called budget-balancing proposals are being advanced to juggle unemployment figures by treating the long-term unemployed as if they didn't exist. It is ludicrous to suggest that the severe problems faced by those who have been without work for months can be solved by pretending they aren't there. Under these proposals, extended benefits now actually paid in 26 states would be withdrawn in all but eight states.

IN ADDITION, the Administration has proposed that all jobless workers, regardless of their skills or experience, be forced to take minimum wage jobs after three months or lose their unemployment insurance.

Unemployment insurance cushions jobless workers and their families suffering a severe reduction in living standards and helps preserve the skilled workforce needed when economic conditions improve. Instead of cutting down on the program, both its financing and its basic protection should be strengthened, including federal minimum benefit standards.

We urge the Congress to reject further cutbacks in unemployment insurance and to restore those protections which have been an important part of this program.

Opening Wedge

Subminimum Pay for Youth Would Undermine All Wages

By Gus Tyler

THE PROPOSAL to reduce the minimum wage of youth is the thin edge of a wedge that will ultimately cut the wages of women, minorities, and especially young blacks. Whatever arguments are presently being put forward to set a subminimum wage for young people apply with equal vigor to females, blacks, Hispanics and double for minority youngsters.

The faddish argument for enacting a youth subminimum runs this way: teenage unemployment is high because employers do not think that youngsters deserve the going minimum; but, if the floor were lowered for youth, more of them would be hired.

NOW LET'S SEE how this argument applies to others:

Many employers will not hire women because, says management, they are less dependable and experienced than men. Their work life is interrupted by childbearing and rearing. They are often unable to report to work because of illness at home among other members of the family. In short, the woman's nurturing role in the house disrupts her worklife.

But, continue such employers, if the minimum were lowered for women, management would hire more females.

The same argument is used about blacks and Hispanics. Because many of them have grown up in disadvantaged environments, it is pointed out, they bring less education and other work skills or habits to their job. Hence, employers are reluctant to hire these minorities if they can get others from a more advantaged background.

BUT, AGAIN, if employers could hire minorities for less (a lower minimum) the management would employ more blacks and Hispanics.

The same argument applies with double force to black youth whose jobless rate is at least double that of white youth. Lowering the minimum for all youngsters would not solve the black problem. Black youth would still suffer a higher jobless rate because of their skin color. So, to enable them to compete with white youth, there would have to be a sub-subminimum wage for black youth.

By this logic, a clear majority of the present labor force would be exempt from the standard minimum wage and dumped into some category of subminimum. Women make up about 40 percent of the labor force; when youth and minorities are added, the total is well over 50 percent.

Will such a system of lowered wages provide jobs for more women, youth, and minorities? The answer is, yes—for a while. Lower-paid minorities will displace higher-paid whites; lower-paid women will displace higher-paid men; sons and daughters will displace fathers and mothers.

THE NUMBER OF jobless in the country will not be reduced. Higher-paid workers will be out of jobs that will be filled by lower-paid workers.

But it won't stop there. Shortly, overall unemployment will increase. As the total wage drops, total buying power will fall—weakening the market for goods and services and workers.

In the long run, the drop in the demand for all labor will hit everyone, regardless of race, age, or sex.

Austerity Must Be Applied with Equity

When we entered into a National Accord with the Carter Administration, we said we were prepared to accept a period of austerity so long as austerity was equitably distributed, and so long as no one would be exempted except those at the bottom of the ladder who had no more notches in their belt, who never knew anything in their lives but austerity.

I still believe those are sound principles.

There is a difference between ratcheting everything down a bit, on an equitable basis, and abolishing or crippling vital programs. That is a far different approach than to treat everybody alike.

If anybody is going to get an extra dose of austerity, it should be the ones that have the most fat on their bones and the most unused notches on their belts.

'High-Risk Gamble'

Reagan's Economic Program Fails Test of Fairness, Equity

The following statement on the President's economic proposals was adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council Feb. 19, 1981, Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE AFL-CIO AGREES with the proposition that inflation must be reduced; the number of jobs increased and the unemployed put back to work; productivity improved; industrial strength restored, and federal programs made more effective and efficient.

But we cannot agree that the measures the President outlined will achieve those goals or that they meet the essential tests of fairness and equity.

His proposals require more sacrifice from those who have little, to give more to those who already have much. They substitute unrestrained market power for social responsibility and human concerns. They shortchange sound economic growth by cutting back programs to achieve energy independence, rebuild the nation's transportation system, revitalize urban areas and safeguard the environment.

The President placed on us and others who cannot agree with him the responsibility of offering an alternative. The AFL-CIO has spelled out such a program that meets the nation's economic needs with fairness and equity.

Tax Policy

AMERICANS NEED a change in the tax laws to alleviate the effects of inflation. At the same time, targeted business tax cuts are needed to revive the industrial base of the economy.

The President proposes to give 60 percent of his individual tax cut to the top 20 percent of the taxpayers, and over 11 percent to one percent of the taxpayers. The family earning $10,000 a year would get a $52 tax break in the first year. The family earning $30,000 would get a $382 tax reduction. But the family earning $100,000 would get a minimum of $1,840.

By contrast, the AFL-CIO has proposed a refundable individual tax cut of 20 percent of social security taxes. The family with a $10,000 income would receive a tax benefit of $134. The family earning $30,000 would get $395. At $100,000, the tax cut is an identical $395. Under our proposal, 60 percent of the individual tax cut would go to 80 percent of the taxpayers.

Highly profitable businesses would benefit the most under the President's depreciation tax proposals. Struggling companies and newly developing industries would benefit little, if at all. The President's unrestricted depreciation proposal could encourage industrial migration from areas of already high unemployment.

By contrast, the AFL-CIO has proposed a business tax cut designed to stimulate investment where it is needed the most. In addition, we have proposed a tax cut of 5 percent of social security taxes to directly reduce every covered employer's payroll costs.

Monetary Policy

THE "ABSURD" interest rates of 20 percent, mentioned by the President, are largely a result of the same tight-money policy he said he supports. Use of that policy to combat inflation has repeatedly led to economic downturns, not the prosperity promised by the President. Another byproduct of high interest rates has been large increases in annual interest payments on the federal debt, expected to grow by more than $15 billion in the current year.

By contrast, the AFL-CIO recommends that selective credit regulations be reimposed. They would direct capital to productive investments while curbing speculation. Other advanced Western industrial countries have used selective credit regulation effectively. The brief U.S. experience with limited credit controls in the spring of 1980 helped bring the prime rate down from 20 to 11 percent in four months, while mortgage interest rates came down from 16 to 11 percent.

Budgetary Policy

THE PRESIDENT'S proposed budget cuts, the centerpiece of his program, are both inequitable and short-sighted. He pledged to "fulfill the obligations that spring from our national conscience," but, in fact, his call for $17.5 billion in budget reductions in social programs would cut the meager incomes of the jobless and the poor.

For nearly 50 years, this country has built a network of social programs to improve the lot of the disadvantaged, provide support in times of adversity and strengthen the American economy. To destroy or weaken these programs is to weaken Amercia.

The President, in seeking additional budget cuts, would slash an additional $24 billion by reducing social investments necessary to expand the economy. Not only would those cuts have an immediate cost of more than 1 million jobs, but they endanger the nation's long-range needs for energy security, transportation improvements, environmental safeguards and urban development.

The President relies entirely on the theory that the tax cuts he proposes will result in private financing for these necessary investments. There is little basis for this hope. Public employees will bear an additional unfair burden.

By contrast, the AFL-CIO would attack the budget deficit by reducing unemployment and cutting interest rates. A reduction in unemployment of 1 percent would cut $30 billion from that deficit.

Regulatory Policy

THE PRESIDENT contends that the laws protecting health, safety, and the environment and consumers passed in the last decade have caused "higher prices, higher unemployment and lower productivity growth." He ignores the contributions these laws have made to a higher quality of life.

In the name of business efficiency, he would let the marketplace determine if, when and how workers, buyers and natural resources are to be protected. Past experience demonstrates that the market undervalues the need for these protections.

In addition, the regulatory analyses the President initiated will increase red tape by making legal proceedings longer, more complicated and more expensive. While he calls for assessing costs and benefits, he provides no method for valuing health and safety or accurately projecting costs. Finally, by increasing the powers of the Office of Management & Budget, the government's ability to enforce protective laws as Congress intended is undermined.

* * * * *

THE PRESIDENT'S program is a high-risk gamble with the future of America. Workers and the poor take the lion's share of the risk. The only sure winners are the wealthy, whether they are individuals or corporations.

It is a gamble that has not paid off in the past and one the nation cannot afford to take. We will, therefore, join with other concerned citizens to advance an economic program that will meet the nation's needs fairly and equitably and with true equality of sacrifice.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE OLD PATTERNS of segregated roles for men and women in work and family life have changed dramatically over the past two decades as women, especially married mothers, have entered the labor force in huge numbers.

More than half the children in the United States under 18 years of age have mothers who are working or seeking work. The nation's most prevalent family type is now the two-parent, two-wage-earner family. Add the many single-parent families in which the sole parent—usually a woman—works and the "typical" American family in the 1980s is one with working parents.

While a relatively new phenomenon in the United States, "working families" long have been the norm in many European nations, according to Sheila Kamerman, associate professor at Columbia University's School of Social Work.

KAMERMAN'S STUDY comparing the "working family" in the United States and five European nations was recently published in the Labor Dept.'s Monthly Labor Review.

She chose five nations with similar levels of industrialization and certain characteristics: half the adult women or more are in the labor force; women with school-age children are expected to work, and a similar pattern is emerging for those with pre-school children; and the government has focused attention on working parents with children under age three, when the tension between work and family life is most severe. The nations studied were Hungary, West Germany, East Germany, France and Sweden.

The author found that in the United States, 56 percent of working mothers have school-age children, 48 percent have children aged three to six years and 35 percent have children under age three. Comparable statistics for France are 48 percent, 44 percent and 43 percent. In West Germany, the figures are 41 percent, 34 percent and 32 percent, and in Sweden, 78 percent, 64 percent and 58 percent.

EUROPEAN NATIONS tend to approach the concerns of working parents through what is increasingly being referred to as a "family benefit system," Kamerman wrote. She stressed that the Europeans have a long history of acknowledging that children are a major resource and that the entire society should share in the costs of rearing them.

Cash benefits are provided to families with children as part of a country's social security system, but in a way distinguishable from traditional social insurance and assistance, she noted.

Family allowances began first in France in the 1930s; in Sweden and several other countries in the 1940s. A total of 67 countries, including all the developed countries except the United States, provide such a supplement to adults who are rearing children.

In most European nations, maternity benefits feature a guarantee of a right to leave work with the assurance of full job protection, seniority and pension entitlement. Paid leaves following childbirth range from three months to three years. In most countries, six months leave is typical.

FURTHER, all European countries permit additional unpaid but job-protected leaves of somewhere between six months and two years. No such guarantee of job protection or paid or unpaid leave is assured through government policy in the United States.

Kamerman called employment and labor market policies "a cornerstone of social policy" in industrialized countries. "Work remains the primary role for all adults and a central ethic" in European countries and in the United States, she noted.

Kamerman's analysis revealed that in many respects the governments of European nations show a greater appreciation of this fact. She also cited a tendency to develop family or child care "packages" that go far beyond any single policy strategy.

LABOR'S POLITICAL program was assessed at this meeting of the COPE Administrative Committee, which includes Executive Council members and various COPE groups. It heard a report on reapportionment and redistricting decisions state legislatures will be making this year and a discussion of means of achieving consensus and strengthening labor's influence in the selection of presidential candidates.

Oil Industry Profits Jump 30% for 1980

profits tax was in effect for the 10 months of 1980, the DSG said.

"Over half of the top 20 oil companies reported net profits of more than $1 billion in 1980," the DSG said. "Oil profits have risen so high that oil companies are on the verge of overwhelming the American industrial economy."

MOBIL SCORED the highest percentage increase in profits last year, a gain of 63 percent on earnings of $3.2 billion. Standard of Ohio registered a 53 percent rise on profits of $1.8 billion. Exxon, the world's largest firm, amassed $5.6 billion in profits, a 32-percent increase from 1979.

Other big winners and their profits rise over 1979 were Texaco, up 27 percent; Standard of California, up 35 percent; Standard of Indiana, up 27 percent; Shell, up 36 percent, and Phillips, up 20 percent.

The 30-percent increase in the profits of these top 20 firms compared with a 70 percent increase in 1979 over 1978. Last year's lesser rate of increase was due to a slower rate of world oil price rises, an increase in worldwide oil stocks compared to 1979's low levels, and lower consumption.

NEVERTHELESS, the DSG pointed out, the 1979-80 profits growth was surpassed only by the dramatic gains in 1979 and during the 1973 Arab oil embargo.

The windfall profits tax was enacted by Congress specifically to recapture some of the profits oil companies could expect after former President Carter ordered decontrol to begin in June 1979.

President Reagan's Jan. 28 order to remove all remaining price controls from domestic oil will add still more billions to oil profits during 1981, the DSG observed. It predicted that gross revenues of the top 20 firms will increase $12 billion.

Committee Established To Encourage Mergers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council voted to establish a special committee to develop procedures and mechanisms to encourage voluntary consolidation and mergers of affiliated unions.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland appointed Vice President Murray H. Finley as chairman. The other members are Vice Presidents Jerry Wurf, Kenneth T. Blaylock, William H. Wynn, John DeConcini, Fred J. Kroll and Charles H. Pillard.

'Care to Try Our New Line?'

Continued Safeguards Urged In Gene Formation Studies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Guidelines set by the National Institutes of Health for research involving recombinant DNA molecules should remain in effect "until all questions of safety and risk have been answered," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

DNA is the chemical component of genes and has made possible research into the nature of life. Now, the resolution noted, "this research is moving beyond the laboratory and is being actively pursued by industry."

The resolution noted that regulations, besides being mandatory, would have stronger requirements for monitoring and for medical examinations of workers. While "guidelines can be changed easily, regulations could not be weakened until a full public review was undertaken."

THE RESOLUTION, which takes note of both the hopeful developments and uncertain hazards of DNA research, had been introduced at the last AFL-CIO convention and referred to the Executive Council for further study.

A committee set up to consider referred resolutions recommended its adoption, and the Executive Council concurred.

The resolution noted that the National Institutes of Health Guidelines are voluntary, concerned mostly with laboratory practices, and stressed the need for binding regulations to cover production facilities, especially in view of industry attempts to weaken guidelines.

Laboratory guidelines had been originally recommended by the scientific community to lower risks of escape of potentially harmful organisms.

Therefore, the AFL-CIO will both oppose weakening the research guidelines at this time and support efforts by OSHA and other regulatory agencies to establish workplace safeguards.

Another matter referred by the AFL-CIO convention dealt with the "Buy American" policy as applied to mass transit legislation.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL approved the following rewording of the referred paragraph from the mass transit resolution:

"The present 'Buy American' provisions of the Urban Mass Transit Act should be vigorously enforced. Domestic content requirements should be gradually raised to assure a viable domestic industry producing transit buses and rail cars, along with related supplies and equipment. International trade agreements on government procurement specifically exempt the Dept. of Transportation and the states from coverage. The U.S. should support domestic preference for transit equipment."

The council also sent three referred resolutions to its reactivated Committee on Public Relations and one resolution to the Committee on Safety & Occupational Health.

Schedule for March Listed By Labor Studies Center

Institutes on advanced organizing techniques and issues for women workers highlight the March calendar at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. Seven AFL-CIO affiliates will use the Silver Spring, Md., campus for their own training programs during the month as will the American Institute for Free Labor Development. The March schedule:

Advanced Organizing Techniques, Mar. 8-27—A three-week institute on organizing for experienced staff members co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Issues for Women Workers, Mar. 8-13—The center's annual program to provide a thorough understanding of current issues important to women and to help participants increase their skills in union work.

The unions using the campus for their own training programs are the United Transportation Union, Mar. 1-6; Communications Workers, Mar. 1-13; Operating Engineers, Mar. 1-6; Service Employees, Mar. 15-20; State, County & Municipal Employees, Mar. 22-27; Railway & Airline Clerks, Mar. 22-27, and Flight Attendants, Mar. 30 to Apr. 2.

The AIFLD will bring two groups to the campus during the month—25 industrial workers from Bermuda for a bargaining seminar Mar. 8-14 and 40 Spanish-speaking trade unionists from Latin America for six weeks of courses on organizing techniques and trade union leadership, starting Mar. 15.

One off-campus program is scheduled, an institute for Building Trades business agents, Mar. 1-6, at the University of Oregon at Eugene.

Further information on these and other labor studies programs may be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

New York Air Service Lands On Unfair List

Bal Harbour, Fla.—New York Air, the new cut-rate Washington-New York-Boston air service, has been placed on the AFL-CIO Unfair List by the federation's Executive Council. Union members and union pension fund trustees will be alerted to the action, the council declared.

The council acted at the request of the Air Line Pilots who have branded the nonunion airline a "runaway shop," set up by Texas International Airlines as a way of getting out from under its obligations under its union contracts.

NEW YORK AIR, which went into operation in late December, is offering for sale some 1.5 million shares of common stock, the council pointed out. It warned pension fund trustees that the operation fits the definition of a company "inimical to workers' interests" and "unworthy" of union support through pension fund investments.

The Air Line Pilots and its affiliate, the Flight Attendants, have charged that New York Air is "one and the same" with Texas International which transferred millions of dollars of its revenues to a holding company in order to set up New York Air as a separate entity.

IN DECEMBER the airline unions were joined by the Machinists and the unaffiliated Teamsters in informational picketing at Washington's National and New York's LaGuardia airports to protest start-up of the service with non-union crews.

New York Air employs non-union workers at wages and working conditions far below industry standards, the council's statement charged, pointing out that skilled and experienced union employees of Texas International have been laid off while workers with less experience have been taken on at New York Air.

Council Scores Union-Busting Cost 'Pass-On'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Health insurance premiums should be used to finance patient care, not union-busting, the AFL-CIO Executive Council insisted.

The health care industry is passing on the costs of its anti-union activities through higher hospital bills and higher insurance premiums, the council noted. Thus, consumers end up paying for management consultants who specialize in thwarting organizing and collective bargaining in the health care field.

The council noted that the pass-on of such costs is prohibited in federal medical care programs because the expenses of fighting unions are not related to patient care.

"The same standard should also apply to private insurance programs, including Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans as well as private union-negotiated health plans," the council declared.

It urged affiliates "to guard against such misuses of health insurance funds." State and local central bodies were urged "to ask state insurance commissioners to adopt rules similar to the federal standard for private health insurers."

Watts Heads Council's PR Panel

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has reactivated its Standing Committee on Public Relations, and a number of ad hoc committees that have been established in recent years will become its subcommittees.

Its chairman will be Vice President Glenn E. Watts, who is president of the Communications Workers. The ad hoc groups that have been incorporated in the reactivated committee include the Satellite and Cable Television Committee, the Telecommunications Policy Committee and a panel that has been exploring means of improving the public relations aspects of union organizing campaigns.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said at a news conference that he will also ask the new committee to incorporate the media monitoring project initiated by the Machinists.

Executive Council members appointed to the committee are AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Vice Presidents S. Frank Raftery, Albert Shanker, William W. Winpisinger, Frederick O'Neal, Charles H. Pillard, John DeConcini, Lloyd McBride, Jerry Wurf, Sol C. Chaikin, William Konyha, John J. Sweeney, William H. Wynn and J. C. Turner.

Wrong Solution

Social Security Cuts Hit as Breach of Faith

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Cutbacks in social security benefits would break faith with America's workers and are the wrong solution to the system's greatly exaggerated funding problems, the AFL-CIO said.

The Executive Council served notice that labor will "vigorously oppose" benefit slashes called for in President Reagan's budget proposals. Some of the cutbacks were considered and rejected by the previous Congress after a "Save Our Security" coalition launched a campaign against them.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S budget would compel further restrictions on eligibility for disability insurance and world reduce payments to some beneficiaries.

It would eliminate for future retirees the $122-a-month minimum for those who have worked under social security long enough to qualify for benefits. And it would phase out the provision in present law that allows surviving children to draw benefits beyond the age of 18 if they are full-time students under 22 years of age.

"These social security protections are vital to active workers and their families," the council said. "Erosion of them would be most harmful to widows, the disabled, the young and the poor."

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL stressed that the financial problems of the social security system are largely caused by unemployment and inflation. It reiterated the AFL-CIO's position that a degree of general revenue financing should be injected into all social security programs—old age, survivors, disability and hospital insurance—"to provide relief for low and middle-income workers from the scheduled increases in the payroll tax, and to shore up the financing of the system."

While urging across-the-board infusions of government funds into a program now dependent on the payroll tax on workers and their employers, the council said no single component of social security—such as disability insurance or Medicare—should be totally financed from general revenues.

"It is important that social security programs retain the contributory principle that guarantees benefits as an earned right," the council said. "Without contributory features, income and means tests could be imposed that would transform social insurance programs into welfare programs."

COMMENTING on other proposals to reduce social security outlays, the Executive Council said:

- Social security beneficiaries should continue to receive their full cost-of-living increases.
- The eligibility age for social security benefits should not be raised. "Raising the age of eligibility would be tantamount to an across-the-board benefit reduction for millions of workers, particularly those who are forced into early retirement for reasons of poor health or unemployment."
- The formula for determining the benefits workers receive when they retire should not be changed so as to reduce benefit payments.

"WORKERS MUST not be denied the benefits they have worked for and paid for during their working lives," the council stressed. "The government must keep its word," and changing the terms "would constitute a breach of faith that would undermine public confidence in social security."

The council also reiterated the AFL-CIO's opposition to mandatory social security coverage of public employees unless there are specific safeguards dealing with existing public sector retirement programs to assure that workers will not be shortchanged.

Price Rise Slows But Real Wages Continue Slump

of 1.9 percent in mortgage interest rates was partially offset by a decline in house prices. Home rents rose six-tenths of 1 percent, and household maintenance and repair costs fell slightly.

Fuel and utility charges soared 2.1 percent over the month and accounted for about half of the January rise in the CPI's housing component. Fuel oil prices accelerated 7.6 percent, and charges for natural gas and electricity rose 1 percent.

A large part of the January rise in transportation costs was due to a 3.8-percent jump in gasoline prices, BLS said. This was the largest monthly increase in gasoline costs since the very sharp advances recorded in the first quarter of 1980.

USED CAR prices rose 1.2 percent, following substantially larger increases in each of the five preceding months. Airline fares rose again in January to a point nearly one-third above their year-earlier levels.

The cost of medical care was up 1.3 percent as fees by physicians, dentists, and hospitals showed substantial increases. Entertainment charges rose nine-tenths of 1 percent as price increases were recorded for a wide range of goods and services, including newspapers, magazines, pet supplies, and entertainment services.

PRIVATE FUNDING for arts and humanities projects that added thousands of jobs and $700 million to the economy in 1980 will dry up or slow to a trickle if President Reagan's plan to slash federal cultural endowments gets congressional approval, President Theodore Bikel of Actors' Equity said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Ruth Dean of the Washington Star and Michael Posner of Reuters, right.

Budget Slash for Arts Seen Drying Up Private Funds

President Reagan's plan to slash cultural endowments will dry up private sector funding for arts and humanities projects that have matched the federal "seed monies" by ratios as high as four to one, President Theodore Bikel of Actors' Equity warned in a network radio interview.

Bikel stressed that the federal initiative provided by the National Arts & Humanities Act of 1965 stimulated private individuals, foundations and industries to contribute heavily to non-profit orchestras, theaters, dance companies, museums and other cultural activities.

THESE "brought to life" thousands of jobs and added more than $700 million to the national economy last year alone, he noted. Bikel said that while the private contributions are "very, very well-intentioned," they are likely to "slow to a trickle" without the prodding of the federal initiative.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Bikel, who is a member of the National Council on the Arts, said the proposed cultural cutback would be a severe blow to the employment prospects of actors, sculptors, writers, historians and other professionals. He said that without the chance to practice their professions, these people will be forced into the crowded job market where more than 8 million workers are unable to find jobs.

If the cuts urged by the Administration's budget-framers are approved by Congress, the advance of cultural arts in the United States will be "set back a decade or more," he declared.

Bikel also scored the plan to curtail funding for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which is the foundation for the non-commercial radio and television programming that now serves virtually every community. He predicted that the cutback would draw more imported broadcasting products into the United States and cause serious harm to the domestic film and broadcast industries.

3 Women Elected to Board Of Food & Beverage Dept.

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. added three women to a previously all-male executive board, moved to strengthen the department's network of local councils, and authorized an expanded "corporate program" to focus a national spotlight on firms that go in for union-busting.

Enlargement of the 12-member board is a follow-through on a resolution adopted at the last department convention which urged consideration of steps to give greater leadership representation to women, who make up an estimated 40 percent of workers in the food and beverage trades.

ALL OF THE new board members, President Robert F. Harbrant noted, have held increasingly responsible union offices and have been active in Coalition of Labor Union Women and other union and women's groups. The new board members are:

Lenore Miller, secretary-treasurer of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; Rhonda L. Allgaier, who has been organizer, business agent and now secretary-treasurer of a Hotel & Restaurant Employees local in Seattle, Wash., and Rosemary Trump, vice president of the Service Employees and president of a Pittsburgh local.

THE DEPARTMENT'S board approved a program of full-time coordinators for about 10 to 15 of its local and state councils. Their activities would include assistance on boycotts, such as that aimed at Perdue poultry, health and safety programs and strengthening of local councils.

To pinpoint corporate responsibility for union-busting managements, the department named Jeffrey Fiedler, who has been working with the Food & Allied Service Trades Council in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area to direct the program with an expanded staff.

Resolutions adopted by the department included a statement urging adoption of federal safety and health standards for grain elevators and processing facilities, where concentrations of grain dust have caused death-dealing explosions.

NEW STRATEGIES for representing the interests of workers in its field are planned by the executive board of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers, center right, outlines a plan to focus national attention on anti-union firms. Department President Robert F. Harbrant is at right.

Defining the Work Ethic

Gompers, Alger Offered Sharply Different Views

Samuel Gompers, the 19th-Century founder and first president of the American Federation of Labor, was a contemporary of Horatio Alger, the hugely successful dime novelist who spun fanciful rags-to-riches tales about the American dream.

But though the two sprang from a similar matrix, their views on achieving economic independence sharply diverged. And as labor celebrates its centennial—the 1881 founding of the forerunner of the AFL—Stuart B. Kaufman suggests in an American Federationist article that there is much to be learned from how Gompers redefined the "work ethic" in an America of Alger-type dreams and myths.

ALGER GROUND out the same story with little variation more than a hundred times—the poor young man making it by a combination of intelligence, aggressiveness, and inner moral spirit. For his part, Gompers hammered away at the theme that for most workers there was no escape from the working class.

"This was an idea difficult for many craftsmen to accept then, just as it is today for many teachers and other so-called professionals of the white-collar world," observes Kaufman, a University of Maryland history professor, who is also editor of The Samuel Gompers Papers.

"We cannot look to rise into independence individually, Gompers argued; we can only achieve it in the workplace collectively." Kaufman's article in the current issue of the federation's monthly magazine is taken from a paper he delivered recently at an AFL-CIO centennial seminar at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

KAUFMAN NOTES that the American labor movement as we know it today got its start in the midst of a society that was frantically and passionately insisting that there was room at the top for everyone with the gumption, the pluck, to pull themselves up by their own bootstraps. Yet, in the impersonal, commercialized and industrializing economy of that period, self-esteem in the workplace was eluding most workers.

What Gompers did in the face of all this was to embody in a new organization, the AFL, a reformulation of the work ethic and a rededication to it, Kaufman observes.

"WE ARE, he said, permanently members of the working class. We must devise ways to have a say in all decisions affecting our work lives because only then can we workers perform what is needed of us with dignity and self-esteem," Kaufman writes of Gompers's message.

To this end, Gompers joined other skilled workers in organizing the country's labor force into unions aimed at preserving control of Americans' work lives. A study of the CIO in the 1930s shows that much of the motivation to organize and much of the field leadership also came from the craft elite among the mass production workers, Kaufman observes.

"They were the ones most likely to feel they were making a substantial contribution to the production process and to be proportinately more aware that they were powerless individually to maintain a control and discretion over their work lives consistent with dignity and self-esteem."

IN BOTH ALGER and Gompers, the author notes, "we find a reborn faith in the ability of the individual spirit at work to survive and find dignity. Alger reiterated the scenario that was familiar to the 19th-Century American who rose, in his words, "by a series of upward steps, partly due to good fortune, but largely to his own determination to improve, and energy. . . .

"Samuel Gompers gave us a new scenario, a collective one for the people . . . left behind."

Inflation Rate Averages 12.9% In 1980 for Industrial Nations

Paris—Inflation in the free world's industrialized nations surged by an average 12.9 percent last year, and will remain stubbornly high again in 1981, the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (OECD) said here.

"The rise in OECD consumer prices of almost 13 percent in calendar year 1980 was three points higher than in 1979 and only half a point below the record rise experienced in 1974," said the OECD, a 24-nation organization that analyzes economic trends among its members.

A COMPARISON of 1980 inflation figures showed the United States average of 13.5 percent was third highest among the Big Seven countries, after Britain's 18-percent and Italy's 21.2-percent rates. The U.S. rate represents the annual average of the year's 12 monthly increases in the consumer price index, and compares with an annual average rise of 11.5 percent in 1979.

The highest inflation rates recorded among all OECD countries were Turkey, 94.3 percent; Iceland, 57.5 percent; Greece, 24.9 percent, and Ireland, 18.2 percent. West Germany's 5.5 percent was the lowest of any of the 24 countries.

About three-fourths of the 1980 increase in prices was caused by a 26 percent boost in energy prices, the OECD said. Most OECD nations experienced a significant deterioration in price performance last year.

Inflation rates among other Big Seven countries were: Japan, 8 percent compared with 3.6 percent in 1979; West Germany, 5.5 percent compared with 4.1 percent the year before; France, 13.3 percent compared with 10.8 percent, and Canada, 10.1 percent compared with 9.1 percent.

Britain's 18-percent jump in consumer prices compared with 13.4 percent in 1979, and Italy's 21.2 percent compared with 14.8 percent.

Nation's Security Tied To Fleet Upgrading

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A shipbuilding capacity that can meet the nation's needs for an American-flag merchant fleet and naval vessels to maintain the United States as a sea power are "fundamental" to the nation's security, the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. said.

The department's executive board joined with the Maritime Trades Dept. in a series of position papers affirming the importance of sea power and shipbuilding.

Another resolution urged the United States to negotiate bilateral agreements with its trading partners dealing with the transportation of cargo between the two nations.

"The United States is the world's largest trading nation," the resolution noted. "Despite this fact, American-owned ships operating under the American flag carry only a little over 4 percent of the total foreign commerce."

Reagan Appoints Panel to Explore Air Crew Issue

President Reagan has named members of the impartial task force sought by the Air Line Pilots to resolve the issue of the cockpit crew size for new jet passenger aircraft.

The panel will be chaired by former Federal Aviation Administrator John McLucas and will include Fred J. Drinkwater III, a former Marine pilot, and Air Force Lt. Gen. Howard W. Leaf.

The ALPA called off a work stoppage it had planned for Mar. 2 to dramatize the safety issue after a meeting with Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis in which the Administration agreed to the task force.

The panel is scheduled to report in 120 days on whether the new technologically advanced jets can be safely flown by only two crew members as the industry asserts or whether three are needed for maximum safety as the pilots maintain.

ALPA President John J. O'Donnell, in a letter to the Washington Post, stressed that the crew complement issue has never had "a full, fair, unbiased examination by technically qualified persons" to settle the question which the pilots consider a safety issue. The ALPA will abide by the panel's decision, O'Donnell pledged.

LEWIS SAID the panel would determine cockpit crew size for the proposed Boeing 757 and 767 jets and would review the decision last summer by the FAA certifying the McDonnell Douglas Super 80 as safe to be flown with a two-person crew.

Aircraft manufacturers contend that a cockpit crew of two rather than three can save the industry an estimated $1 billion in labor costs. Increased workload in the new jets as well as increasingly crowded air space will tax both pilots and air traffic controllers, the ALPA pointed out.

Council Endorses Perdue Poultry Boycott

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Food & Commercial Workers' boycott of Perdue poultry products was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council with an appeal to union members and their families not to buy Perdue products "until the company ceases its unfair and illegal anti-union behavior."

The boycott was launched last September after Perdue fired 57 union supporters during an attempt by UFCW Local 117 to organize the company's Accomac, Va., processing plant.

THE DISCHARGES led to an unfair labor practice strike now in its seventh month. In January, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland added Perdue to the federation's unfair list at the request of UFCW President William E. Wynn.

In its own endorsement of the boycott, the council scored Perdue for a policy of "ruthless anti-union tactics" which have suppressed "every effort of its 6,000 employees to exercise their rights to union representation."

The council charged Perdue with "a campaign to destroy trade unionism in the American poultry industry." The endorsement pledges the federation's active support of the UFCW's campaign to persuade consumers to shun Perdue products.

AMONG ITS union-busting tacitcs, Perdue has bought several plants where union contracts were in force, closed them for "modernization" and reopened them with non-union workers, the council noted.

In its 1,700-worker Accomac plant alone, the council said, more than 400 workers have been fired for union activity in the last two years.

Among those discharged were union supporters who participated in the September organizing campaign. In the course of the campaign, UFCW supporters agreed to honor a picket line set up by the unaffiliated Teamsters in an attempt to win representation for Perdue drivers. The 57 UFCW supporters were "permanently replaced" by the company in retaliation, the union said. The action forced the UFCW to file unfair labor practice charges and led to the strike and the boycott.

The National Labor Relations Board has issued a complaint based on the charges and will begin hearings in April. In the meantime, the UFCW's pending election, which had been scheduled for Oct. 2, 1980, remains blocked until the charges are resolved.

THE AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. was called on by the council to promote the boycott and alert the labor press. Plans for a national campaign to urge union consumers not to buy Perdue's roasters, broilers, chicken parts and Cornish game hens are being set now, Department Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid said.

Perdue is the third largest processor in the country, McDavid pointed out. He said the company's six plants in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina process some three million chickens a week. Most of the company's $300 million in annual sales is in the Northeast, including the lucrative New England, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, D.C., markets.

McDavid noted that Perdue products have been seen in other markets including those in the Far West, pointing up the need for a wide publicity effort.

Kirkland, Coalition Assail Drastic Slash in Programs

BUDGET COALITION of 157 cooperating organizations is announced by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who is flanked by other members of the coalition steering committee. Its goal is to prevent the destruction of still-needed government programs and to seek a fair distribution of any spending cuts.

Broad Group Challenges Budget Tilt

A national coalition brought together by the AFL-CIO has challenged drastic budget cuts demanded by the Reagan Administration and will mount a coordinated lobbying effort to prevent needed programs from being jettisoned.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, flanked by other members of the Budget Coalition Steering Committee, told a crowded news conference that the 157 cooperating organizations are especially concerned with the lopsided tilt of the budget proposals.

A JOINT STATEMENT by the coalition partners termed it "basically wrong" to end assistance programs for the poor and the near-poor in order to fund tax cuts that will go largely to the top 20 percent income bracket.

"We believe that this nation can find solutions to the problems of high inflation, high interest rates, high energy costs and high unemployment which will not create unfair hardship on any one group of Americans," the coalition said. (Text, Page 4.)

A representative group of Steering Committee members spoke of their special concerns at the news conference, which was held at the AFL-CIO headquarters.

JACOB CLAYMAN, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, said cutbacks in Medicaid, food stamps and housing assistance are falling especially heavily on the elderly.

"Serious cuts in these life-sustaining programs are included in the President's program," Clayman charged. The budget proposal, he said, "falls short of equity and humanity; it bodes ill for America's elderly."

Christine Davis, representing the National Women's Political Caucus, said the budget policy would lock many women into a cycle of poverty, cut federal assistance for child care facilities and force many working mothers to choose between quitting their jobs or leaving children unattended.

Reagan Plan Would Skimp Basic Needs

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pressed the House Budget Committee to base its spending ceilings and revenue goals on the nation's needs, instead of gambling on the Reagan Administration's dubious and untested economic theories.

Repeatedly, in response to questions by right-wing Republicans and conservative Democrats, Kirkland rejected the view that President Reagan is entitled to get his economic program through Congress intact because he won the election.

IT IS IN the nation's interest that these issues be debated, Kirkland insisted. "We need mass transit. We ought to be going all out in search of energy alternatives to liberate us from thralldom to OPEC," Kirkland urged.

"We do not believe that the nation has been too generous in helping the poor, the disadvantaged and the unemployed; we believe the Administration's proposal is too generous in supporting the wealthy and the powerful," he said.

Kirkland urged the committee not to lend itself to the Administration attempt to use budget-setting procedures to shortcut the normal legislative process, where laws are passed or changed only after study and consideration by the committees with jurisdiction over them. The budget proposals, he charged, would use spending ceilings to rewrite laws and abolish programs.

"THE BUDGET CUTS, tax cuts, regulatory cuts and money supply cuts add up to more inflation and unemployment," Kirkland warned. And, he said, they fall short of the government's constitutional mandate to provide both for the common defense and the general welfare. "It is the duty and obligation of Congress to tell these facts to the people," Kirkland stressed.

In response to questions, Kirkland said the AFL-CIO doesn't consider all government programs untouchable. Each program must stand on its own merits, he said. The AFL-CIO has suggested "areas where economies could be achieved," he

Labor, Industry Leaders Form New Joint Panel

By James M. Shevis

Key leaders of organized labor and American business announced the formation of a reconstituted Labor-Management Group outside the government to seek solutions to the major economic problems facing the country.

"The United States faces a period in its history when non-inflationary economic growth and full employment are essential to the maintenance of a free and healthy society," the group said in a statement of purpose at a Washington press conference.

"AMERICAN LABOR and business see these as necessary mutual goals to provide our society with new and expanded job opportunities, increased living standards, international competitiveness in an interdependent world, and the capacity to meet social commitments."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland will serve as chairman of the labor group and Clifton C. Garvin, Jr., chairman of the Exxon Corp., will head the management group. The joint panel will meet on a voluntary basis to seek a consensus approach toward economic policy.

Former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, who will serve as coordinator of the unit, observed that every major Western country has a forum in which labor and management leaders come together in an attempt to reach a meeting of the minds on major economic matters.

"IT SEEMS to me that the spirit of the times and the practice of other countries dictate such a forum here," said Dunlop, a Harvard University professor. The committee will deal principally with issues that are affected by public policy.

In the statement of purpose, which amounts to a formal charter under which the panel will operate, the two sides agreed that "the legitimacy of our respective institutions is demonstrated in the process of free collective bargaining," and added:

"We believe that both the democratic right of employees to determine the issue of representation and the process of collective bargaining must not be threatened by occasions of excessive behavior by employers or unions."

THE GROUP intends to "explore a wide range of issues with particular emphasis on revitalizing the nation's economic base, rebuilding the private and public infrastructure on which our productive capacity as a nation depends, and stimulating safe and efficient means for meeting the nation's energy needs," the statement of purpose said.

"The group will use the wider relationships its individual members have in the 'Right-to-Work' Bills Rejected in Idaho, Montana

Labor handed "right-to-work" proponents two sound defeats when active lobbying by union members persuaded the Idaho and Montana legislatures to reject anti-union measures.

The Idaho state senate voted 20 to 15 to table indefinitely a "right-to-work" bill sent to it by the state's lower house. A two-thirds majority of the senate would be needed to revive the legislation, action that is considered unlikely before the legislatures adjourns in April.

IN MONTANA, a bill designed to cripple public employee unions, which the State AFL-CIO branded a "first step to a state 'right-to-work' law" was killed by a vote of 17-0 in the legislature's House Labor & Industry Committee.

In both states grass-roots campaigns

AFL-CIO Scores Curtailment Of Trade Adjustment Benefits

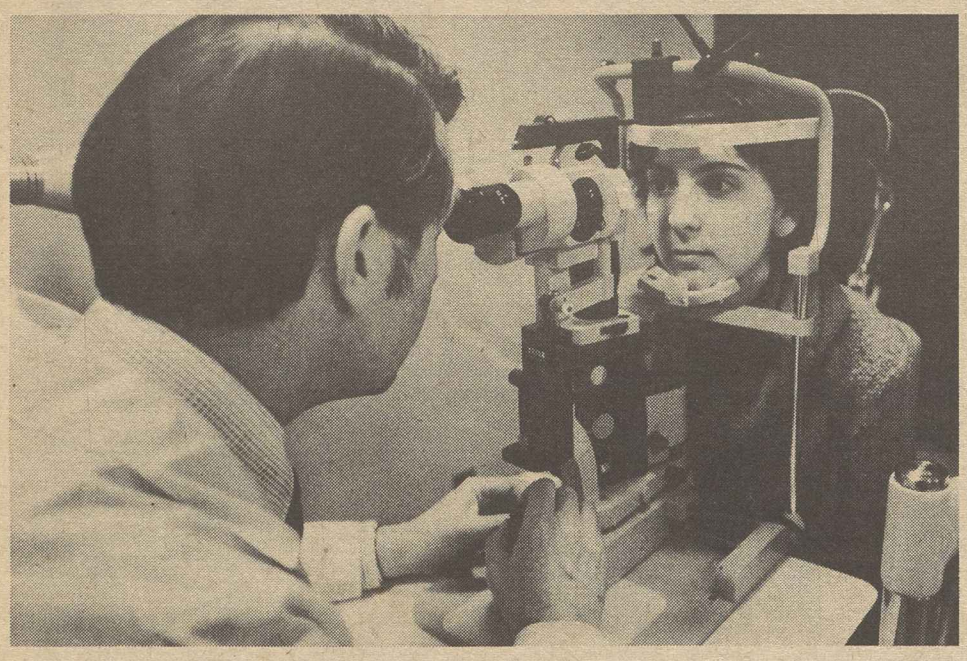
American workers being displaced by imports need expanded trade adjustment assistance, not sharp cutbacks in the program as proposed by the Reagan Administration's budget-cutters, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Testifying before a House Trade subcommittee, federation economist Elizabeth Jager warned that the Reagan budget ax would effectively terminate the adjustment benefits that hundreds of thousands of workers and communities depend on when plants are shut down because of import injury.

JAGER ALSO expressed concern that pressure from budget-cutters on the Treasury Dept. will result in slashing funds for the hiring of needed trade specialists who monitor imports.

An effective monitoring program to help enforce U.S. trade laws is essential to make the nation more competitive at home and abroad, she said.

The estimated cost of trade adjustment assistance for fiscal year 1981 is $2.7 billion, just over 1 percent of the current annual value of imports, Jager noted.



Prior reductions would limit the assistance program in fiscal '82 to $1.5 billion. But Jager pointed out that the Reagan Administration's budget-cutters would slash total benefits to $350 million.

THIS WOULD be done by amending the federal trade law so that workers would no longer get adjustment assistance while receiving unemployment insurance.

When unemployment insurance ran out, workers laid off because of imports could get adjustment aid, but the payments would be lowered to the jobless insurance rate.

So instead of a worker receiving 70 percent of his normal wages up to $269 a week for 52 weeks, the worker would be

EYE EXAMINATION is conducted at the University of Maryland Hospital for operators of newspaper video display terminals under a program sponsored by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health. An extensive study into the health effects of VDTs is also being launched by the Newspaper Guild and the Mount Sinai School of Medicine at several U.S. and Canadian locals.

Study to Explore Hazards Of Video Display Terminals

The Newspaper Guild and the Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York disclosed plans for an extensive study into the health effects that video display terminals (VDTs) have on workers.

The three-phase project is expected to cover some 2,000 Guild-represented newspaper employees, both VDT users and nonusers, in four to six Guild locals in the United States and Canada.

The first phase of the study will involve a survey to compare the physical conditions and symptoms of VDT users with those of nonusers in the same offices.

IF HEALTH irregularities are detected in a review of the questionnaires, follow-up ophthamological examinations and radiation tests will be conducted, the Guild said.

Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., said the study promises to be one of the most extensive of its kind.

"It should begin to provide a definitive answer as to whether VDTs produce cataracts or other damage to the eyes, as well as answer persistent questions about the possible effects of radiation," Perlik said.

The Guild said the study will be coordinated by Mount Sinai and the labor-supported Workers Institute for Safety & Health (WISH) to explore the effects of non-ionizing radiation in the workplace.

INITIAL COSTS of the survey will be borne by the Guild and Mount Sinai. Financing of the later phases of the study is expected to come from several sources, including grants, participating Guild locals and negotiated agreements with employers.

The pilot phase of the study is expected to get under way within two months at the Guild's Vancouver-New Westminster local in British Columbia, and at the Los Angeles local. Subsequent phases of the project will be initiated later this year.

Service Employees Launch Drive for Women Workers

The Service Employees are joining forces with a national organization of secretarial and clerical workers to step up the union's organizing among women workers.

Creation of SEIU District 925 as a joint venture with the 10,000-member association known as Working Women were announced at a press conference by SEIU President John J. Sweeney with Karen Nussbaum, executive director of Working Women who will be president of District 925, and Jacquelynn Ruff, president of SEIU Local 925 in Boston who will be the program's executive director. Local 925 is the nucleus of the new unit's activities.

DISTRICT 925, called a national local union by SEIU, will expand the union's organizing efforts among secretarial workers, Sweeney said. Some 50,000 of the union's 650,000 members are in clerical jobs, Sweeney said, and about half the union's membership is female.

Sweeney also announced the formation of a new division within the international union to serve the interests of the union's secretarial and clerical membership.

He told reporters that because most of the nation's 20 million office workers lack union representation, they are "among the most underpaid and abused members of the workforce."

THE UNION hopes to organize more of these workers, Sweeney said, through the combination of SEIU's collective bargaining expertise and Working Women's successful representation of women's issues. District 925 will be organizing in a field in which 80 percent of the workers are women, and the new local union will be run "for and by" women, Sweeney emphasized.

Nussbaum told reporters that District 925 will not replace Working Women. She said that organization will continue to offer "programs of legal action, counseling, education and public awareness" to interested women.

RUFF NOTED that SEIU's 1,000-member Local 925, a name that plays on office hours "nine to five," has already posted substantial success in organizing workers in publishing, legal offices and universities in the Boston area.

Four organizers have been assigned to the initial stages of the organizing program, Sweeney said, although no final budget has yet been established for the program.

Arleen Gilliam Joins Social Security Staff

Arleen Fain Gilliam has joined the staff of the AFL-CIO as an assistant director of the Dept. of Social Security. She will concentrate on unemployment insurance and workers' compensation issues.

Before joining the AFL-CIO, Gilliam, 32, was with the Labor Dept. as executive assistant to the assistant secretary for employment and training. She was formerly a budget analyst with the Congressional Budget Office.

Gilliam received a bachelor of science degree in economics and business from Skidmore College, and a master of science from the Sloan School of Management at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology where she specialized in labor and industrial relations.

In Dissent by Lyons

Pension Law Proposals Seen as Backward Step

Many of the changes in social security and public sector retirement benefits that have been proposed by a presidential commission would work to the detriment of America's workers, Iron Workers President John H. Lyons protested in a formal dissent.

Lyons, the only union official on the 11-member President's Commission on Pension Policy, objected to reducing benefits as a means of easing funding problems and especially to a proposal that would gradually push the "normal" retirement age from 65 to 68.

HE ALSO voiced some reservations about the commission's proposal for mandatory employer-financed pensions meeting minimum federal standards as a supplement to social security benefits. The concept of such a private-sector program needs more detailed study than the commission was able to give it, Lyons suggested.

The commission, established by Congress and appointed by President Carter in 1979, was headed by C. Peter McColough, board chairman of the Xerox Corp., and submitted its proposals both to President Reagan and to Congress. While the recommendations represented a consensus within the commission, six members in addition to Lyons submitted "additional views" covering specific issues.

Lyons made these major points in his dissenting views:

- Pushing back the social security retirement age to 68, even if it would not affect workers now approaching retirement, "would break faith with younger workers" and "undermine confidence" that workers who pay into the system can count on the benefits promised. While many workers choose to work beyond 65, lack of job opportunities and ill health won't be overcome by later retirement.
- A recommendation that public sector retirement systems should increase their normal retirement age "in tandem with social security" would amount to a unilateral sacrifice by public employees of improvements made over the years, often as a tradeoff for other benefits.
- Abolishing early retirement rights now allowed for some public sector hazardous occupations ignores the fact that these provisions are in part designed to meet the need for persons in the physical prime of life. Further, where early retirement options are not available in such occupations as police and fire fighting, a high ratio of disability retirement offsets much of the supposed savings to the local governments.
- A commission recommendation for universal social security coverage, even though supporting retention of existing public retirement programs as a supplement, does not provide sufficient assurance that employees affected would not be worse off.
- Cutbacks in inflation protection for both social security and federal civil service retirement benefits put budget concerns over protecting pension payments against inflation.
- The commission should have recommended a degree of general revenue financing to supplement the social security payroll tax.
- Social security benefits should continue to be exempt from tax. The commission proposed to allow a tax credit or deduction for the employee-paid portion of the payroll tax but make the remainder subject to regular income tax while at the same time lifting the ceiling on outside earnings.

ON THE proposed mandatory universal pension system, which the commission refers to as MUPS, Lyons noted that the advantages it would bring "could be provided through social security at less cost."

But he acknowledged that "political realities" make the likelihood of sufficiently improving social security benefits to achieve a more comfortable retirement income "virtually nil." Thus, "the MUPS proposal may be the next best alternative."

As outlined by the commission, though, it has serious deficiencies, through smaller wage and benefit increases, and at the same time proposes a business tax credit to help employers meet the cost.

THE AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. also sharply criticized commission recommendations affecting federal, postal, state and local government workers and retirees.

PED Director John Leyden charged that the recommendations are based on the false assumption that public sector pensions are overly generous. He said the department has developed position papers that point up "inaccuracies of the benefit and cost level comparisons between public and private sector employees which serve as the basis for the report's conclusions."

Council Gets Report Ending Two Boycotts

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its winter meeting here officially recognized the conclusion of two national consumer boycotts and removed the companies involved from the federation's boycott list.

The consumer action against J. P. Stevens & Co., conducted for more than four years by the Clothing & Textile Workers, ended last October when the union won a landmark agreement with the giant textile manufacturer.

The boycott against Cotrell & Leonard, Inc., a manufacturer of choir and graduation robes, was called off by the Ladies' Garment Workers in December when a settlement was reached with the company ending a long strike.

Auto Industry States Show Surge in 1980 Joblessness

Increases in the jobless rate were widespread among the states in 1980, with rates in each of 22 states exceeding the national increase of 1.3 percentage points, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

According to the annual average estimates from the Current Population Survey, 32 states showed significant increases in unemployment rates.

BLS REPORTED the largest increases were in the north central region, where cutbacks were prevalent in auto-related and other durable goods manufacturing industries.

Michigan had the highest unemployment rate for the year—12.6 percent.

Declines in construction affected virtually all of the 32 states where unemployment rates increased in 1980, BLS said.

Unemployment rates changed very little over the year in most northeastern states and in ten southern and western states.

FIVE STATES had jobless rates higher than 8.5 percent. These included Alaska and Indiana, each with a rate of 9.6 percent, West Virginia at 9.4 percent and Alabama with a rate of 8.8 percent.

In the Pacific region, jobless rates included 6.8 percent in California, 8.2 percent in Oregon and 7.5 percent in Washington.

The total number of employed persons rose slightly in more than half the states. However, there were decreases in 16 states, mainly in the north central and south Atlantic regions, including substantial declines in Michigan, where employment dropped 5.5 percent, and Indiana, where there was a 3 percent drop.

Congress Urged to Reject Reagan Plan

noted, including the "tax expenditures" that reward business for the export of jobs and the nation's industrial base. Credit measures that bring down interest rates would significantly reduce the federal budget and at the same time greatly help cities and states, Kirkland pointed out.

If Congress concludes that the budget must be reduced, he said, "it is more equitable to take a bit off everything . . . People can understand that and accept it."

REPEATEDLY, Kirkland challenged the view of government as a burden. He spoke of growing up in South Carolina, where gullies were ruining the land, only the main street in town was paved, kerosene lamps lit farmhouses, and "the social security system was the county poorhouse."

It took federal programs to turn that around, Kirkland reminded the committee.

From the House hearings, Kirkland joined other union officials and representatives of allied groups testifying before the Democratic Policy Forum, made up of the Democratic members of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee.

He reminded the senators of the "slow, painful process" to achieve a measure of social progress and economic justice.

NOW, HE SAID, those who cried "don't move too fast" when programs to help the jobless and disadvantaged were enacted are demanding "full speed ahead" in dismantling them.

"Workers who have been unemployed for long periods of time face more than termination of unemployment benefits," Kirkland noted. "Cuts in welfare and food stamp programs will further reduce their families' standard of living. Cuts in job training and public service jobs programs eliminate opportunities to increase their chances of employment. Cuts in medicaid and housing programs would jeopardize their health and shelter."

The Senate committee also has jurisdiction over education programs, and American Federation of Teachers President Albert Shanker spoke of the impact of the proposed budget cuts on the schools.

FEDERAL AID to public elementary and secondary schools has been cut more than any other area of government spending, Shanker noted. In addition, he said, "one-half of the cuts of the Dept. of Agriculture come out of the Child Nutrition Program."

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said the Administration's proposed cutbacks "could not come at a worse time" for workers in the auto and parts supplier industries.

He spoke of the direct effect of cutbacks in trade adjustment assistance and unemployment insurance, and the compounding of problems for recession-hit communities through elimination of CETA jobs, cuts in urban assistance, mass transit, school aid, housing and health services.

SEN. EDWARD M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the ranking minority member of the now Republican-controlled Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, said the Democratic Forum intends to focus on achieving equity in what he considers the inevitability of budget cuts.

There have been no complaints about the budget from the oil industry, Kennedy noted. "No industry, no region and no state should be given special privilege—or forced to bear a special burden," he declared.

AT HOUSE HEARINGS, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland outlines labor's alternatives to budget cuts sought by the Reagan Administration. With him are Legislative Director Ray Denison, left, and Research Director Rudy Oswald.

Union-Busting Consultant Hit By NLRB on Illegal Campaign

Milwaukee, Wis.—The National Labor Relations Board has charged a management consulting firm with a reputation as a union-busting operation with unfair labor practices on an employer's behalf during a hospital organizing drive.

In a complaint issued here against Modern Management Methods, Inc., the NLRB regional office said that 3M, as the company is commonly called, independently violated the National Labor Relations Act "by its having complete control and use of supervisory personnel at St. Francis Hospital in a systematic anti-union campaign. . . ."

THE NLRB complaint accused 3M of directing "illegal interrogations, promises of benefits, promises of improved conditions of employment, and threats of reprisal against employees for engaging in union activities, which actions all prevent employees from freely exercising their right to make a decision as to union representation in an untainted atmosphere."

The St. Francis Federation of Nurses & Health Professionals, an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers, lost an October 1979 election among the Milwaukee hospital's registered nurses by a 100-95 vote.

A three-member NLRB panel set aside the election last summer, finding that the hospital had unlawfully intimidated workers, promised benefits for voting against the union by announcing a 10-percent wage increase to take effect after the election, and solicited and promised to remedy grievances. The union filed unfair labor practice charges against the hospital, and sought a bargaining order.

The union also filed charges against 3M, alleging that the firm was independently responsible for the various unfair labor actions committed by hospital supervisors.

NLRB REGIONAL Director George Squillacote said the complaint is believed to be the first authorized against the firm. Various unions have accused 3M of violating worker rights.

Squillacote said the St. Francis case would test the validity of such charges. Hearings before an NLRB administrative law judge are scheduled to begin on Apr. 20.

Squillacote said that the "uniqueness of this matter is in the allegation that 3M is responsible as a separae entity, or at least as a co-employer rather than merely as an agent, for the violations committed by supervisory personnel at the hospital."

HE ADDED that the case would not apply to a normal relationship in which a consultant advises a client in its labor relations.

Rather, the case stands on its own facts, "indicating that 3M was given and exercised daily intimate and independent direction of the supervisory personnel" at the hospital, he said.

Broad Coalition Challenges Slashes in Key Programs

norities would suffer disproportionately from reductions in food stamps, termination of job training programs, rent increases for subsidized housing and reduction of unemployment compensation for the long-term unemployed.

Marvin Meek, national chairman of the American Agricultural Movement, said he had campaigned on behalf of President Reagan in 34 states but now was prepared to work with the labor movement and other coalition partners to see that promises to labor, agriculture and consumers are kept "and to insure that rights of the truly needy are protected."

Nancy Neuman, director of the League of Women Voters, said members of her good government organization throughout the country "are in a state of disbelief and dismay over the shortsighted nature of many of the Administration's announced budget cuts."

SHE SAID projected cuts will frustrate the hopes of the poor "for ever getting out of the cycle of welfare dependency" and "take food out of the mouths of children of the working poor." Environmental cuts will have "grave consequences" and some foreign assistance cuts "are equally myopic," she said.

Leon Shull, director of Americans for Democratic Action, said the effect of the Reagan economic program would be "to transfer wealth from the workers, the middle class and the poor to the corporations and the rich."

Althea T. H. Simmons, Washington director of the NAACP, said the Administration proposals would further increase "the economic inequities that presently exist between the rich and the poor and between blacks and whites." She said the NAACP "will be an active part of this coalition and will call its leadership in to lobby on Capitol Hill."

McALPINE OF THE Urban League said his organization has just completed an assessment of the President's economic recovery plan that found that minorities and the poor would bear a disproportionate burden and that block grant consolidation of federal education, health and social services programs "would result in vastly inferior services for minorities and other disadvantaged groups."

John Gunther, who represented Steering Committee member Richard Hatcher, mayor of Gary, Ind., and president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, said cities don't have the resources to take up the burden that the Administration wants to shift from the federal government to cities and states.

On elimination of CETA public service jobs, he noted that in New York about 8,900 of 11,000 CETA workers were on welfare before they got CETA jobs. "They will be back on welfare or unemployment compensation," he warned.

STEPHEN BROBECK, director of the Consumer Federation of America, said the Administration program would "cripple the enforcement of pro-consumer and pro-worker regulations" and "eliminate federal programs highly beneficial to consumers and to low-income families."

Other members of the Budget Coalition Steering Committee on hand for the news conference were UAW President Douglas Fraser, Msgr. George G. Higgins of the U.S. Catholic Conference, and Karen E. Spellman of the National Urban Coalition.

The cooperating organizations pledged to seek alternatives that would avoid "the unnecessary and unwise destruction of social and economic advances achieved in the past 50 years."

U.S. Court Overturns Federal Parking Fees

Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock praised a federal district court finding that government-imposed parking fees on federal workers are illegal.

Judge Harold H. Greene, in granting summary judgment on behalf of the AFGE, said President Carter acted "without proper authority" in 1979 when he imposed parking fees on federal workers. He ordered a halt to the fees and said he would rule later on whether workers should be repaid past fees.

Bommarito to Take a Walk —Enlists Cheering Section

Akron, Ohio—Rubber Workers President Peter Bommarito has challenged the chairmen of the board of each of the major U.S. rubber companies to accept his latest proposals. This time, however, the union president isn't bargaining for wages or working conditions for his members.

In a letter to each company, Bommarito asked its chairman to sponsor him in the March of Dimes national WalkAmerica scheduled for Apr. 26 to raise money for the prevention of birth defects.

"In conjunction with that program," Bommarito said, I am prepared to fulfill one of management's frequent requests. I will take a long hike." He said he has volunteered to walk some 30 kilometers, about 18 miles, and asked each executive to pledge "a substantial contribution per kilometer."

Management can reap a secondary benefit from the event, Bommarito said, pointing out that since he has recently recovered from knee surgery following a fall, the March of Dimes walk, "gives you a rare opportunity to satisfy any secret (or expressed) desire you may harbor to see me suffer while at the same time being secure in the knowledge that you are doing a great deal of good."

Something Is Wrong

THE ORGANIZATIONS represented here today, and the other co-sponsors of this statement, believe in a healthy, prosperous nation and a stable, growing economy. Along with all other Americans we are disturbed by the destructive forces of inflation, joblessness, energy instability and high interest rates and we strongly support programs that can bring them under control.

Each organization represented here has studied the proposals of the Reagan Administration to reshape the budget, and it is our united belief they will not make America healthier and, instead, could make America weaker.

THESE PROPOSALS do not set forth a period of belt-tightening shared by all, after which America can again grow and prosper at all levels of our society. Instead, many vital programs are marked for extinction and others will be hopelessly crippled.

We believe that something is basically wrong when programs assisting hard-pressed moderate-income working Americans and those living at or under the federal poverty level, but who presumably are not "truly needy," are decimated or destroyed to finance individual tax cuts benefiting primarily the top 20 percent of taxpayers.

America's minorities, women, seniors and disabled, would be among those drastically hurt. Furthermore, cuts in Medicaid, food stamps, unemployment insurance, and other life-support programs place gaping holes in the "safety net" the Administration pledged to maintain.

We believe something is basically wrong when federal budget reductions simply shift the tax burden for essential services, such as health and human services, sewer and road construction, education, economic development and income maintenance to state and local governments. No real fiscal improvement for the nation or the taxpayer is achieved.

WE BELIEVE something is basically wrong when budget cutbacks result in increased costs to all consumers regardless of their ability to pay. Federal assistance to transportation systems, utilities, construction, postal service and others would be replaced by higher fares, higher rates and higher user fees—or higher local taxes.

We believe that this nation can find solutions to the problems of high inflation, high interest rates, high energy costs and high unemployment which will not create unfair hardship on any one group of Americans. We believe the Reagan Administration proposals will not solve these problems, but could wreak great damage to the fabric of this nation.

Today we are aligning ourselves in a national coalition to urge that alternative and constructive solutions be proposed to these genuine and difficult problems and to carry out a fight against the unnecessary and unwise destruction of social and economic advances achieved in the past 50 years.

Demand Mounting

U.S. Faces Critical Shortage Of Scientific, Technical Talent

By Gus Tyler

BY 1985, AMERICA will be garroted by a critical shortage of scientists, technicians and engineers. Indeed, the shortfall in talent is hurting us right now. In the next few years, the scarcity will turn scary.

Companies are coming to schools in search of trained personnel in these technical areas. The colleges and universities respond that they are short on graduates from their engineering and allied schools. When the corporations ask, unbelievingly, why there is a shortage, the academies answer that they cannot turn out all the students they would like to because the companies have been draining away the faculties to work for the companies.

WHEN I FIRST heard this story from a man high in American education, he asked: "Isn't it stupid of these companies to expect to get more engineers from the schools when these same companies are busy stripping us of our teachers? You wonder why they do this."

"Because they need engineers," I suggested.

At present, academia has been bled so badly that it is seeking high and low to fill some 2,000 vacancies in engineering faculties.

THE REASONS for the shortage are double: higher demand and less supply. The supply is low because, several years ago, when the government cut back on its space programs, young people felt that the age of hard sciences was over and that it was time to turn to the hard-boiled crafts, like law. So they dropped Euclid and picked up Blackstone.

Then came the demand—for alternative sources of energy, for making the nuke a bit safer, for guaranteeing product safety, for controlling quality of manufactured commodities, for coping with industrial poisons, for cleaning up the environment.

MORE RECENTLY, the demand for computer scientists has zoomed. As we move into the age of micro-electronic computerized robots, more trained personnel will be needed to program the computer. We have the hardware (the machine) and plenty of it; but we lack the software (the systems). At this moment, a computer scientist, fresh out of undergraduate school, can command a salary of $30,000 a year.

This scientific anemia was predictable. Indeed, it was predicted. About ten years ago when I was serving on a manpower commission of the National Research Council, I listened to a low-key presentation on the coming crunch: not enough trained brains to meet our energy needs, not enough teachers, researchers, innovators, engineers, programmers, repair persons.

By 1973, after the oil squeeze, it was abundantly, even painfully, clear that we would have to shift to new sources of energy and that we would have to start immediately to prepare personnel for the crucial days ahead.

But we have hardly moved at all to respond—not only to develop the needed people for the professional operations but also to train blue-collar workers. If we were to embark on a program of energy independence by installing adequate facilities, we wouldn't have enough pipefitters, sheet metal workers, iron workers, electricians, etc.

SO WHY haven't we responded? Mainly, because there is no "we." All the power a research council has is to study and state. It cannot order or finance. Corporations go about their daily chores, rarely seeing beyond their most immediate nose. If they need more engineers, they pirate them.

What is lacking is a government with a vision, a guiding intelligence and coordinating power, poking and prodding and putting things together so that business and the schools can ready us for tomorrow.

Kirkland's Commentary

Reagan's Economic Program Fails Tests of Justice, Equity

The following article by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland appeared in the New York Times business section, Mar. 1, 1981.

By Lane Kirkland

AMERICAN WORKERS share the economic goals announced by the President—less inflation, more jobs, improved productivity, stronger industries and more effective government.

But the President's program cannot achieve those goals. Its tax approach favors the rich and the budget cuts fall most heavily on the low- and middle-income families. It fails every test of justice and equity. Even the so-called across-the-board business tax cuts will flow to richer industries rather than to those that truly need help.

IN BLENDING the untested theories of supply-side economists, who hold that salvation lies in giving free rein to industry, with the traditional doctrines of monetarists, who advocate high interest rates, tight money and balanced budgets, the Administration is, in effect, yoking optimistic guesswork to proven failure.

To assume that tax cuts and depreciation speedups will, in themselves, encourage workers to work harder, suppliers to supply more goods and investors to invest more constructively is what Dr. Johnson, in another context, called "a triumph of hope over experience."

No doubt there are some who might increase their efforts and incomes if lower taxes made it more worthwhile to do so. The vast majority of salaried and hourly rated workers have no such option. Driven by inflation, they are already working to capacity to meet their bills.

THERE IS NOT the slightest evidence that more money will induce a heavy investment in common stocks and away from speculation in real estate, gambling casinos, antiques and other rapidly appreciating "collectibles."

And what manufacturer in his right mind would jump on the supply-side bandwagon when much of his productive capacity is already idle, when his shelves are heavy with unsold inventories, interest rates hover near 20 percent and government policies aim at further tightening of the demand side? How, for instance, can supply-side economics help an auto industry that has many times more cars than customers?

The problem is not lack of supply. And yet, while cheering on the supply side, the Reagan Administration adopts budget policies certain to destroy at least a million more jobs, which translates into two or three times that many fewer potential customers.

AS STRUCTURED, the Administration's business tax changes would channel the lion's share of benefits to the industries and companies that need it least. For new and marginal enterprises the package offers little or nothing. The richest companies would find it more profitable to continue their "corporate acquisition" programs and to continue moving more and more jobs from areas where unemployment is already high than to increase production or introduce new products.

Experience with the oil industry's handling of its grossly inflated profits should make it clear that more money does not bring new ideas, new jobs and productive investment. If the past is any guide, we can expect only new waves of mergers and takeovers, more predatory exercises in conglomeration and monopoly.

No important decision is ever based on tax incentives alone. Any business contemplating an investment in the South Bronx, for example, is likely to care much more about the quality of police and fire protection than about tax rebates. Therefore, the Administration's approach to urban programs offsets any hope of better days ahead for the cities.

THE MOST DANGEROUS of the false assumptions that underlie the Reagan program is the notion that the network of social programs that has been erected over the last half-century is an expendable luxury that can be demolished without injury to the nation's economic and social fabric.

Those who remember the conditions that made those programs necessary will tolerate no return to the suffering they relieved and the injustices they rectified. We know that by any realistic assessment, the resources and capabilities of our economic system are more than adequate to the needs of all the American people.

The Administration's income tax proposals, like the other parts of its domestic policy package, are heavily loaded in favor of those who have much and against those who have little.

A family earning $10,000 a year would get a tax break of $52 in the first year of the Reagan program. A family earning $30,000 would get not three times the tax benefit of the poorer family, but nearly 7½ times. The family earning $100,000—10 times as much—would get tax benefits at least 35 times larger.

RATHER THAN giving 60 percent of the tax cut to 20 percent of the taxpayers, as the Administration proposes, the AFL-CIO urges a refund of 20 percent of social security taxes. The $10,000 family would receive a benefit of $134. The $30,000 family and the $100,000 family would benefit by $395 each. Sixty percent of the tax cut would go to 80 percent of the taxpayers.

A humane society requires a decent measure of concern for the old, the young, the disadvantaged and the deprived. A rational society requires tax policies and investment policies targeted to meet demand—for housing, transportation, energy, medical care and food.

With the aid of all the allies we can find, the AFL-CIO will call these facts to the attention of the Congress and the American people in order to restore humane and rational policies to what we still believe is a government of, by and for the people.

AMONG THE MOST unfortunate examples of the meat-ax approach to budget-cutting is the National Consumer Cooperative Bank, an innovative institution which quietly has been doing some fine things for consumers with a small but necessary boost from Uncle Sam.

Now comes the Reagan Administration's budget cutbacks which, ironically, would smother in the cradle the year-old Co-op Bank despite the bank's orientation toward the conservative values embodied in America's time-tested cooperative movement—values like local self-help and market enterprise and non-big government.

Further, the bank fits right in with the Administration's announced aim of fighting inflation. It does so by helping co-ops around the country provide consumers with reasonably priced and high-quality food and housing, health care, child care and other services.

LAUNCHED IN March 1980, the Consumer Cooperative Bank has moved toward filling a gaping hole of needs unmet by the commercial marketplace.

Traditional lending institutions tend to turn a deaf ear when approached by worthy consumer co-ops seeking loans to get started, expand operations or stay afloat. Bankers and others often are ignorant or mistrustful of the very idea of co-ops despite their honorable history dating back to colonial times. More recently, the movement has had wide success among rural producer and electric cooperatives since the 1930s.

Today, neighborhood food co-ops have become especially important at a time of soaring food prices and when supermarket chains are abandoning central city areas.

Housing co-ops also are needed more than ever during the current wave of condominium conversions so that tenants can avoid being displaced from their homes.

MORE RECENT trends in the cooperative movement have followed growing needs in the areas of health care, child care and even auto repair and home improvement.

The Co-Op Bank so far has approved more than $81 million in loans to co-ops of all sizes and in dollar amounts ranging from several thousand to more than a million. An additional $3 million in loans has been approved from the bank's "self-help fund" which in some cases provides working capital at lower than prevailing market interest rates. These loans are earmarked for co-ops run by or for low-income people as well as co-ops just starting out and ones in temporary financial trouble.

Borrowers from the Co-op Bank automatically become shareholders who eventually will elect all but one of the bank's 15-member board of directors, now appointed by the President. The bank's eight regional offices provide local access.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT, no stranger to the cooperative movement over the years, has been showing a growing interest in the Co-op Bank and in co-ops in general. Harry Kaiser, in charge of labor liaison for the bank, reports that some unions are taking steps to sponsor cooperatives—a move he strongly recommends as "a membership service, an organizing tool, and a way to build stronger ties between the membership and the local."

Proponents of the bank point out that the $400 million provided for the Co-op Bank's capitalization over a five-year period is not a government subsidy but a loan to be repaid to the Treasury with interest. The bank, they note, already is on the way to achieving its goal of becoming self-sustaining.

Thus, the Reagan Administration's plan to put the bank out of business by terminating further funding—about $82 million for the rest of this fiscal year and $128 million for Fiscal 1982—seems penny wise and pound foolish.

Labor-Senior Citizens Project Assists Needy on Utility Costs

UNION MEMBERS in communities throughout the nation are assisting the National Council of Senior Citizens in its effort to help the elderly, disabled and poor families ease the impact of soaring utility costs.

That report was made on Labor News Conference by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman and NCSC Energy Adviser Esther Peterson, who stressed the importance of an outreach effort to assure that eligible persons get the utility cost help they desperately need and are entitled to receive.

Seidman pointed out that "older people are particularly vulnerable to illness and even death, as a result of both extreme cold and extreme heat," but often can't afford the oil, gas or electricity it takes to maintain healthful living conditions. The federal help made possible by the windfall oil profits tax adopted last year could be "the difference between life and death," he said.

Peterson said the NCSC outreach effort, dubbed Project Energy Care, is mainly an information program to seek out low-income citizens and help them through the process of application and qualification for federal aid.

SHE POINTED OUT that the Low-Income Energy Assistance Program procedures are determined by the states and localities that receive the federal grants and may differ widely from area to area. It is critical to have people at the grass roots who can sort out, understand and help guide desperately needy people through the local regulations, she noted. Union members are assisting through efforts coordinated by local AFL-CIO central bodies and the federation's Community Services organizations.

UNION VOLUNTEERS are participating in the National Council of Senior Citizens' Project Energy Care, aimed at helping the elderly and poor families get federal assistance in meeting their soaring utilities bills, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, second from left, and NCSC Energy Adviser Esther Peterson, second from right, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning them were Diane Brockett of the Washington Star and Calvin Zon of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Long Printing Strike Ends As New Owner Signs Pact

Mount Morris, Ill.—Kable Printing Co. is back under a union contract after a long-running experiment with Boulwarism that precipitated a six and one-half year strike by the Graphic Arts International Union.

The strike-settling agreement signed last December with Kable's new owner, Providence Gravure, was widely welcomed by Mount Morris's 2,900 residents. Kable is the town's principal employer.

"THIS SETTLEMENT makes a whole new perspective for our community," said Mount Morris Mayor Donald Mulcay. The strike and subsequent closing of the magazine and catalogue printing plant had a deep economic and ideological impact on the residents.

"The strike tore the town apart in every way because Kable is the main source of everything here," said President Lamont Gaston of GAIU Local 91-P.

Photoengravers of Local 91-P and bookbinders of Local 65-B were forced to strike Kable on May 10, 1974, when a previous owner, Western Publishing Co., attempted to force an inferior contract on them with a take-it-or-leave-it ultimatum, the hallmark of Lemuel R. Boulware.

THE COMPANY'S proposal was the brainchild of M. Melvin Connolly, a follower of Boulware's bargaining philosophy, who had been hired as Western Publishing's labor relations director.

Boulware had been the force behind the hard-nosed, bad-faith bargaining approach at General Electric Co. that triggered a number of long and bitter strikes.

Western Publishing's use of Boulwarism precipitated other disputes and led to the closing of other plants in its chain. In 1979, Western Publishing sold the printing operations to Mattel Co., the toymaker. But soon after Mattel discovered the serious labor relations problems at Kable, it sold the plant in 1980 to Rhode Island-based Providence Gravure, a firm that the GAIU has had an amicable bargaining relationship with for a number of years.

THE SETTLEMENT worked out with Kable's new owner is patterned closely after an agreement covering the GAIU members in Providence, R.I.

GAIU won almost every lawsuit it brought against Western Publishing for failure to bargain in good faith and other issues.

Program Assists Workers Seeking Higher Education

A program to link workers with higher education opportunities has been launched by the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment, Inc., the research and education arm of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees.

The project, called Labor Education Advisory Services (LEAS), is supported by a grant from the Fund for Improvement of Post Secondary Education of the U.S. Education Dept. LEAS activities will include providing technical help and information to unions and their members who are interested in taking advantage of higher education programs.

IN ADDITION, LEAS will encourage educational institutions to develop and improve programs accessible to workers.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education will work closely with the project which has also been endorsed by the Teachers, the Government Employees, Graphic Arts International Union, Professional & Technical Engineers and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Mayer Rossabi, labor studies director at New York's Manhattan Community College, will head the program.

LEAS WILL act as a clearinghouse for information and research related to adult workers and education, Rossabi said, and will "encourage union members to take advantage of the millions of dollars available to them through tuition assistance provisions in the contracts negotiated by their unions"

Democrats Critical

Economic Panel Divides On Reagan's Proposals

Democratic members of the congressional Joint Economic Committee, differing sharply with the Reagan Administration's economic program, called for more moderate monetary and budget policies and heavy emphasis on structural reform to lower unemployment and shrink inflation.

Splitting with the committee's Republicans, Democrats led by Chairman Henry Reuss (D-Wis.) called for a tax policy of "immediate relief for the low- and middle-income class" to offset the recent increase in social security taxes.

THEY CHARGED that President Reagan's proposed three-year, 30-percent tax cut "favors the affluent," and could prove to be inflationary. As for spending cuts, these should be made "without destroying those programs which fight inflation and unemployment."

The JEC statement also opposed the Administration's view that the Federal Reserve Board should continue to lower its money supply targets this year.

"Interest rates are too high now, and will remain too high if the Federal Reserve continues to tighten its monetary targets even though control over inflation has not been achieved," Reuss said. "Excessively high interest rates will retard investment, growth, and control over federal expenditures."

FOR THEIR PARTS, the 10 GOP members of the 20-member panel espoused an economic plan identical to Reagan's. The JEC Republican group called for across-the-board tax reduction, cuts in government spending, easing of regulation, and a tight-money policy.

In the recent past, committee members of both parties were virtually unanimous in their annual economic recommendations. The panel's 1981 report with its different positions mirrors the debate over economic policy now under way.

"The Administration says the budget must be cut. So do we," said Chairman Reuss, speaking for the JEC Democrats, "provided that the cuts are sensible and fair.

"The Administration says that the growth of money and credit must be controlled. So do we, but we recommend specific action for bringing interest rates down now. The Administration wants a vast personal income tax cut. . . . We favor more modest tax cuts, less oriented toward the wealthy."

COMMITTEE MEMBERS of both parties agreed in principle to the Reagan plan to cut the growth of federal spending. Democrats urged, however, that the program be designed to "reach full employment without inflation," a reference to implementation of the 1978 Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act, which the Administration has ignored in its economic discussions.

Budget policy should be one of "moderate restraint," which would be intended to "exert a slow braking force on our rate of inflation," the Democrats said. They also advocated:

- "An expenditure policy which will bring control over spending and the budget, and that will do so fairly, equitably, and without destroying those programs which fight inflation and unemployment by supporting investment and creating jobs.
- "A firm commitment that government tax and spending actions should not increase poverty or reduce the share of income received by the middle classes."

Safety Check Not Trespass, California High Court Rules

Sacramento, Calif.—A unanimous California Supreme Court ruled that union representatives conducting contract-sanctioned safety inspections of a housing construction site cannot be prosecuted for trespassing.

The decision overturned rulings by lower courts holding that two Carpenters' shop stewards were guilty of violating the state's industrial trespass law.

In writing the high court decision, Justice Matthew O. Tobriner concluded that "collectively bargained safety and health provisions have little meaning if employee representatives can be ousted from the jobsite," particularly in an industry "where working conditions may be extremely hazardous."

If employers or third parties were permitted, in violation of the collective bargaining agreement, to prosecute union officials for carrying out these inspection duties, the contract "becomes unenforceable and a dusty dead letter," the court declared.

The case involves two shop stewards for the Ventura District Council of Carpenters who went to a construction site where three subcontractors that have agreements with the council were building 30 new houses.

HOWEVER, the council did not have a contract with Stonecraft Homes, the owner of the property. An agent of Stonecraft interrupted the safety inspection and asked the stewards to leave. They said they would leave as soon as the inspection was completed.

Stonecraft called the police, but the officers who responded to the call declined to arrest the union inspectors. The owner then made a citizen's arrest and the two Carpenters' officials were convicted of trespassing under the state criminal code and sentenced to a fine of $100 or four days in jail. The ruling was upheld in a second court.

BUT IN overturning the two lower court rulings, the state Supreme Court held that the provision of the law protecting union representatives engaged in lawful activity should be extended to private jobsites as well.

The trespass law "may not be used to frustrate legitimate union activities on private premises, at least in instances in which no significant property interest is threatened," Justice Tobriner wrote.

Supermarket Chains Scored On Employee Data Surveys

The Food & Commercial Workers accused two large supermarket chains of using surveys to solicit information from employees that can be used against them and their fellow workers.

The UFCW said the chains involved were Safeway, the largest food chain in the nation, and Dominick's, a chain with stores in the Chicago area but a part of the Ohio-based Fisher-Fazio group. Although the two chains used different management consultants to circulate the surveys, the union said employees at both companies were asked about "the sins of their fellow employees and the transgressions of store managers."

"WHAT IS SO insidious about both surveys," said UFCW President William H. Wynn, "is that they ask for so much personal information that it is easy to identify each employee. It really isn't hard to figure out who the employee is when you know their store number, sex, race, years on the current job, age, seniority, weekly hours total, job classification and department."

Wynn explained that the union is instructing its members to refuse to return the questionnaire to their employers.

"This is a clear violation of the Taft-Hartley Act and a ploy by management to pit worker against worker and worker against store manager," he said. "The companies are obviously gathering this information as ammunition against their employees, including supervisory help. Such tactics on the part of major employers such as Safeway and Dominick's make a mockery of the entire collective bargaining process."

FROM THE TENOR of the questionnaire circulated by Safeway, Wynn said it "seems obvious that data will be used in negotiations. Employees are invited to evaluate benefits as well as tell management what they think Safeway's profit ratio really is. The most childish question of all is one which demands that employees tell management whether they think the union or Safeway provides health benefits."

One UFCW member in the Richmond, Va., area who answered all 274 questions in the Safeway survey reported to his local union that it took two and a half hours of concentrated effort.

Court to Hear NLRB Cases On Exclusions

The Supreme Court has agreed to rule on two cases that could have a significant impact on the organization of office employees.

Both cases involve an employer attempt to deny office employees the right to union representation on the grounds that the workers have access to information the company considers "confidential."

IN EACH OF the cases, the National Labor Relations Board held that the employees involved were protected by federal labor law, since the supposedly confidential information they deal with did not involve labor policies or collective bargaining issues. In both cases, the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the NLRB position and sided with the company.

One case involved the secretary to the general manager of a Rural Electric office in Indiana, who was fired after she joined other employees in signing a petition protesting the firing of a fellow-worker who had lost his arm in a work-related accident.

THE OTHER case involved the refusal of the Malleable Iron Range Co. at Beaver Dam, Wis., to bargain with a unit of 18 clerical and technical workers on the ground that they were "confidential employees."

In another matter, the Supreme Court declined to review and thus made final a decision by the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals holding that Eastern Airlines could not routinely ground a stewardess during the first 13 weeks of her pregnancy but could bar her from flying duty thereafter.

AMERICAN-BUILT ships are essential to meet the nation's merchant and military marine needs in the coming years, the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. declared at its board meeting in Florida. Leading discussion of programs to improve U.S.-built seapower is Department President Paul J. Burnsky, right foreground.

Funds Raised for Kin Of Iran Rescue Team

Glen Burnie, Md.—Three local unions raised more than $3,500 in voluntary donations at the Westinghouse Corp. plant here for a scholarship fund for children of seven servicemen killed last year in an attempt to free American hostages in Iran.

Westinghouse agreed to chip in a matching amount, boosting the total contribution to more than $7,000.

The effort was spearheaded by top officers of the three locals—Thomas J. Rostkowski of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers' Local 1805, Kenneth P. Biebel of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers' Local 130 and Gus A. Geppi of the unaffiliated Westinghouse Salaried Employees Association.

Union-Industries Show to Open in Baltimore May 8

The AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show will open May 8 for a six-day run in the Baltimore Convention Center. The show is produced and managed by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Services Trades Dept.

More than 200,000 visitors are expected to attend the free exhibition which is held in a different major city each year, ULSTD Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid said. The show, the 36th staged by the department since 1938, will feature some 300 craft and skill demonstrations and displays prepared by AFL-CIO union members and their employers.

Activities are designed to highlight the skills, services and products union members provide to consumers, McDavid said, pointing out that the show's theme, "Progress through Cooperation," sums up "the advantages to workers, employers and the public of the collective bargaining process."

More than $100,000 in gifts and free samples will be given away during the show, McDavid said. The prizes will range from food products to appliances, boats, television sets and musical instruments.

For the first time, a meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council will be scheduled in conjunction with the show. The council will meet in Baltimore May 7 and 8. Also, the AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurers' Conference will meet May 11 and 12 in Baltimore during the show.

Unions Rally Wide Support For Striking NABET Local

New York—A small local of the Broadcast Engineers & Technicians is getting a big boost from organized labor in its bitter dispute with radio station WMCA here.

Of the 13 original producers and telephone screeners who struck the station last Nov. 24, only one remains today. Those now on strike are the third group of workers since NABET Local 11 was certified as bargaining agent over three years ago.

"THROUGH FIRINGS, layoffs, harassment and coercion, the company has been successful in forcing a heavy turnover of personnel," Strike Coordinator Arthur Kent declared. Kent said the strike was touched off by station owner R. Peter Straus's insistence on "union-busting" clauses in the initial contract between the union and the station.

The Conference of Motion Picture & Television Unions—a group of 18 unions in the entertainment industry—has come out strongly in support of the NABET strikers and has urged Straus "to consider the effect of the anti-labor image of WMCA from this strike and take the required steps to begin bargaining in good faith to resolve this grevious matter."

Since the strike began, several program sponsors have stopped using WMCA for commercial messages.

OTHER SUPPORT has come from the Communications Workers, the Newsday unit of the Newspaper Guild, the New York City Central Labor Council, and the Teamsters.

In addition, media luminaries such as ABC-TV's Barbara Walters have refused to appear on the station's talk shows. WMCA is a seven-day, 24-hour all-talk station owned by Straus Communications, Inc. Board Chairman Straus is former head of the International Communication Agency's Voice of America (VOA).

Kent said he finds it ironic that Straus has refused to grant his employees the same rights that the VOA urges upon governments behind the Iron Curtain.

"THE MAIN ISSUES that caused the strike are basic union security clauses that are in all union contracts in the broadcast industry," Kent observed. He charged that Straus is holding out for contract provisions that would permit subcontracting of union-covered work, eliminate the union's right to arbitrate discharges, and cut out seniority rights.

"He just doesn't want the union in there," Kent declared.

The workers, who make guest-bookings, handle other program arrangements, and screen incoming phone calls, are grossly underpaid, Kent charged. The highest-paid WMCA producer makes only $210 for a $40-hour week, while other employees earn as little as $150. One-third of the workers are blacks and Hispanics. Compensation in other NABET units ranges from $350 to $490 for comparable classifications, Kent said.

The National Labor Relations Board found the station guilty of unfair labor practices when Straus withdrew recognition from the union and refused to bargain. The ruling was uphelid by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, but the employer has not gone beyond "surface bargaining" with NABET's negotiators.

Gleason Tells Senate Panel Of ILA's Accomplishments

The International Longshoremen's Association is a democratic trade union that has achieved landmark gains for its members and has cooperated fully in government investigations, ILA President Thomas W. Gleason testified at Senate hearings.

Gleason told the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations that he welcomed the opportunity to testify because "outrageous statements" seeking to link the ILA to organized crime "should not be permitted to go unchallenged."

THE ILA PRESIDENT, who is 80, told the panel how he went to work on the West Side piers in New York at the age of 15 for 10 cents an hour, how he joined the ILA at the age of 19, and was blacklisted in 1932 for his union organizing activities. He moved up through the ranks to become president in 1963, he testified.

Gleason denied "emphatically, categorically and without any reservation whatever," allegations that the ILA is dominated by organized crime figures.

As to his election to the ILA presidency, Gleason testified: "I neither received my office nor do I maintain my office by any means but through election by the rank and file of the union."

Gleason recited with pride the ILA's pioneering achievement in negotiating a guaranteed annual income program, establishing a comprehensive health care program and network of clinics, a well-funded pension program, and achieving enactment of vital workers' compensation legislation.

THE UNION has eliminated geographical wage differentials, he said, and has obtained "real" civil rights through access of blacks and other minorities "to decent, well-paying, productive jobs."

Where union officials, after due process, have been finally convicted, they are punished according to law, Gleason said. But the union should not be smeared, he urged, by "distortions and half-truths" from "ill-informed and unreliable witnesses" who have testified before the panel.

CONVENTIONS

The Arkansas State AFL-CIO will hold its 1981 convention June 22-24 at Hot Springs.

The Delaware State AFL-CIO will hold its convention Sept. 18-19 at Wilmington.

The Michigan State AFL-CIO will hold its convention Aug. 31-Sept. 3 at Dearborn.

Karl Feller Dies, Led Brewery Union

Cincinnati—Karl F. Feller, director of the Teamsters' Brewery & Soft Drink Conference and a former AFL-CIO vice president, died Feb. 5 of lung cancer. He was 66.

Feller became president of the Brewery Workers in 1949 when it was an affiliate of the CIO. Earlier, he had been a local president and business agent in Dayton, Ohio, as well as international organizer and secretary.

He was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1957 and served as a federation vice president until the Brewery Workers were merged into the Teamsters and the union's affiliation with the federation was terminated in 1973.

Twenty-two locals, representing about one-fourth of the union's 40,000 members, rejected the merger plan and were chartered by the AFL-CIO as directly affiliated locals.

Economic Trend Indicators Down For 2nd Month

The government's index of leading economic indicators fell four-tenths of 1 percent in January, the second straight month of decline in this barometer of future trends in the economy.

The decline, which followed a drop of nine-tenths of 1 percent in December, was too small to prove that the economy is about to head into a downturn, however. Felix Tamm, a Commerce Dept. economist who specializes in the leading indicators, said the back-to-back decreases are "disturbing in a general way" but "definitely inconclusive."

Eight of the 10 indicators available for January moved adversely, with the greatest decline reflected in one of the indicators most sensitive to future economic activity —crude materials prices.

Other negative indicators were the layoff rate, new orders, the number of companies receiving slower deliveries, contracts and orders for plant and equipment, stock prices, and the money supply.

The two indicators that gave off positive signs were the average workweek and the change in total liquid assets.

Labor-Industry Panel To Resume Dialogue

business and labor communities to broaden its knowledge of issues, to improve the overall labor-management climate, and to communicate the results of its deliberations to its respective associates."

BESIDES KIRKLAND, the group's labor members include AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Iron Workers President John H. Lyons, Plumbers & Pipefitters President Martin J. Ward, Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, and President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers. Other union leaders are expected to join the panel soon.

Management members include Chairman James H. Evans of the Union Pacific Corp.; President Philip M. Hawley of Carter, Hawley, Hale Stores, Inc.; Chairman Ruben F. Mettler of TRW, Inc.; President George B. Shultz of the Bechtel Group, Inc., the former Secretary of the Treasury and director of the Office of Management & Budget; General Motors Chairman Roger B. Smith; Chairman-elect John F. Welch of the General Electric Co., and CitiCorp Chairman Walter B. Wriston.

THE PANEL has its antecedents in a formal advisory group established in January 1973 to consult with then-Treasury Sec. Shultz and Dunlop, who was chairman of the government's Cost of Living Council at the time. Since then, the committee has re-emerged in basically the same shape under the Ford and Carter Administrations, but for its status. From early 1976 through 1978, it was a private organization with no ties to the government, which is the character of the new group.

An effort to reconstitute the unit began about a year ago. Kirkland attributed its successful revival in large part to the commitment shown to it by two management members of the most recently dissolved group, Irving Shapiro and Reginald Jones, chief executive officers of DuPont and General Electric, respectively, who retire this year.

Kirkland told reporters that he expects the new group to invite individuals from government and academic circles from time to time to share their views on issues, but stressed the committee's non-governmental charter. Predecessor groups delved into international trade, inflation, housing, escalating medical care costs, illegal aliens, taxes, and other issues.

THE PROCESS of joint exploration of these issues served to "sharpen our thinking and increase our understanding of the problems," Kirkland observed.

Garvin, expressing broad support for the joint panel from the business community, embraced Kirkland's remarks, adding: "The idea of a constant kind of dialogue makes sense. The fact that this group worked so well in the past is a sign that we ought to continue it."

The statement of purpose, unanimously agreed to by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its winter meeting last month, recognized that the complexity of issues confronting the nation may not permit a group consensus on all matters, but where the parties differ they agree to respect each other's views.

"THE NATIONAL interest requires a new spirit of mutual trust and cooperation, even though management and organized labor are, and will remain, adversaries on many issues," the two sides agreed in their statement.

A JOINT LABOR-MANAGEMENT panel independent of government will seek consensus solutions to major economic problems confronting the nation, the group's principal officers said at a press conference to announce its formation. From left, they are Clifton C. Garvin, Jr., chairman of the Exxon Corp.; former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. Dunlop is coordinator of the group.

Democrats Elect Unionists to Key Committee Posts

Labor's representation on the Democratic National Committee was expanded with an increase of both at-large and DNC executive committee members from union ranks.

Fifteen of the 25 at-large members elected at the DNC's two-day meeting in Washington are union representatives. Thirteen of the 15 are from AFL-CIO affiliates.

OVERALL, labor increased the number of its DNC at-large members from 10 to 15 and expanded its representation on the 33-seat executive committee from three to five.

Labor representatives elected to the executive committee are Glenn Watts, president of the Communications Workers; Leon Lynch, vice president of the Steelworkers; Rachelle Horowitz, political director of the Teachers, and Sam Fishman and Bruce Lee of the Auto Workers.

The 15 labor at-large members, in addition to Watts, Lynch and Horowitz, are J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers; William W. Winpisinger, president of the Machinists; Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employees; Jack Otero, vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks; Evelyn Dubrow, vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers; Addie Wyatt, vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers.

ALSO, William C. Marshall, president of the Michigan AFL-CIO; Elizabeth Smith, legislative and political education director of the Clothing & Textile Workers; Florine Koole, an executive assistant on the CWA staff; Frances Martinez Bussie of the Louisiana AFL-CIO staff; Ray Majerus, UAW secretary-treasurer, and Marc Stepp, UAW vice president.

All 15 were on the at-large slate of Charles T. Manatt, who was elected DNC chairman.

Idaho, Montana Legislators Reject 'Right-to-Work' Bills

were led by the state central bodies to persuade local legislators to reject the union-busting proposals.

Idaho AFL-CIO President Robert Kinghorn credited the victory to the response of the state's 40,000 union members to the federation's calls for constituent action. A series of meetings conducted by the State AFL-CIO in January prepared union members to respond and generated a "record-breaking" volume of mail, telephone calls and personal visits to legislators asking them to oppose the bill, Kinghorn said.

More than 5,000 union members turned out for the Idaho House State Affairs Committee's Feb. 13 hearings to voice their opposition to the bill.

IN HIS OWN testimony, Kinghorn branded the so-called freedom-to-work bill a misnomer which guaranteed no one the freedom or the right to a job. The only purpose of such bills, Kinghorn said, "is plain and simple. To bust or weaken unions."

Kinghorn emphasized that "right-to-work" bills are supported mainly by such National Right to Work Committee, the employer-dominated organizations as the Chamber of Commerce, and by small business and agricultural associations who see such measures as a way to fatten profits by weakening labor's effectiveness.

AN EARLIER "right-to-work" proposal was defeated in Idaho in 1977 when the state senate insisted on adding an amendment unpalatable to the house. The labor-supported amendment would have given farmers and ranchers the right to refuse to pay assessments for services levied by the state's commodities commissions.

The Montana bill, introduced by "right-to-work" advocates, would have repealed the state's agency shop law governing public workers to substitute conflicting rules on public employees' rights to join or not join unions. Adequate laws already exist to protect those rights, unions pointed out.

The state federation led nearly 200 opponents of the measure into the committee's hearings on the bill at which some 40 witnesses testified against it. The bill was defended only by its sponsor, Republican James Burnett and two officers of Montana Citizens for Right to Work, Inc.

THE STATE AFL-CIO was joined in the fight to kill the bill by a coalition of public employee associations, public interest groups, the unaffiliated Teamsters, the state Democratic Party and representatives of the governor's office, State AFL-CIO Executive Sec. James Murry reported.

Murry told the legislators the bill was "just the opening salvo in the battle for 'right to work' in Montana." Such measures are "out of the mainstream" of both major political parties, Murray reminded the legislators, pointing out that the anti-public employee bill "is an example of the anti-union philosophy that is pervasive throughout the Northwest."

Other opponents of the bill cited figures showing that Montana workers are better-paid than workers in states where compulsory open shop laws are on the books, and public employee union representatives called a part of the bill which would have permitted different wage rates for union members and non-union workers "ridiculous."

NO PUBLIC employer representatives came forward to defend the bill, and a representative of Gov. Ted Schwinden, a Democrat, testified that the executive branch was opposed to the measure "on principle."

A motion to table the bill in committee was defeated by a 9 to 8 vote, Murry said, with the majority arguing that Montana house members should be clearly on record against such legislation.

Labor Protests Curtailment Of Trade Adjustment Benefits

forced to take the lesser state jobless benefits for a shorter term, she observed.

UNDER THIS program, an unemployed worker in Michigan could only collect a maximum of $136 a week for 26 weeks, based on last year's compensation rate. In Texas, the worker would receive only $120 per week, and in Georgia even less—$90 per week.

Rather than curtailing the program, it should be expanded, Jager stressed. She noted that the Labor Dept. since April 1975 has certified more than 900,000 workers eligible for assistance in almost every state and major industry.

But many more workers have been denied benefits, because the law narrowly excludes laid-off workers who make components and provide related services for the industries directly affected by imports, Jager told the subcommittee.

ON THAT basis, she observed, a car dealer would not qualify for assistance, neither would a driver for a firm that delivered the cars. And although a worker producing bumpers at one of the Big Three auto makers could qualify for assistance, a worker at an independent bumper company could not, unless the bumpers were imported separately.

"The AFL-CIO believes that trade adjustment assistance should be an integral part of an overall U.S. trade policy," Jager said, adding that the sharp increase in international trade requires some additions to be made to the federal budget.

Thus current proposals to cut the program "are a giant step in the wrong direction," she stressed.

LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR John J. Sheehan of the Steelworkers said in testimony to the panel that the program should not be slashed simply because its costs have increased sharply with the surge in auto imports.

"It is a program which has provided hundreds of thousands of workers laid off because of imports the ability to readjust, and one which warrants expansion of coverage to workers who supply essential parts and services," Sheehan declared.

Fourth-Quarter Output Shows 4 Percent Rise

The Commerce Dept. issued revised figures showing that the nation's economic output in the final quarter of 1980 increased at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 4 percent, a decrease of 1 percentage point from the original estimate.

The 4-percent annual rate of rise in "real" gross national product, the value of all goods and services produced, adjusted for inflation—compared with a 2.4-percent annual increase in last year's third quarter. The economy declined at a 9.9 percent annual rate in the second quarter.

Conferences Aim at Sharpening Labor's Tools

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI Saturday, March 14, 1981 No. 11

By Rex Hardesty

A determination that the AFL-CIO will sharpen "every tool we can lay our hands on to pursue traditional union goals" was spelled out by President Lane Kirkland at the launching of the federation's new series of regional conferences.

The first two conferences of the series drew 420 delegates from eight states to the meeting in Philadelphia and 357 from eight states to Boston. In each case, registration overflow forced the splitting of a delegation to keep the conference room attendance small enough to facilitate discussion.

"WE ARE PREPARED to use new methods, different techniques, and better ways to reach our goals," Kirkland said in Boston. "It is our job to enhance the well-being of our members through any educational, political, legislative, or community activities that can advance the cause of workers."

The conferences reflect that range of activities.

In addition to Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, presentations are made by AFL-CIO department directors in charge of organization, legislation, COPE and legal affairs on the first day. In the closing half day, conference delegates select their choice of sessions on OSHA, education, research, community services, civil rights, communications, social security and support groups with each delegate able to choose two.

THE CONFERENCES are the first of their type ever held by the AFL-CIO. They were announced by Kirkland in early 1981 as a time "to renew the roots of our movement" through an emphasis on an interchange of views among state, local and national officials, rather than formal speeches.

"Our agenda is not rigid," Kirkland said in Philadelphia, "but we do want to encourage maximum discussion. Therefore speechmanking will be held to a minimum."

The next conference opens Mar. 19 in Chicago for the states of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota. The final four will follow in San Francisco,

LABOR STANDS TOGETHER in the fight to save benefits for black lung victims and their families, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told 6,000 Mine Workers at a rally to protest Administration plans to slash funding for the program. Kirkland joined the march and rally at the invitation of UMW President Sam Church, Jr., right. UMW District 4 President Walter Suba is at left.

Federation Rallies Support to Miners On Black Lung Aid

By Susan Dunlop

The AFL-CIO has linked arms with the United Mine Workers to fight stiff cuts in federal funding for black lung benefit programs proposed by the Reagan Administration.

Federation President Lane Kirkland joined UMW President Sam Church, Jr., at the head of an estimated 6,000 Mine Workers in a march around the White House to protest the Administration's plan to cut some $387 million in black lung funding.

KIRKLAND joined the march as it made a symbolic stop at AFL-CIO headquarters with members of the Executive Council, heads of the federation's constitutional departments, union staff representatives and members.

The AFL-CIO and the UMW action reflected the solidarity of the recently formed budget coalition of 157 organizations in opposing cuts in the federal budget that could destroy social and economic programs, including those to aid black lung victims.

AT A RALLY following the march, Kirkland told the demonstrators that "your brothers and sisters in the AFL-CIO are with you on this issue all the way. Those who would deprive miners of these benefits would stop at nothing."

Kirkland urged the miners to support efforts to save other vital programs as well, pointing out that "this is an important fight, and it is only the first of many fights trade union members will be in to defend the rights of working people."

The Mine Workers' demonstration was part of a two-day "memorial period" for black lung victims during which all union miners were urged to remain off the job. The work stoppage was permitted under the terms of the 170,000-member union's contract which allows up to 10 days a year off for protests on safety issues.

THE MARCH followed a series of speeches by UMW officers and elected officials from coal-producing states at a rally at the union's Washington headquarters.

The UMW reported that demonstrators from every coal state traveled to Washington for the march, including some from as far away as Utah and Wyoming. The UMW march was the first such large-scale, vocal demonstration staged to protest any of the Reagan budget cuts.

Some 50 students from the Seafarers' Harry Lundeberg School in Piney Point, Md., made the trip to join the demonstration which included a number of black lung victims.

The Administration's proposals include a sharp retrenchment in the program that now pays benefits to about 80,850 black lung victims and their dependents. This would be accomplished through more stringent eligibility requirements and an end to federal assistance to the black lung trust fund.

CONGRESS established the black lung aid programs as part of the Coal Mine Health & Safety Act of 1969 and set up the trust fund in 1977. The fund, which is supposed to be financed by a tax on coal sold by producers, has come under the most direct attack by the Administration which claims that the industry, not the federal budget, should keep it solvent.

Reagan Deepens Slash In Jobs, Social Programs

By James M. Shevis

President Reagan sent Congress a revised fiscal blueprint for the nation next year that would make even deeper cuts in worker protections and social programs than he had originally proposed.

Calling for "dramatic change" to break up the pattern of economic stagnation and high inflation, Reagan asked Congress for quick approval of an updated fiscal 1982 budget that would reduce spending by $48.6 billion from the level proposed by the Carter Administration in January.

THE PLANNED spending cuts, which reflect Reagan's conservative political philosophy, would be coupled with a three-year, 10-percent annual reduction in personal income taxes and faster depreciation write-offs for new business investments. The budget cuts, which are central to Reagan's plan to balance the budget by 1984, would hit particularly hard at regulatory agencies.

At a hearing before the House Budget Committee last week, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assailed the Reagan program as unfair to workers and the needy. He accused the Administration of "gambling with the well-being of those who can ill afford to gamble in order to provide a sure winner for the wealthy who are not asked to take any of the risk."

"THE BUDGET CUTS, tax cuts, regulatory cuts, and money supply cuts add up to more inflation and more unemployment," Kirkland warned. "The measures advocated by the Administration are inequitable, unfair, and shortsighted."

The new $695.3 billion budget for the spending year that starts Oct. 1 contains sweeping reductions in outlays for jobs and welfare programs, energy, education, agriculture, federal loans, and other civilian programs.

Reagan also proposed a national "workfare" program similar to a three-year experiment that he presided over as governor of California. The plan would require welfare recipients to accept non-paying community service jobs if they were unable to find paying jobs or job-training on their own.

Auto Workers' Board Endorses Reaffiliation

Detroit—The executive board of the Auto Workers has unanimously endorsed reaffiliation with the AFL-CIO, and UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said the union will convene special regional conventions this spring to vote on the issue.

The UAW left the federation in 1968. But in recent years it has worked closely with the AFL-CIO and its affiliates on legislation, political action and other common concerns.

FRASER TOLD reporters, "I think it is time to unify. It is time for solidarity."

Delegates to the UAW's most recent triennial convention, last June, will vote on a resolution empowering the executive board to take final action on reaffiliation. To save costs of bringing the nearly 3,000 delegates from U.S. locals to a single location, the votes will be held at regional

Labor Cites Heavy Costs Of Jobless Benefit Cutback

Administration proposals to cut back unemployment insurance protection for workers and reduce public assistance for the needy carry a price tag of human suffering that far exceeds any budget savings, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified.

Seidman and other labor witnesses before a House Ways & Means subcommittee warned that the programs President Reagan is seeking to cut are the true "safety net" against unemployment and poverty.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT insurance proposals to which the AFL-CIO strongly dissented would:

- Cut back the extended benefits program for the long-term unemployed—on top of the cuts Congress imposed last year. Reagan's proposals would eliminate the present provision for a nationwide program of 13 weeks of extended benefits during periods of high unemployment. And the insured unemployment rate in a state would have to be substantially higher than at present to "trigger on" extended benefits. But another proposed change would "trigger off" a state program months sooner than under present law.
- Require persons receiving unemployment insurance, after 13 weeks of joblessness, to accept any job paying as much as the unemployment benefit so long as it was not less than the federal minimum wage. States now have flexibility to set suitability standards that take

AFL-CIO Kicks Off Regional Sessions

REGIONAL CONFERENCE workshop program is launched in Philadelphia with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue fielding questions from participants. The series of seven regional conferences is designed to produce a free flow of ideas, opinions and evaluations of labor programs at all levels of the federation.

Conference Series Focuses On Improving Techniques

Denver, Atlanta, and New Orleans with the states attending roughly following the format of the AFL-CIO seven regional offices.

"We heard you," Donahue said in his summing up session at the end of the workshops. "We heard you on the topic of your getting 10 different requests to do eight things in a differing range of priorities."

"AND WE HEARD you on such topics as affiliation, on jurisdiction and organization and on your problems with working with coalitions in your community," Donahue said. "We heard you on a whole range of frustrations which stem from the fact our democratic union structure is not neat, tidy and easy to execute in. We are glad to take your message back and act on it."

Various state delegations to the first two regional conferences were made up primarily of representatives of state AFL-CIO and local central bodies, along with a sprinkling of delegates from international unions. Kirkland addressed those distinctions in his opening remarks.

"Most of you are decision-makers in your own organizations," Kirkland said. "Your actions percolate up from the local, state or regional level to your national and international unions, and from there to the federation."

BUT THE LOCAL and state AFL-CIO structure "is the vehicle through which we percolate out—translating policies into action, pursuing effective programs and reaching out to our natural allies."

One current priority, Kirkland emphasized in both cities, is to protect workers against federal budget cuts that are "simply the wrong medicine, applied at the wrong time and in the wrong manner."

Kirkland said in response to reporters' questions in Boston that President Reagan had "no mandate" to cut trade adjustment assistance and unemployment compensation "unless he campaigned on that issue in Michigan, Illinois and Ohio."

Similarly, he said Reagan had "no mandate" to slash social security and black lung benefits unless he campaigned on those issues in Florida and West Virginia, respectively.

"I'M NOT comforted by the President's assurance that his budget cuts will not hurt 'truly deserving needy,'" Kirkland said. "But if such distinctions are to be made among the poor, why not apply them as well to corporations? What sense does it make to say that McDonald's should receive equal treatment with an electronics plant or a devastated apparel industry?"

Kirkland told reporters in Boston the AFL-CIO could not set priorities on the budget fight, because workers are affected by such a wide variety of programs.

And Kirkland reminded delegates that any study of labor in its centennial year would show that "the American labor movement must take on this fight" over the budget. "We are not about to lose our nerve now, or scuttle our convictions."

AS AN EXAMPLE of such historic fights—and the variety of "tools" to be sharpened by the regional conferences—Kirkland traced the labor quest for a shorter workday.

"In 1884, the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions was only three years old when it issued the call for the eight-hour day," and the struggle evolved through strikes and efforts in the 1880s and again just after World War I.

"But the issue wasn't resolved until the 1938 enactment of the original federal minimum wage law which made the employer pay a premium for overtime. Collective bargaining couldn't do it alone; no one strike did it, and the legislation didn't just happened.

"It took a combination, once again of every tool we could lay our hands on," Kirkland said.

IN RECOUNTING the "message we heard" from the workshop session, Donahue listed coordinated approaches to both organizing and bargaining on which the federation would be able to help.

"And we heard your concerns about technical help on state legislative matters, on ways to counter the union-busting consultants and other interference by employers in representation elections," he said.

Donahue also said that over a longer period of time, all units of organized labor would be continuing to "monitor the performance of elected officials on how they voted after we broke our picks working to elect them."

Industry Pressure Delays Lead Exposure Safeguard

A key safeguard designed to protect workers from lead poisoning has been postponed for 31 days by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration while it considers a lead industry petition for a one-year delay of the regulation.

OSHA pushed back until Apr. 1, the effective date of the medical removal provision in the federal lead exposure standard which requires employers to take workers off the job when lead in their blood reaches a specified "trigger level." The removal or transfer to a less hazardous job must be made without loss of pay, seniority or other benefits to the worker.

THE NEW TRIGGER level that was scheduled to take effect Mar. 1 would have required the removal of workers whose blood lead level reached 60 micrograms of lead per 100 grams of blood. The workers could return to the job when their blood lead level dropped to 40 micrograms.

During the postponement, the trigger level that has been in effect since March 1980 must be observed, OSHA said. It requires employers to remove workers when blood levels reach 70 micrograms and allows them return to the job when the levels drop to 50 micrograms.

The lead industry has been fighting the implementation of the lead standard since it was issued in November 1978.

LAST DECEMBER, the Supreme Court stayed a section of the standard requiring the industry to reduce worker exposure to lead through the installation of engineering controls. But the high court refused to stay the medical removal provision.

Lead poisoning, resulting from excessive exposure to the metal, can cause anemia, kidney failure, brain and nervous system damage, as well as death. The Labor Dept. estimates that more than 800,000 workers in 40 industries are exposed to lead on the job.

In filing for the one-year delay, industry contended that the lower trigger level would cut into productivity by requiring employers to remove skilled workers who could not be easily replaced.

THE STEELWORKERS, one of several unions challenging the Lead Industries Association's petition, questioned the timing of the application, coming just six days before the provision was to take effect, even though industry was aware of the regulation for more than two years.

The USWA also pointed out that industry provided no evidence in its petition to justify one-year delay in the provision.

2-Earner Families Greatest Losers In Buying Power

Families in which both husband and wife worked suffered a sharper drop in purchasing power in 1980 than individual workers, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Household survey data released by the BLS showed that real earnings—wages adjusted for inflation—of individuals who worked full time fell 2.7 percent in the year ended with the fourth quarter of 1980, about the same as the 3 percent decline for the year ended with the third quarter.

In families where husband and wife were earners, real earnings over the same period—fourth quarter to fourth quarter—fell 3.8 percent.

THE BLS SAID that before adjustments for inflation, median weekly earnings of individuals employed full time rose 9.5 percent for the year, from $253 to $277. For the husband-wife couple, the weekly income increased 9.2 percent, from $494 to $539.

For all families, the median wage and salary earnings rose only 6.8 percent, from $388 to $415 a week, because some workers lost their jobs and others were cut back to part-time work. Over the year ended with the fourth quarter, consumer prices increased 12.5 percent.

Reflecting the effects of the economic slowdown last year, the number of married-couple families with two or more bread-winners dropped by about 600,000 from the fourth quarter of 1979 to the fourth quarter of 1980. Most of this decline occurred among families in which both the husband and wife had previously been working, the BLS said.

meetings and will then be tallied together.

Dates and locations are still being worked out but, Fraser said he expects the vote tally to be completed before May 1.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told reporters at the federation's recent Executive Council session that the AFL-CIO has invited reaffiliation of the UAW and has had discussions with both the UAW and the Teamsters. The last AFL-CIO convention directed the Executive Council "to give prompt consideration" to any request for affiliation.

The UAW has some 1.2 million members in the United States who would be included in the AFL-CIO if reaffiliation took place.

Senate Asked to Tighten Auto Quota Bill

Legislation to curb automobile imports from Japan is urgently needed and a bipartisan bill being considered by a Senate Finance subcommittee should be passed with strengthening amendments, the AFL-CIO testified.

The bill, introduced by Subcommittee Chairman John C. Danforth (R-Mo.) and Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.), would set a quota of 1.6 million Japanese auto imports a year for the next three years. The figure is the average of auto imports from Japan for 1978 and 1979, and is about 300,000 below 1980 imports.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE Rep. Stephen Koplan urged a lower quota—a limit of 1.2 million imports a year, which reflects the annual average of the 1975-79 period.

Action has been too long delayed, he stressed. And "workers who need jobs have paid too much of the price for this failure to act." Koplan noted that earlier this month, in Toledo, Ohio, 5,000 unemployed workers lined up for 90 jobs in an auto battery plant.

Koplan reminded the Senate panel that the glut of imports and the cutbacks in U.S. auto production go far beyond auto assembly plants. "Two out of every three jobs in the industry have been held by workers who make machinery, steel, aluminum, glass, electronics, rubber, plastics and other products which are assembled into automobiles," he testified.

The AFL-CIO endorsed a proposal by the Auto Workers to allow an exemption from the quota for Japanese automobiles containing a designated percentage of domestic content, such as engines and other production parts. The domestic content requirement could be phased in, Koplan suggested, to reach 75 percent by 1983.

HE URGED the committee also to consider limitations on imports of auto parts to complete the process of turning international trade back into a two-way street.

"The United States is the most open large market," Koplan said. Other nations are enlarging their content requirements, he noted, and their laws encourage U.S. firms to manufacture abroad and export to the United States. The lack of any counter-pressure by the United States through import quotas, high tariffs or high content requirements "can mean the death of a viable U.S. auto industry," Koplan warned.

Pay Act Saved In Arkansas, Killed in Utah

Arkansas labor staved off an attempt to repeal the state's prevailing wage laws when testimony by the State AFL-CIO and building trades workers convinced the state's house to refer the bill to a committee for two years of study.

In Utah, however, non-union contractors were able to rally enough support in the state's house and senate to push through a bill overriding the governor's veto of a repeal measure.

BACKED BY some 3,000 union members to attended committee hearings on the Arkansas measure, State AFL-CIO President Bill Becker called the "little Davis-Bacon" law essential to prevent bidding wars between contractors from undermining wage levels on projects financed by state and local governments and school districts.

Wage cutting means bringing in unskilled workers, Becker told the legislators, adding that "the old adage that you get what you pay for is still true in the construction business."

Dewey Stiles, chairman of the state federation's legislative committee, called the bill little more than a "smoke screen" to cut the income of construction workers.

The house public welfare, health and labor committee voted 12 to 4 to recommend that the bill be referred to an interim committee, an action expected to bury it for the remainder of the state's legislative session.

IN UTAH, even a massive rally by union members was not enough to beat back overwhelming Republican majorities in both legislative houses. They voted to override Democratic Gov. Scott Matheson's Mar. 2 veto of a bill repealing the state's prevailing wage statute. The votes were 50-24 in the house and 21-7 in the senate. The repeal bill was backed by the Utah Associated Builders & Contractors.

Utah Building Trades Sec.-Treas. Steve Richins, although disappointed by the setback, said the repeal might be a blessing in disguise" for Utah labor as a rallying point for future political action, including "targeting some of the masterminds behind this repeal scheme in the next election."

STRONG CASE AGAINST repeal of Arkansas's prevailing wage law was made in testimony to the legislature by State AFL-CIO President J. Bill Becker and President Joe Woodson, right, of the State Building & Construction Trades Council. A House labor committee voted 12 to 4 to shelve the anti-worker measure.

Court Clarifies Job Bias Test Under Rights Act

The Supreme Court clarified but did not change the legal test for determining whether an employer has been guilty of race or sex discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

The court ruled unanimously that the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was wrong when it imposed a heavy burden of proof on the employer to demonstrate that a personnel action was not a violation of Title VII. In the case at hand, the Supreme Court said, the appellate court "also erred" in requiring the employer "to prove by objective evidence that the person hired was more qualified."

THE SUPREME COURT noted that Title VII prohibits discrimination, but does not require an employer to "give preferential treatment of minorities or women" or to hire a minority or female applicant over a white male applicant with equal qualifications.

The employer remains free to choose among equally qualified job candidates, the court said, provided the decision isn't based on "unlawful criteria" of race, sex, national origin or religion.

In the particular case, it said the employer had adequately met the test of "articulating" a non-discriminatory reason for the personnel action that dispelled any assumption of illegal discrimination. Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., wrote the decision for the Supreme Court.

Reagan Budget Would Deepen Cuts In Job Protection, Social Programs

The major features of the plan were contained in the President's Feb. 18 address to Congress and budget outline calling for 83 major cuts resulting in $34.8 billion savings for 1982. In budget revisions forwarded to Capitol Hill on Mar. 10, additional cuts totaling $13.8 billion in 200 federal agencies and programs were unveiled.

The revisions also seek $6.4 billion in cuts during the current fiscal year, $2 billion more than the President had sought last month. The Reagan Administration proposed outlays of $655.2 billion with receipts anticipated at $600.3 billion this year.

In a message accompanying the revisions, Reagan said that even with the budget cuts planned outlays in the 1982 fiscal year represent a 6.1 percent increase in spending over 1981, or about one-half the 11.6 percent rise President Carter proposed.

HE SAID he would recommend further cuts if necessary to reach his spending target, insisting that his election was "a mandate for change."

Reagan said his plan relies on "the private sector, rather than the federal government, as the fundamental source of economic motivation and growth," and would shift responsibility to states and cities in areas of public services where he said the federal government has become "excessively or improperly involved."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting charged that Reagan's program would "substitute unrestrained market power for social responsibility and human concerns." If Congress goes along with the proposed cuts, more than a million jobs will be sacrificed, the council warned.

THE MAR. 10 budget revisions included new cuts in eight spending areas—veterans' benefits, manpower training, subsidies for merchant marine shipbuilding programs, water development projects, small business loans, public health services, railroad employees' pensions, and mortgage underwriting.

More than 300,000 public service jobs funded under Comprehensive Employment & Training Act programs would be eliminated by Sept. 30, for a slash of $600 million this year and $3.6 billion in 1982. Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan has already imposed a freeze on any new hiring in the CETA jobs program this year.

THE ADMINISTRATION also called for the elimination of the Youth Conservation Corps, and achieving further savings by consolidating other programs. Another cut would end Labor Dept. participation in state employment service operations that help unemployed workers find jobs.

Reagan also plans to propose legislation to end the national trigger for extended unemployment insurance benefits beyond the 26 weeks' coverage provided by basic state programs and make it harder to "trigger on" the state programs for extended benefits.

Other cuts proposed in the Mar. 10 message include:

- An overall reduction of about $700 million for veterans' programs in 1982. This would include canceling and delaying several hospital projects.
- Elimination of medical care for merchant seamen and the closing of the remaining eight Public Health Service hospitals and 29 clinics now providing this service.
- A $700-million cut from the Health & Human Services Dept. budget, including elimination of the $255 lump-sum social security death benefit if a beneficiary dies without a spouse or children. Congress rejected President Carter's 1979 proposal to end the lump-sum payment outright.
- Food stamp reductions of $2.3 billion through more stringent eligibility requirements and $900 million more by converting food stamps for Puerto Rico into a block grant.
- $700 million in nutrition programs for children and pregnant women.
- Termination of the Government National Mortgage Association tandem mortgage purchase plan for the Housing & Urban Development Dept.'s Section 8 program for low-income citizens after 1982.
- Cuts in the black lung disability trust fund, restricting benefits to those who are "truly" disabled by black lung disease. The objective is to "eliminate questionable claims," the Administration observed.
- $2.8 billion in "miscellaneous" cuts ranging from reduced subsidies for shipbuilding to decreases in the student loan program.

Other spending reductions affect nearly every branch of government, but hit hardest at aid programs for consumers, the poor, the jobless, and even those with jobs.

AFL-CIO Stands by Miners In Black Lung Benefit Fight

The Mine Workers point out that the industry has resisted its financing role in the fund and that federal support is essential to aid victims of the crippling disease.

"These are people who proclaim from the highest corporation or government heights," Church told the demonstrators, "that safety regulations in our nation's mines, and for that matter in every other workplace, are too stringent, too expensive, too restrictive and too much of a burden on business."

CHURCH CALLED these claims "attacks by people who will never suffer from breathing-in the air-conditioned air in their plush offices."

The union vigorously rejects an Administration claim that 88 percent of all miners certified as eligible for black lung payments "were either ineligible or could not be proved to have black lung disease." That 88 percent "still can't breathe" the union points out, charging that "red tape" delays in providing aid to ailing miners are a more appropriate subject for federal attention which has not been investigated by the Administration.

Black lung, the common name for pneumoconiosis, causes severe shortness of breath, excessive coughing, and a daily build-up of suffocating mucus. More than 4,000 mine workers die each year from the effects of breathing in tiny particles of coal dust, the UMW reports.

The union points out that even though Congress widened the eligibility standards for black lung programs in 1977, a victim unable to work may still have to wait months to be certified as eligible for benefits, particularly if a former employer challenges the claim.

MANY OF THOSE expected to be hurt by the proposed cuts are the families of deceased miners who are receiving benefits under a provision in the law that provides payments to dependents of miners presumed to have died from black lung.

Other miners, in spite of having the full symptoms of the disease, could be shut off from aid if laboratory tests and x-rays do not show a sufficient degree of illness.

Such tests have not been shown to be reliable, the UMW says.

A New Spirit of Cooperation

THE UNITED STATES FACES a period in its history when non-inflationary economic growth and full employment are essential to the maintenance of a free and healthy society.

American labor and business see these as necessary mutual goals to provide our society with new and expanded job opportunities, increased living standards, international competitiveness in an interdependent world and the capacity to meet social commitments.

With these objectives in mind, the Labor-Management Group will meet on a voluntary basis to search for solutions to a wide range of issues.

THE PRINCIPAL FOCUS of the Group's discussions will be in the area of economic policy in which its collective experience is widely based. In framing its discussions, the Group is mindful that it is but one of many groups whose opinions may be sought in shaping the nation's policies. The Group's recommendations must consider its obligations to the aspirations of all Americans, including the just demands for equity by minorities, women and those for whom social justice is still a dream.

The national interest requires a new spirit of mutual trust and cooperation, even though management and organized labor are, and will remain, adversaries on many issues.

The uniqueness of America lies in the vitality of its free institutions. Among these, a free labor movement and a free enterprise economy are essential to the achievement of social and political stability and economic prosperity for all. It is destructive to society and to business and organized labor if, in our legitimate adversarial roles, we question the right of our institutions to exist and perform their legitimate functions. In performing these functions, we recognize that both parties must respect deeply held views even when they disagree.

ONE RECOGNITION of the legitimacy of our respective institutions is demonstrated in the process of free collective bargaining. We believe that both the democratic right of employees to determine the issue of representation and the process of collective bargaining must not be threatened by occasions of excessive behavior by employers or unions.

The Group will use the wider relationships its individual members have in the business and labor communities to broaden its knowledge of issues, to improve the overall labor-management climate and to communicate the results of its deliberations to its respective associates.

The complexity of issues suggests the Group may not find complete consensus on all the issues it explores. When it does, it will communicate its views publicly. Otherwise, the participants reserve to themselves the privilege to address issues in their individual capacities.

The Group intends to look closely at the issues it knows best and how they are affected by public policy. These are the issues that grow out of our experiences in industries and localities. Further we intend to explore a wide range of issues with particular emphasis on revitalizing the nation's economic base, rebuilding the private and public infrastructure on which our productive capacity as a nation depends, and stimulating safe and efficient means for meeting the nation's energy needs.

Free Lunching at the Senate

Some Federal Food Subsidies Aren't Limited to 'Truly Needy'

By Gus Tyler

PAULA HAWKINS says that food stamp cheats should be thrown in jail. Her words are not to be ignored because Paula Hawkins is the new senator from Florida who intends to make such jailing mandatory so that no lenient judge may fudge the sentence.

Lest anyone think that this lady is being unduly mean, she makes it clear that her heart is with the truly needy. "The truly greedy," she announces publicly, "is who I'm after, so there'll be money left after to take care of the truly needy."

ALTHOUGH Sen. Hawkins's proposal seems bland enough, compared with the old English practice of hanging children in public square for stealing a cookie, the posh confab at which she proclaimed her righteous purpose, erupted into unexpected unruliness. It all had to do with the food at the luncheon and just who paid for it.

The invited guests at the lunch—mainly lobbyists for agricultural interests—dined on choice beef, fresh asparagus and hot apple pie in the well-adorned surroundings of the Senate dining room. This eating place gets a subsidy from the federal government—in the same way as food stamps represent a subsidy—except that to eat in the Senate quarters you don't have to prove that you are poor.

Despite the subsidy to feed senators, and presumably their guests, somebody still had to pay for the meal. The question was, who?

WITH PAINFUL persistence, CBS correspondent Phil Jones put the query to Sen. Hawkins who, repeatedly and heatedly, said that she was picking up the tab. "I just wrote a check for it," she announced. But pressed further, she blurted: "I haven't got the bill yet."

Hawkins was annoyed that this line of questioning had shifted the focus of the conference from poor cheats to non-poor lobbyists. Their presence once more made the point about welfare for the non-poor.

All the guests proved the falsity of what passes for a truism about "no free lunch." The diners on this occasion were getting a "free lunch," partly at the expense of the U.S. Treasury. What is more, this costless cuisine was not unusual; it is the usual way of life for just about every business executive in America.

On any one day, several million such non-poor eat meals without personal cost: they charge it to the company that, in turn, writes it off as a business expense in reporting income. So Uncle Sam picks up about half the cost.

ON ANY ONE day, the U.S. Treasury must lose in such "free lunches" more than the $2 million that Sen. Hawkins says is presently stolen by food stamp cheats over the course of a year. (That $2 million represents two one-hundredths of 1 percent of all the money that goes for food stamps, which must make that program one of the most honest and efficient in the country.)

Meanwhile Hawkins will pursue her crusade against the "truly greedy."

Poor to Get Poorer If Budget Cuts Prevail

The nation's poor have suffered the consequences of prolonged unemployment and inflation more than any other segment in society. The buying power of public assistance benefits is rapidly deteriorating as inflation in the cost of necessities rises at an even greater rate than overall inflation.

The poor spend over 90 percent of their income on basic necessities. They already live in the cheapest available housing, cut back on fuel and eat the cheapest food.

Nowhere in America does the combination of assistance available from welfare and food stamps equal the poverty level—a level which is widely recognized as outdated and inadequate. The level of living this assistance provides the poor, the vast majority of whom are children, is wretched.

Everyone agrees that when it comes to aiding the poor, work is vastly preferable to welfare. And yet the Administration proposes that both job and training programs be eliminated. Child care programs allowing mothers to seek and maintain jobs would disappear. Medical care, food stamps, energy assistance and child nutrition programs would be drastically cut back. The cumulative effect of these proposed measures would savage the poor, terrorize the elderly and bankrupt the cities.

Kirkland on Reagan Budget

Living Standards on the Line For Workers, Jobless, Poor

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's testimony before the House Budget Committee, Mar. 4, 1981.

WE BELIEVE the federal budget should embody more than programs and policies to achieve broad economic goals of reducing inflation, increasing jobs and restoring health to the nation's productive base. The budget is the document through which the government carries out its constitutional responsibility to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare.

The Reagan Administration's budget undercuts these responsibilities and will not meet its economic goals.

The budget cuts, tax cuts, regulatory cuts and money supply cuts add up to more inflation and more unemployment. The Reagan budget constitutes the most costly roll of the dice ever proposed for this nation by economic policymakers. On the line are the living standards of millions of working Americans, the unemployed and the poor, the opportunity for energy security and the hope of reviving the nation's indutries and cities.

THE ADMINISTRATION is gambling with the well-being of those who can ill afford to gamble in order to provide a sure winner for the wealthy who are not asked to take any of the risk.

The measures advocated by the Administration are inequitable, unfair and short-sighted. They are based on an untested theory, unrealistic projections and questionable logic.

- Budget cuts in income-support programs ignore the harm that befalls millions of Americans and will result in further shrinking purchasing power.
- Budget cuts in alternative energy programs ignore the recently-learned lesson that the nation cannot be dependent upon a single source of energy or a single group of suppliers, be it a cartel of countries or a cartel of businesses.
- Budget cuts in urban development, transportation and essential municipal services ignore their integral role in building the nation's economic competitiveness by providing the base for reindustrialization.
- Tax cuts loaded on the side of the rich ignore the evidence of history that such cuts do not produce the type of investment society needs most and do not trickle surely down to enhance the general welfare.
- Tax cuts for business ignore the fact that not all businesses need or would use the benefits for productive investment in plant and equipment.

THE NATION has an array of vexing economic and social problems, but the Administration budget presents no sound solutions.

Cutting trade adjustment assistance will aggravate the problem of increasing joblessness due to failures in the nation's foreign trade policies.

Capping benefits for Medicaid recipients will not solve the problem of waste caused by an inefficient health care system or correct the fraud perpetrated by health care providers.

Eliminating the minimum social security benefit will further deepen the severe poverty faced by the 85 percent of the recipients of those payments who depend primarily on social security.

Wiping out a series of job and job-training programs for the working poor will result only in a greater number going on welfare.

We do not agree that America's problems are so dire that a new sub-class of citizens must be created—drawing distinctions between the "needy," the "truly deserving" and the "truly deserving needy." Such distinctions are conspicuously absent from the tax program.

WE DO NOT believe that the nation has been too generous in helping the poor, the disadvantaged and the unemployed; we believe the Administration's proposal is too generous in supporting the wealthy and the powerful.

The centerpiece of the Administration's program is the notion that government spending and deficits cause inflation. The evidence does not support this proposition.

It is pure fantasy to believe that the budget cuts are going to reduce tax burdens and improve living standards. In large part, the costs will be shifted to the states and localities forcing increases in regressive sales and property taxes, cutbacks in essential programs and new or increased fees and charges for public facilities and services.

It is simply wrong to develop an entire economic program based on the false premise that budget cuts are needed to finance tax cuts that are an income transfer from those who are less well-off to those who are more well-off. Business and wealthy individuals are not bearing a disproportionately high share of the nation's tax burden. Therefore, we cannot support the size, shape or direction of the Administration's tax proposals.

The facade of equity constructed around a 10-percent across-the-board tax cut obscures the fact that there is no income tax cut for 15 million low-income wage earners, who are paying higher social security taxes and would lose assistance from programs facing the budget cut.

Those in the middle are also short changed.

Indeed, decontrol of oil prices and the resulting gasoline and heating fuel price hikes have already more than wiped out the tax benefits an average worker's family would receive under the Reagan plan.

According to the Administration's own figures, nearly one-third of the $27-billion individual tax cut will go to the wealthiest 5 percent of taxpayers.

The AFL-CIO tax proposal for a 20-percent refundable tax credit for social security payments would be equitable to all and would cost only $18 billion.

Inconsistent Policies

Reagan's Clashing Economics Dim Prospects for Turnaround

THE REAGAN economic plan ties together contradictory policies that will cancel out hopes to spur the economy and curb inflation, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald declared on Labor News Conference.

Massive budget cuts are inconsistent with the Administration's hope to stimulate the economy through tax cuts that heavily favor high-income Americans, Oswald asserted. He pointed out that the actual savings for workers are so small—about $4 a week for a family of four earning $20,000 a year—that the cut will do little to increase consumer spending and encourage increased production.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Oswald pointed out that the Administration's program "encourages continuation of high interest rates and tight-money policies." Those policies may "cost business much more" than the tax cuts and other incentives aimed at increasing industrial investment, he warned.

Oswald scored specific program cuts that will be made "at the expense of those who have little," particularly a 75 percent rollback of benefits for victims of "black lung" disease, the slash of unemployment insurance protection, and severe cuts of trade adjustment assistance for workers who have lost their jobs because of imports.

HE TURNED ASIDE the contention that the labor movement is being "disruptive" by strongly stating its concerns over the Administration's economic programs.

"We don't have a society that walks lock-step in concert with any proposal by any President, no matter how popular he may be in opinion polls," Oswald declared. He said that the labor movement has a "responsibility to spell out its concerns" as Congress evaluates the potential impact of those policies upon the nation.

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN RECENT WEEKS, the American public has been swamped by Reagan Administration propaganda about the alleged need for sharp cutbacks in funding for a broad range of social programs.

But the percentages and the billions of dollars proposed to be cut from this program and that program say little about the human dimensions—how the lives of flesh-and-blood people would be affected.

To learn more about those who would be affected by the Reagan budget and to spotlight their plight, Democratic members of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee invited some folks to Washington for an informal hearing in early March.

THE CITIZENS who spoke at the hearing resembled the people President Reagan had talked about during his campaign—the jobless, the minorities, the middle-income, the hard-working—those whose lives he pledged to improve.

Although there wasn't a trace of self-pity among those who told their story at the forum, each of them might justifiably lay claim to the category of "truly needy" whom the President, in his budget message to Congress, promised not to let slip from society's "safety net." Among them were:

- Thomas Aldridge, an unemployed auto worker from Anderson, Ind., with over 10 years of seniority at a General Motors plant who was laid off nearly 14 months ago. About 2,900 of his fellow workers at the plant are still out of work.

Aldridge has six children living at home, three of them adopted when his sister died eight years ago. He has applied for work at six other GM plants, one of them as far away as Oklahoma, but none was hiring. Although he'd prefer to go back to work at GM to keep his seniority status, he's also been looking for other jobs in Anderson. But other employers consider him and other auto workers a poor risk because they could be called back to the auto plant. "You can't blame them," he said.

HIS VOICE rising, Aldridge told the senators, "I and the hundreds of us still on the street would go to work gladly for less money, but we can't get any offers."

If it weren't for extended unemployment protection and trade adjustment assistance—both of which Reagan proposes to drastically curtail—"I would have lost my house and everything else," said Aldridge.

- Sarah Richardson, 70, who lives with a grandson in rural Buckingham County, Va. She receives a $306 monthly social security pension check. She also gets $80 worth of food stamps each month for herself and her grandson.

THIS WINTER, Mrs. Richardson was able to pay her home heating bill only with the help of the Low-Income Energy Assistance Program. A federally supported health clinic provides medical care at a cost she can afford. If these programs were cut along the lines of the Reagan Administration's request, "I just couldn't make it," Mrs. Richardson said.

- Elinor Nemanich, a schoolteacher from Plainfield, Ill., and a widowed mother, who worries that she won't be able to put her youngest child through college because of the President's proposed cuts in social security survivors' benefits for students in college.

Mrs. Nemanich said her college daughter, now a sophomore, may have to discontinue her studies. "I fail to see how taking away the social security benefits my husband worked for over 30 years is fair," she declared.

The five senators who participated in the forum seemed impressed, even moved at times, by the stories from Middle America.

Said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, ranking minority member on the Labor Committee, "I think we have to be guided by the concepts of economic democracy and social justice when we look at where we're going to cut and not going to cut."

CONFLICTING ECONOMICS espoused by the Reagan Administration will neither spur the nation's economy nor curb inflation, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Frank Swoboda, left, of the Washington Post and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The program, a public affairs production of the AFL-CIO, is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

CONTINUED RELIEF from job-destroying imports is needed for America's shoe industry, labor representatives headed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the International Trade Commission. Labor Cites Job Stake In Pressing Extension Of Shoe Import Curbs

By John R. Oravec

A three-year extension of import relief is needed to help American footwear manufacturers and workers in their struggle for recovery from the onslaught of foreign-made shoes, labor and industry officials told the International Trade Commission.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned in testimony before the ITC that if existing import restraints on nonrubber footwear were removed, the modest gains that the industry has made in recent years would be quickly reversed.

"THE TEMPORARY stability provided by the import relief program would be lost along with considerable time, money and energy invested by footwear manufacturers and workers seeking to revitalize and modernize this essential industry," Kirkland stressed.

The import relief now in effect—based on unanimous findings by the ITC in 1976 and 1977 that the domestic shoe industry was being battered by imports—will expire at the end of June.

The ITC is holding hearings to consider extension of the relief program. The current program covers a marketing agreement with Taiwan and Korea to restrain imports and authorizes presidential action to control footwear imports from other countries.

KIRKLAND NOTED that nearly 100,000 jobs were lost in the U.S. footwear industry largely as a result of flood of imports since 1960. He expressed concern that the remaining 152,000 jobs of U.S. shoe workers and another 75,000 in support industries would be jeopardized if the import flood gates are swung wide open.

"In human terms, jobs in this industry are critical to the financial well-being of many thousands of workers and their families, as well as to the overall health of the economy," he said.

"At a time when national debate is centered on the means to improve the health of the economy, fair, effective action to prevent the further erosion of the domestic industrial base is essential and wise."

ALSO DELIVERING testimony with Kirkland were President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers, President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers and President Fred A. Meister of the American Footwear Industries Association.

Finley told the ITC that while imports from Taiwan and Korea have been regulated by the relief program, footwear imports from other countries — such as Hong Kong, the Philippines and Singapore — have increased sharply.

To stem this surge, Finley said that upon extension of the program, it would be essential for the Reagan Administration to move quickly against the countries that undermine the import relief efforts.

"THE CONTINUED import injury and related loss of jobs in this industry is unacceptable," he declared. If an effective program of relief is implemented for the next three years, he said, "the industry can continue its revitalization efforts, the reduction in our workforce can be halted, and new employment opportunities can be created."

Wynn noted in testimony presented by UFCW Vice President John E. Mara, that 13,000 shoe workers lost their jobs between 1976 and 1979, the year when shoe imports reached a record high of 405 million pairs.

"The job losses and the resultant social and financial problems created by them are not the only cost of unemployment caused by imports," Wynn noted.

"SINCE 1975, when the federal trade adjustment assistance program went into effect, a staggering $64.2 million has been paid to shoe workers who lost their jobs to imports," he said.

"And this sum is only a part of the costs to the U.S. economy, since it does not include the tens of millions of dollars in unemployment insurance and welfare payments which also have been made."

Meister warned that expiration of marketing agreements with Taiwan and Korea could lead to a reduction of some 24,000 more jobs in the U.S. shoe industry and another 12,000 jobs in supplier industries by 1984.

Meister said the termination of import relief would also cause the business community to lose confidence that the nation will be able to solve its economic problems.

AFL-CIO Hits Bill to Scrap Eight-Hour Day Standard

A Senate Labor subcommittee is "moving in the wrong direction" with a bill to abolish the eight-hour day standard on federal contracts, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. John P. Power suggested. But the subcommittee's chairman, Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), made it clear that he considers the business-supported bill just the first step to end "government's burdensome involvement in society."

Nickles, 32, was described in a recent Congressional Quarterly profile as "at the conservative end of a conservative group of Republican newcomers."

The labor-opposed legislation is sponsored by another conservative Republican, William L. Armstrong (Colo.).

IT WOULD amend the Walsh-Healey Act and other laws affecting government contracts to enable employers to schedule workdays of up to 10 hours without having to pay overtime, as long as the total workweek did not exceed the 40-hour limit of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Power traced the history of the eight-hour day to the earliest struggles of the American labor movement. The vast majority of union contracts, he noted, require at least time and one-half after eight hours, with some applying premium pay requirements after seven hours.

With unemployment persistently high, he suggested, it is time for Congress to consider a seven-hour day, 35-hour workweek standard.

NICKLES, HOWEVER, had other thoughts on the direction his subcommittee should go.

The panel should investigate the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Act to look into "racketeering and corruption" in claims, he said.

Then he suggested, it should turn to the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law, which Nickles asserted "has had a deadening economic effect." And he would like to see enactment of a youth subminimum wage, which he referred to as "an opportunity wage."

Nickles protested that "for the last few decades the dominant political thought has been to meet each social problem by creating more government, such as the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, at the price of individual freedom."

Congress Urged To Keep Funding Development Aid

The Economic Development Administration has been a lifeline for unemployment-ravaged communities and should be saved from the Reagan Administration's budget ax, the AFL-CIO urged.

A House Public Works subcommittee is reviewing a section of the Administration budget proposals that would wipe out all funding for EDA, which helps job-creating businesses get established in communities with high unemployment. EDA also helps fund back-up public facilities.

BESIDES WIPING out EDA completely, the Administration has proposed combining related community development programs into a block grant package to achieve greater "flexibility"—but cutting federal funds by more than 80 percent.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the Office of Housing & Monetary Policy in the AFL-CIO Research Dept., told the House panel there is "no logic" to the Administration's approach.

Its assumption that a general economic revival will make direct federal aid unnecessary and that "more can be done with considerably less" rests only on "an unproven belief," Schechter protested.

Just last year, Schechter reminded the House subcommittee, "Congress reviewed the EDA program and found it deserving of a three-year authorization. . . . To eliminate the EDA, with its expertise developed over 15 years, would constitute the desrtuction of a valuable national asset."

THE AGENCY has also administered the emergency public works programs that have been used to provide "countercyclical" stimulus to the economy during severe recessions by putting local people to work on projects that are needed but could not be funded by cities or states.

With unemployment still at historically high levels, Congress should be looking to such programs to get people back to work instead of slashing economic development funds, Schechter urged.

John Yarmola Dies at 56, Seafarers' Vice President

John Yarmola, a vice president of the Seafarers and national field coordinator of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., died Mar. 8 at his home in Washington after a heart attack.

Yarmola, who was 56, also was president of the United Industrial Workers of the Midwest, a Chicago-based affiliate of the SIU that he helped organize in the 1960s. He also served on the executive boards of the SIU and the MTD.

AFTER STARTING his trade union career with the Teamsters, Yarmola joined the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. in 1950 as assistant to the secretary-treasurer. He moved to the SIU in the late 1950s as an international representative and special assistant to the union's president, the late Paul Hall.

In a message to his family, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said that Yarmola's death "is a heavy blow not only to the Seafarers, but to all workers to whom he dedicated his lifetime."

And as "Hall's strong right arm," they continued, "Johnny was a tremendous asset to the union" and the MTD. "But to thousands of men and women in and out of the labor movement who knew and loved Johnny as we did, he was much more. He will be remembered as a strong and gentle man and a generous and unfailingly loyal friend."

Survivors include his wife Peggy, son Jeffrey, mother Anna, sister Marie Zelensky, and brother Steve of the AFL-CIO staff. Services were scheduled Mar. 14 in Bridgeview, Ill., with burial at St. Mary's Cemetery in Evergreen Park, Ill.

Pilots Oppose Airport Safety Fund Diversion

The Air Line Pilots urged Congress not to allow the use of federal aviation trust funds for operating costs of the Federal Aviation Administration while many of the nation's airports still lack basic safety and navigation equipment.

"Too many of our nation's airline airports still lack many facilities and equipment that enhance safety," ALPA President John J. O'Donnell testified before the Senate Aviation Subcommittee considering legislation on the federal airport and airway development program.

"WE FIND IT particularly troublesome," O'Donnell said, "that this situation continues even though there are plenty of funds available. The uncommitted surplus in the Airport and Airway Trust Fund now stands at about $4 billion, an amount that could more than pay for all the safety needs we have identified."

The trust fund holds money, mainly in the form of airline ticket taxes, that was collected to pay for airport improvement and other aviation programs.

O'Donnell pointed out that of the 388 airports served by air carriers, 165 lack radar coverage, 119 do not have a control tower, 78 lack instrument landing systems, 73 are in need of approach lights, and roughly half of the runway ends at the airports do not have visual approach slope indicators.

HE URGED that the following provisions be included in any legislation affecting the airport program:

- Significant increases in authorized funding levels for facilities and equipment.
- Specific language directing the FAA to make air safety the first priority in administering the program and trust fund.

Employers Targeted

Panel Asks Crackdown On Illegal Alien Hiring

Employers who hire illegal aliens should be subject to penalties and enforcement of fair labor standards laws should be stepped up to help deter illegal immigration, a federal commission has recommended.

The Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy also called for an amnesty program for some illegal aliens already in this country, curtailing of "guest-worker" programs and improved funding to hire, train and equip border patrol and immigration officers.

THE COMMISSION'S recommendations, many of which paralleled AFL-CIO positions, were made in its final report to Congress and the White House. Among the sixteen members of the panel was J. F. Otero, vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, who was appointed by former President Carter. The panel was chaired by the Reverend Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of the University of Notre Dame.

The 453-page report, titled U.S. Immigration Policy and the National Interest, emphasized that most illegal aliens are attracted to the United States by the chance to get a job. Most were unemployed or underemployed in their home countries and can earn many times more here, even on minimum wage jobs, the panel noted.

As long as the possibility of employment exists, people will take great risks to come to the United States, and curbing illegal immigration will be difficult, the report observed.

IT STRESSED THAT deterrents are needed to make the employment of illegal aliens unprofitable, including penalties levied on employers for hiring undocumented workers. The Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act is the only current federal law restricting hiring of illegal aliens.

The commission stopped short of a determination on whether such sanctions should be civil, criminal or a combination of both depending on the magnitude or frequencies of offenses. The AFL-CIO has called for similar measures, including criminal penalties and injunctions to discourage repeat violations.

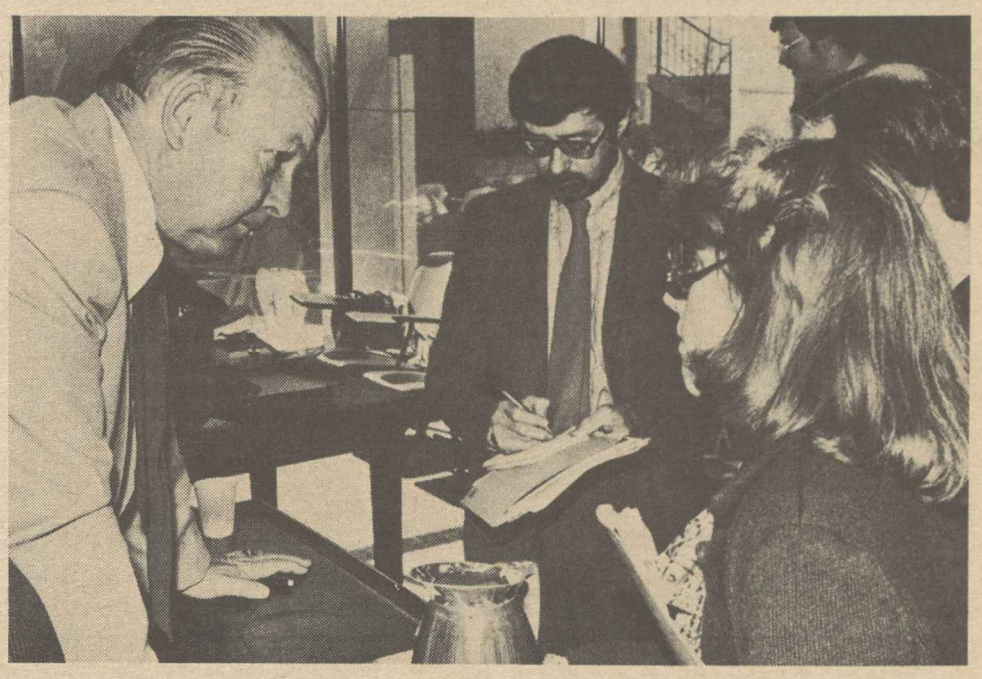
The commission also pointed out that large-scale illegal immigration "encouraged by employers who provide jobs, has created an underclass of workers who fear apprehension and deportation," permitting exploitation of these workers "who cannot or will not avail themselves of the protection of U.S. laws."

AND WHILE the immigration law is being flouted, worker protections such as the minimum wage law and occupational health and safety regulations are also being disregarded, the commission observed. It stressed that existing wage and working standards laws should be enforced strictly along with "employer responsibility" legislation.

Immigration & Naturalization Service budgets should be increased now, the panel recommended, to permit wide investigation in areas and industries where there is evidence that many illegal aliens are already working.

Legalization of the status of many illegal aliens in the U.S. would be a "realistic response" to the problem, the panel suggests, and a similar position has been taken by the AFL-CIO which called for adjustment for aliens with "a demonstrated attachment to the community."

THE COMMISSION'S report emphasized that legalization would be in the economic and social interests of the United States as well as an expression of humanitarian concern, particularly for the reunification of families.



But legalization should only follow the institution of new, effective enforcement measures, the panel cautioned, so that it does not encourage further illegal immigration.

Enforcement, the panel said, must include increased funding to expand the numbers and training of Border Patrol personnel as well as the purchase of border movement sensor systems, aircraft and other equipment.

THE MORE THAN 90 recommendations also include suggestions for improvements in the Immigration & Naturalization Service, including better training procedures for INS officers and safeguards for the non-discriminatory enforcement of immigration laws.

While the commission recommends that legal immigration levels be allowed to rise slightly, it opposes the introduction of new temporary worker programs, a position also taken by the AFL-CIO.

Evidence from "guest-worker" programs in the United States and Europe, the panel points out, supports the position that such programs do not effectively stem illegal immigration. Many of the commission members, the report noted, oppose guest-worker programs in that they create an "underclass" of workers while undermining working conditions and increasing social costs for the host country.

EMERGENCY PLANS for dealing with a major cut-off of U.S. oil imports should not be left to unharnessed market forces, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers President Robert F. Goss tells reporters at a press conference. Goss registered a sharp dissent to that recommendation of the National Petroleum Council's committee on energy preparedness on which he serves.

Energy Emergency Plan Hit As Scheme to Rig Oil Prices

Consumers stand to pay out billions of dollars in higher oil and gasoline prices in the event of a national energy emergency if a government study panel's recommendations become policy, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers' President Robert F. Goss warned.

Goss leveled the charge at a news conference to air his dissent from a draft report by the National Petroleum Council's subcommittee on emergency preparedness. He slapped the committee's recommendation that "the competitive market should be relied upon as the primary adjustment mechanism" for dealing with shortfalls of oil such as those caused by cut-offs of crude oil sales to the United States. Goss is a member of the NPC committee which was established by the U.S. Energy Dept.

"THIS IS rationing by the size of the pocketbook," a system that would permit producers, refiners, and retailers to push up prices "until the average citizen could not afford to buy."

The report, issued by a committee Goss described as broadly representative of the major oil companies, calls for the profits system to continue to operate in the event of shortfalls of as much as two million barrels of oil a day. These shortfalls far exceed those experienced during the Arab oil embargo of 1973-74 or the Iran crisis-related shortages of 1979, Goss pointed out.

He estimated that a six-month long shortfall of that size would give the oil industry a windfall of more than $100 billion in profits.

GOSS NOTED that the committee, recognizing that the near total cut-off of oil imports could not be handled by the market system, also recommended a stiff, rebatable consumption tax to be levied on top of the pricing system to further cut back on demand.

A better response, the OCAW president said, would be rationing and a workable system of product allocations. But he noted that the committee is almost unanimously opposed to rationing for reasons that are "self-serving."

"Rationing would reduce demand," Goss said, "and with lower demand there would be less upward pressure on prices, even if prices were controlled. The forces of supply and demand would be balanced, and oil prices would stay down with lower profits to the oil companies."

A SYSTEM OF "recycling" government revenues from taxes on gas and oil is untested and could mean burdening government agencies such as the Internal Revenue Service with the handling of "amounts of money that could exceed the gross federal budget" during the emergency, Goss charged.

"We are not anti-industry," he emphasized. "We are part of the industry and represent the workers in the industry."

His criticisms of the committee's report do not extend to all its recommendations, many of which are excellent, Goss told reporters.

Calling the committee's draft "self-serving" and the committee itself "not representative of the public," Goss explained that his dissent was intended to help prevent the recommendations from becoming government policy.

THE DRAFT will be sent to the full National Petroleum Council for approval on Mar. 16, and the NPC will consider it before transmitting it with its own recommendations to the Energy Dept.

The report will not be adopted "if the public yells loud enough," Goss said. He expressed the hope that the airing of his dissent would prompt "yells of dismay about this report" that will reach "the highest levels" in the Administration and Congress.

Labor Cites Heavy Costs Of Jobless Benefit Cutback

into consideration past work history and experience, as well as length of unemployment.

- Deny unemployment insurance protection to members of the armed services who leave the military voluntarily when their enlistment is up.

SEIDMAN NOTED that Congress has in the past ignored urgings by presidential commissions and the AFL-CIO for federal standards on unemployment insurance benefits to assure adequacy.

Now, he said, the Reagan Administration is proposing to use the mechanism of federal standards to achieve its unemployment insurance cutbacks—despite its repeated insistence that it wants to transfer power from the federal government to the states.

It would be bitter irony, Seidman suggested, for Congress now to use federal standards to "force states to withdraw the protections that unemployed workers now have."

ON ADMINISTRATION proposals dealing with cuts in welfare assistance to the poor and in social services, Seidman warned that the retrenchments sought would be self-defeating as well as unjust.

Inflation has already cut severely into the buying power of public assistance benefits, Seidman said. And budget cuts sought by the Administration, he charged, would make it more difficult for people to get free of welfare dependence.

Under the Reagan budget cuts, he said, "child care programs allowing mothers to seek and maintain jobs would disappear. Medical care, food stamps, energy assistance and child nutrition programs would be drastically cut back . . . job and training programs would be eliminated." Other retrenchments would affect services for the elderly and adoption assistance for homeless children.

"THE AFL-CIO will fight the enactment of legislation which would result in throwing tens of thousands of poor children out of day care, deprive the homeless of needed foster care, cut off services to the elderly and generally make the lives of the poor more miserable," Seidman told the subcommittee.

Committee Backs Two Nominees For Labor Dept.

The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee recommended confirmation of Albert Angrisani as Assistant Secretary of Labor for Employment & Training and Timothy Ryan, Jr., as Solicitor of Labor, paving the way for action by the full Senate.

Ryan was endorsed by the panel over the objection of the Graphic Arts union, which charged that he had served as a "consultant" as well as an attorney to anti-union activities of Rand-McNally and the Master Printers of America, a trade association.

A statement by GAIU Vice President Edward V. Donahue said the union is of the opinion that Ryan "flagrantly ignored" Landrum-Griffin Act requirements that third-party consultants to employers involved in representation elections must file reports of their activities and expenditures.

Ryan told the Senate panel that he would not participate in any matters that came before his office involving Rand-McNally or the Master Printers of America.

The committee put off action on the nomination of Thorne Auchter as Assistant Secretary for Occupational Safety & Health to allow members to submit written questions after confirmation hearings had to be cut off because of the lateness of the hour.

Faint Signs of Revolt

Drastic Budget Cuts Stir Opposition in Congress

By David L. Perlman

The first faint signs of revolt against Reagan Administration budget decisions began to surface in congressional committees that have been asked to concur in the destruction of federal programs they helped bring to life. But the rebellion is not yet deep enough to alarm Administration loyalists.

Thus far, only the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee has refused to endorse any major spending cut within its jurisdiction. On a party-line vote, the committee's Democratic majority rejected sharp cuts in postal service funds and opposed tampering with cost-of-living adjustments for retired federal workers.

ON THE SENATE Labor & Human Resources Committee, liberal Democrats were outvoted in their efforts to prevent drastic slashes in health, education, jobs and social service programs. But Republicans agreed to "compromises" restoring about $2 billion of $11 billion in proposed cuts. The committee voted to increase funding for black-lung benefits, to maintain fuel subsidies for low-income households at current levels, to fund the Legal Services Corp. at about one-third of current spending instead of abolishing it outright as Reagan asked.

At a House Education & Labor subcommittee hearing, there was bipartisan outrage at an Administration proposal to slash school lunch programs. And there were other panels where there were signs of resistance to specifics of the Reagan budget.

But the White House exuded confidence that the President's program would be changed only in details and that a conservative coalition in the House and a Republican majority in the Senate can control the budget-setting mechanism so as to enact a large part of the President's program by mid-summer.

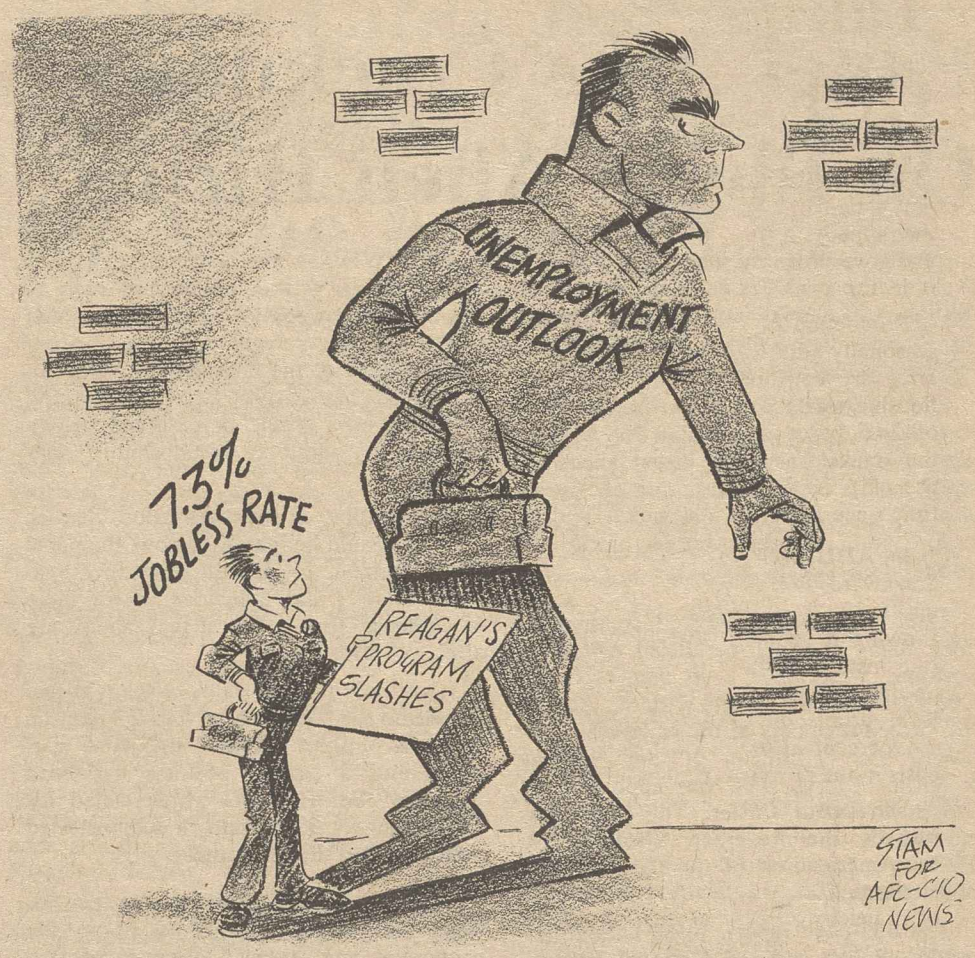
THE LITTLE-UNDERSTOOD budget process is the vehicle chosen by the Republicans to accomplish the rewriting of laws and the reshaping or abolition of programs through a single piece of legislation.

The process now under way—consideration of the Administration's budget proposals by the legislative committees responsible for the various programs—is merely advisory. The committees, supposedly by Mar. 20, will pass on to the separate budget committees of the House and Senate their estimates of spending needs for programs in their jurisdictions. But the budget committees are not bound by these estimates.

Thus, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said he intends to resist attempts to moderate the President's budget proposals. There is likely to be more reshuffling of the Administration figures in the House Budget Committee, where Chairman Jim Jones (D-Okla.) has said his panel will try to find some alternate "savings" to lessen program cutbacks.

BUT WHILE the Democrats hold a 242-191 margin in the House, the election decimated liberal ranks, and a 44-member Conservative Democratic Forum "complained" that the President hadn't gone far enough in cutting the budget. One additional "saving," the largely southern bloc suggested, would be repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires payment of local prevailing wages and benefits on federally-funded construction projects.

The key to the Republican strategy is the budget reconciliation process, seldom used until last year.



The budget resolution that will be sent to the House and Senate floors will include instructions to the various legislative committees to make cuts of specified amounts in various program categories within their jurisdiction. In some cases, the committees will have a degree of leeway in where to make the cuts; in others, the magnitude of the cutbacks virtually dictate the action to be taken.

MOST OF THESE cuts will be achieved by changing permanent laws—thus affecting government programs in future years as well as the forthcoming fiscal year.

The changes thus required of each committee will then be incorporated into a single reconciliation bill—and that's the vehicle the Administration hopes will carry the bulk of its economic program. The tentative target date is mid-July.

The Administration's tax proposals will be considered separately, and the first battleground will be the House Ways & Means Committee. While there is general agreement that a tax bill will be enacted this year, reservations about the Administration proposal have been expressed by Republicans as well as Democrats.

The larger the tax cut, the bigger the budget deficit. But the Administration's economic strategy calls both for heavy cuts in federal outlays and tax cuts it hopes will stimulate business expansion.

Dip in Jobless Rate to 7.3% Masks Worsening Outlook

Unemployment edged down to 7.3 percent in February, after holding at 7.4 percent for two months, but the slight decline does not mean any improvement in the nation's job picture in the coming months, the Reagan Administration warned.

To the contrary, Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan said joblessness is likely to get worse partly as a result of the massive cuts in federal funds for youth employment and training programs that the Administration has called for.

DONOVAN TOLD the congressional Joint Economic Committee chaired by Rep. Henry Reuss (D-Wis.) that phasing out public-service jobs between now and the end of September will lead to increased unemployment that cannot immediately be absorbed by the private sector.

"I don't believe in the next six months that the private sector will be able to employ" all those displaced as a result of reductions in budget outlays under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act, Donovan said.

The Administration's official projection of an average 7.8 percent unemployment rate for 1981, with a 7.7 percent rate in the fourth quarter of the year, implies a steep rise in the jobless rate this spring and summer and a falling back in the autumn.

THE DECLINE of one-tenth of 1 percent in the February jobless rate was statistically insignificant and left unemployment about where it has been since last summer. The slight improvement over the month benefited women workers most. Their jobless rate declined two-tenths of 1 percent to 6.5 percent.

Teen-age unemployment reached 19.3 percent as it kept up its steady climb, however. The percentage was three-tenths of 1 percent higher than January's level. Unemployment among black and other minority teenagers declined 1.1 percent to 35.4 percent, remaining at a severely high level.

In releasing its monthly report on the nation's employment situation, the Bureau of Labor Statistics observed that jobless rates for most other major worker groups were also substantially above their year-earlier levels. The February rate for adult men was 6 percent, for whites 6.6 percent, Hispanics 12 percent, and black and other workers 13.1 percent.

BLS COMMISSIONER Janet Norwood, in her turn before the Joint Economic Committee, noted that one of the key labor force indicators last month was weak and "bears watching." She pointed to the average length of the factory workweek which, after rising steadily since last summer, fell off by 36 minutes, an unusually large drop.

"It is difficult to evaluate the importance of this decline since the data were affected by extremely bad weather conditions during the survey reference week in the heavy manufacturing areas of the Midwest and central United States," she said. The bad weather also was responsible for a sharp, over-the-month curtailment in weekly construction work hours, a drop from 38.4 hours in January to 35.9 in February, she said.

Total employment grew by 231,000 to 97,927,000 last month, outstripping growth in the labor force, which rose 138,000 to 105,681,000, and reducing the total number of unemployed workers 93,000 to 7,754,000.

Unemployment among major industry groups showed little change, with the greatest increase coming among agricultural workers, where the jobless rate rose from 11.5 percent to 12.1 percent over the month.

Fuel Costs Pace Wholesale Price Rise

Producer prices for finished wholesale items rose another eight-tenths of 1 percent last month, mostly due to higher energy prices, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Prices for finished energy goods went up 3.6 percent in February, the fourth consecutive large monthly increase and the largest since March 1980.

GASOLINE prices moved up 4.7 percent, following a 2.5 percent rise in January, and home heating oil prices rose 6.5 percent, after a 5.7 percent increase the month before. Over the past year, gasoline at the wholesale level has risen by 22.4 percent and fuel oil by 27.4 percent.

Most of the increase in energy prices last month was attributed to the round of price hikes announced by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries in December and January. The decontrol of energy prices begun by President Carter and continued by President Reagan also resulted in substantial price rises for fuel oil and gasoline.

The February increase in producer prices for finished goods compared with increases of nine-tenths of 1 percent in January and five-tenths of 1 percent in December.

In issuing the new figures, the BLS said its finished goods price index was 10.4 percent higher in February than a year earlier.

The bright spot in the report was a drop of six-tenths of 1 percent in the wholesale price level of food items ready for retail sale, the first actual decline since April of last year. Consumer finished food prices showed no change in January.

PRICES FOR beef and veal, pork, and processed poultry all continued to fall in February. Fresh fruit prices averaged lower despite a sharp rise for Florida oranges. Prices also were lower for refined sugar.

On the other hand, prices for fresh and dried vegetables and whole black pepper rose, after declining in January. Prices for orange concentrate, fresh orange juice, and canned orange juice all rose sharply over the month. Peanut butter prices were up 6.6 percent, the fourth consecutive sharp monthly increase.

Finished consumer goods, not including food, increased 1.3 percent, compared with 1.2 percent a month earlier.

PRICES FOR capital equipment continued to rise briskly, and were up overall by 1.1 percent. Contributing to the increase were higher prices for heavy motor trucks, construction machinery, commercial furniture, railroad equipment, farm machinery, photographic equipment, plastic and rubber industry machinery, pumps and compressors.

Prices at other levels of production also rose last month. The rate of increase for intermediate goods — those requiring further processing—slowed to four-tenths of 1 percent in February after two consecutive monthly increases of 1.2 percent. Prices for crude goods jumped 2.9 percent, following a 1-percent decline in January; soaring prices for crude energy materials were the primary factor, BLS said.

High Interest Taking Toll Of Economy

A fresh batch of reports on the economy's performance in February gave further support to predictions of both private and government economists that the nation is in for a further downturn this year.

Production of American factories fell a seasonally adjusted five-tenths of 1 percent after six consecutive monthly increases; housing starts plunged at an annual rate of 24.6 percent; personal income rose at the smallest rate since June, and factory use of potential capacity fell for the first time since July.

IN ADDITION, the government revised downward its final reading of fourth-quarter 1980 "real" gross national product, showing it grew at a 3.8 percent annual rate instead of the 5 percent annual rate originally reported. Reflecting the downturn, profits of U.S. businesses were off 2.4 percent after taxes on a year-to-year basis in the October-December quarter.

The new statistics clearly showed the inroads of continuing high interest rates on the American economy. The auto industry is running at between 55 and 60 percent of capacity because prospective buyers either cannot afford the finance charges or obtain loans in the first place. The steep drop in the housing market was due chiefly to high mortgage rates, which hovered near a national average of 15 percent in January and have climbed even higher since.

FEBRUARY'S decline in industrial production followed increases of four-tenths of 1 percent in January and 1 percent in December, the Federal Reserve Board said. Business equipment production declined three-tenths of 1 percent. Consumer goods output fell six-tenths of 1 percent, while production of materials was down three-tenths of 1 percent.

The modest rise of seven-tenths of 1 percent in personal income was the smallest since an increase of six-tenths of 1 percent last June. Meanwhile, the personal savings rate, which is reported after a one-month lag, was 4.4 percent in January, the lowest since the Commerce Dept. began keeping monthly tabs on it in 1959 and only slightly above the 4.2 percent savings rate for the first quarter of 1951.

THE HOUSING industry slump, long predicted by analysts, reflected a 21.5-percent decline in starts of new one-family houses and a 29.5-percent drop in starts of multi-family residences, both figures expressed in terms of annual rates. Permits for future housing construction fell 6.9 percent in February, the third consecutive month of decreases.

The utilization rate of the nation's factories fell to 79.3 percent of their theoretical capacity in February, a drop of seven-tenths of 1 percent over the month. Analysts said that the low level of auto industry production reflected continuing efforts to trim inventories.

Labor, Coalition Mount Fight to Preserve Gains

ADVERSE SOCIAL and economic impact that would result from a sub-minimum wage for teenage workers was spelled out by Jessica Smith, executive director of Frontlash, for high school students participating in the Presidential Classroom for Young Americans. The students, coming from all parts of the country, were in Washington to study the workings of government.

Battle Waged In Congress Over Budget

By David L. Perlman

Labor and its coalition allies are lobbying on Capitol Hill to save a generation of progressive legislation and working in the nation's congressional districts to build back-home awareness of the magnitude and harshness of President Reagan's proposed budget.

Legislative representatives of the AFL-CIO and the various unions testified at House and Senate hearings against cutbacks in job safety inspections and slashes in the food stamp program.

THEY ALSO defended youth employment and job training programs and objected to doing away with all public service jobs when the private sector is still such a long way from full employment.

At other hearings, they protested reductions in social security protections and proposed alternatives to deal with the social security system's immediate funding needs.

They warned that slashing railroad passenger service would be self-defeating and questioned why lower-income taxpayers should have to subsidize additional tax breaks for those with more money.

THERE WERE some stirrings of response, more so in the House than in the Republican-controlled Senate.

The boldest step came from the Democratic majority of the House Education & Labor Committee.

On a series of 20-14 votes, split along party lines, the committee told the House Budget Committee that it opposes the

Program to Strengthen Social Security Outlined

The social security system can be kept financially sound without cutting back benefits or raising the payroll tax rate to unacceptably high levels, the AFL-CIO insisted at House hearings.

Social Security Director Bert Seidman urged a Ways & Means subcommittee to head off a funding crisis through an infusion of general tax revenues to supplement the payroll tax.

SEIDMAN SAID the first step should be to use general revenues to pay half the cost of the Medicare hospitalization insurance, which is now funded through a 1.3-percent payroll tax. Half the Medicare tax could then be shifted to the basic old age, survivor and disability insurance cash benefits program. Thus, the total payroll deduction could be held to the current level of 6.65 percent for workers and employers, Seidman said, averting a short-term crisis.

The 50-50 financing of Medicare was also endorsed in the just-issued final report of the National Commission on Social Security, which made a two-year study of the system.

But Seidman and dissenting members of the commission took sharp issue with some of its other recommendations, including a proposal to raise the retirement age from 65 to 68.

THE COMMISSION proposed that the increase in "normal" retirement age begin 20 years from now, with persons who thereafter choose to stop working at 65 being entitled only to a reduced pension.

Dissenting from the recommendation were commission members Joyce D. Miller, who is a vice president of the AFL-CIO and of the Clothing & Textile Workers; Elizabeth T. Duskin, research director of the National Council of Senior Citizens and vice chairman of the commission, and Wilbur J. Cohen, now a University of Texas professor and former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare.

They questioned the need for the change, said encouragement of people to work long should not be done "in a punitive manner," and noted that the longer life expectancy that is used to justify the change does not necessarily mean more years of good health.

In his testimony before the House

House Unit Spotlights Role Of Anti-Union Consultants

A House subcommittee has turned a spotlight on the role of management consultants who are hired to break up union organizing campaigns or to try to get rid of unions that are already established.

The panel's report on pressures in the workplace is based on hearings held during the 1979 and 1980 sessions of Congress by the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations. The report on what management gets for the $500 million a year it spends on consultants was signed by all 12 Democrats who served on the subcommittee during the 96th Congress. The six Republican members disassociated themselves from the overall report, but said that as individuals they could "probably agree" with portions of it.

A KEY AREA of concern was whether the Labor Dept. has been lax in not compelling consultants to report on their actions in fighting off union organizing.

While there is some question of interpretation of the law, the report noted, it found the Labor Dept. should be more diligent in enforcing the disclosure law.

"Virtually every union is required to and does report its activities," as required by the Landrum-Griffin Act, the panel noted. It termed it "inequitable" that the Labor Dept. doesn't require consultants to disclose their involvement, even when they are "clearly running management's anti-union campaign."

AS TO THE role of consultants in seeking decertification of unions that already hold bargaining rights, the report notes that "the law is clear" that decertification procedures can be initiated and pursued only by employees, without management involvement.

"Nevertheless, evidence indicates that consultants are increasingly involved with campaigns to decertify unions and advise employers how to prompt them."

Job Protections Threatened by Funding Cutback

The AFL-CIO urged the House Appropriations Committee to resist funding cuts that would weaken labor law enforcement, force sharp reductions in workplace safety and health inspections, curtail federal mediation services and lessen compliance with federal wage-hour standards.

Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor told a subcommittee handling appropriations for the Labor Dept. and related agencies that the budget proposed by the Carter Administration before it left office represents the minimum needed to maintain existing services.

SHE WARNED that the non-binding recommendation made by the Senate Labor Committee to the Budget Committee would have "a disastrous effect" on worker protections and labor-management relations. The Senate panel had proposed re-

Cutback in Food Stamps Challenged

Cuts in the food stamp program will penalize the unemployed and the needy and Congress should reject them, the AFL-CIO told a House Agriculture subcommittee on nutrition.

Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson termed the federal food stamp program the "principal defense" against hunger for the poor and the long-term jobless.

"The Administration's misguided efforts to cut benefits to those who are receiving food stamps should be directed instead to reducing the number of poor who need them," Peterson emphasized.

THE SIZE OF the food stamp program is directly related to the lack of growth in the economy, he pointed out. Each additional 1 percent of unemployment increases food stamp program participation by 1 to 1.2 million persons while every 1 percent increase in the rate of inflation adds $100 million to the program's costs, Peterson noted.

Participants in the program, which provides an average of 44 cents a meal for food, are already below the poverty line, Peterson told the subcommittee, either because they have low incomes or because large numbers of dependents and high expenses for shelter and other necessities bring their net incomes below the official poverty level. In the light of those statistics, the Administration's claims that its proposed cuts in the program will not hurt the "truly poor" are "patently false," he declared.

Anyone fulfilling the strict income and asset eligibility requirements of the food stamp program should be entitled to receive its benefits promptly, Peterson said. The proposed "retrospective accounting" system that would determine whether a person was eligible for food stamps based on past income rather than current need would lead to serious hardship, he said.

"Using this method for determining eligibility," Peterson pointed out, "would mean that a worker who has suffered a recent job loss or who has run out of unemployment insurance would have to suffer a period of several weeks with no income before being eligible for food stamps with which to feed his or her children."

THIS SYSTEM would also penalize migrant workers and others with low, fluctuating incomes and could be used to deny food stamps to strikers and their families who would otherwise qualify on the same basis as other needy Americans, Peterson observed.

Although strikers account for only two-tenths of 1 percent of food stamp recipients, they are repeatedly singled out for attack, he noted.

The proposal to make families already getting food stamps mail in a monthly income report or face automatic loss of their benefits would be a "serious hardship" for the elderly, the blind or disabled, and people who speak no English or are functionally illiterate, he pointed out.

WITH INFLATION continuing to push up the costs of necessities such as shelter and fuel—a fact beyond the control of the poor—Peterson branded as unjust the Reagan Administration's proposal to drop the shelter and energy inflation adjustments from the formula for determining eligibility for food stamps.

He gave low marks to the Administration's plan to reduce food stamp benefits to all families with children enrolled in schools with subsidized lunch programs.

This proposal alone would cut the amount of food stamps available to an estimated 43 percent of recipients, Peterson pointed out. The cuts would amount to about $12 a month for each child in a poor family. When it was originally put into effect by the Agriculture Dept., the school lunch program was intended to complement nutrition programs not replace them, and they should be left intact to perform that function, Peterson said.

He pointed out that Administration proposals to slash all households from the food stamp program after July 1 if their gross incomes exceed $11,000 a year would hit hardest at those people who are trying to work their way out of dependence on public programs.

Stressing that the poor are the victims of a poor economy not the cause of it, Peterson said proposed changes in cost-of-living adjustments for food stamp benefits would create long lags, throwing an already low allotment further out of line with actual food costs.

THE AFL-CIO testimony also opposed cutbacks in the successful supplemental food program for women, infants and children. The Administration's intention to slash $300 million from the program, some 30 percent of its operating budget, will mean an end to food supplements for about 700,000 low-income women and children, Peterson estimated.

Another proposal to cut some $1 billion out of the child nutrition program will affect all children now receiving school lunches and those in child care centers, Peterson noted.

He said the AFL-CIO believes the food stamp and nutrition programs are "absolutely essential to prevent hunger and starvation for millions of unemployed, poor and elderly Americans" and their families.

HARD ROCK, stone, sand and gravel miners should remain under the protection of the Mine Safety & Health Administration and not be transferred to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers and the Steelworkers told the Senate labor subcommittee. Testifying are, from left, Tom Balanoff, CLGW safety and health coordinator; CLGW President Thomas F. Miechur; USWA Legislative Director John Sheehan; and a local union member, Wendell Pelke, a Vermont stone cutter.

Unions Oppose Elimination Of Mine Safety Coverage

Two AFL-CIO unions called on Congress to continue the protection of surface stone, sand and gravel miners under the Mine Safety & Health Act.

In testimony before the labor subcommittee of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, the Steelworkers and the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers urged the panel to reject bills that would transfer safety jurisdiction for almost half the nation's non-coal surface mines to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration along with coverage of certain surface mine work performed by independent contractors.

"IN JUST the three years that the MSH Act and Administration have been in effect," CLGW President Thomas F. Miechur told the committee, "we have witnessed an appreciable decline in the rates of fatalities and injuries for stone, sand and gravel miners."

John Sheehan, Steelworkers' legislative director, called the legislation "an essential and irreplaceable part of a worker-sensitive safety and health protection system" in a dangerous industry.

Both unions rejected industry claims that MSHA is more applicable to deep underground coal mining than to surface mining, that the latter is similar to OSHA-protected construction work or is "safer" than other types of mining.

WHEN THE surface mining industry was covered by the less stringent Metal & Nonmetallic Mine Safety Act of 1966, the unions pointed out, the industry did not object to its mining classification, especially after passage of OSHA in 1970.

"It was only after the passage of the stricter MSHA law that the stone, sand and gravel operators decided that they were not 'miners' after all," Sheehan observed. He pointed out that MSHA was written to parallel OSHA in many ways with special inspection, shutdown and penalty provisions related to the hazards of the mining industry.

The surface mining industry is redefining its activities as a convenience to itself, the unions charged, in an effort to avoid coverage under MSHA with its strict mining rules and stronger enforcement powers.

THE UNIONS emphasized that the safety and health experience of surface stone, sand and gravel mines demonstrate that they are just as hazardous as other types of surface mines, coal and noncoal.

The surface mining industry is dangerous, Miechur stressed, adding that the MSHA has helped reduce the hazards. "Congress must realize that if it exempts stone, sand and gravel miners from coverage under the Mine Safety & Health Act, the result will be more death and injury in the mines," he said.

DNC Labor Members Hit Party Group on Budget Cuts

A group of union officials who are at-large members of the Democratic National Committee accused 44 conservative House Democrats of "political malfeasance" for endorsing the Reagan Administration's attacks on long-established social and worker programs.

The charges came in a statement directed at the House Democratic Forum by 11 union representatives on the DNC.

EXPRESSING regret and dismay at the views the Democratic conservatives espoused at a White House meeting with the President, the panel said it would strive to persuade them to support the party's traditional platform goals.

Forty members of the conservative forum—largely congressmen from southern states—not only backed Reagan's sharp budget cutbacks, but went even further in calling for an additional $11.3 billion in budget slashes.

By siding with Reagan, the statement said, the conservative forum spurned the Democratic Party's heritage and denied its purpose and platform.

"FOR THESE self-proclaimed Democrats to support the present Republican Administration in its programs that would strip workers of long-accepted wage protections, the elderly of income that barely meets the ravages of inflation, the poor of government legal services, represents an act of political malfeasance," the statement said.

President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers, in presenting the statement at a Washington press conference, said the labor group viewed the conduct of the conservative House Democrats "more in regret than in anger."

President William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists warned that the labor members are questioning the "mode of conduct of our Democratic colleagues" and that "we will be watching" how they vote on the Reagan programs.

Evelyn Dubrow, legislative director and a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, noted that a number of the conversative forum's members had labor's support in their election campaigns and should be fully aware of labor's positions on the budget. She suggested that some members of the forum may not support the statement made in their names endorsing the Reagan program.

VICE PRESIDENT Leon Lynch of the Steelworkers, who also serves on the DNC's executive committee, said the USWA is "infuriated" by actions of congressmen the union helped elect and who are now aborting the party's platform programs for the needy, elderly and workers.

Elizabeth Smith, legislative director of the Clothing & Textile Workers, said a "definite tide of resentment against the budget cuts" has been detected and predicted that the Democratic conservatives would soon be advised of those feelings by their constituents.

Auto Workers Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus and Vice President Marc Stepp questioned how Democrats elected with labor's support could endorse efforts to dismantle many of the vital social programs that date back to the Roosevelt era.

THE PANEL'S statement stressed that Democratic Party leaders in Congress and elsewhere "must speak out now in behalf of the would-be victims of the Reagan economic program—the workers, the minorities, the elderly and the poor.

"These leaders must make it clear that the 'me-tooism' advocated by a small group of conservative Democratic congressmen does not represent the viewpoint of the vast majority of the party."

Machinists Re-Elect Winpisinger, Glover

The Machinists re-elected President William W. Winpisinger, Sec.-Treas. Eugene Glover and eight U.S. vice presidents to new four-year terms.

The 10 IAM officers emerged unopposed from a month-long nominating process in which no challengers were nominated by at least 25 locals as required by the union's constitution.

The only contest coming in the April election will be for the Canadian vice presidency between incumbent Mike Rygus and challenger Jim Goodison, both of IAM Local 1922 in Malton, Ont. Rygus was nominated by 768 locals; Goodison by 61.

Winpisinger, 56, will begin his second term July 1. Glover, 58, was re-elected to his fourth term.

The eight U.S. vice presidents are Thomas Ducy, Denver; Sal Iaccio, New York; Roe Spencer, Lake Charles, La.; John Peterpaul, Utica, N.Y.; Stanley Jensen, Portland, Ore.; Justin Ostro, Burbank, Calif.; George Poulin, Hartford, Conn., and Merle E. Pryor, Jr., Wichita, Kan.

Budget Battle in Congress

Labor, Coalition Fight Harsh Program Cuts

$14 billion in budget cuts the Administration is seeking in programs under the committee's jurisdiction.

The cuts it voted to resist include public service jobs, aid to all levels of education, occupational safety and health protections, child nutrition subsidies, mine safety enforcement and a host of others.

BUT THE Budget Committee can, however, bring to the floor a bill that would direct the Education & Labor Committee to rewrite laws and spending authorizations to stay within a specified budget ceiling.

Earlier, the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee had approved most of the Reagan budget cuts by a party-line vote with the Republican majority in command.

The president was also winning his way on a series of other committee actions, including a virtual wipeout of special trade adjustment assistance for persons whose jobs are killed off by imports. A House Ways & Means subcommittee endorsed the Administration plan to substitute regular unemployment insurance for most of the special benefits. And another Ways & Means subcommittee approved heavy cuts in unemployment insurance as well as in child welfare, low-income heating assistance and other social programs.

The Senate Budget Committee, meanwhile, was putting the final touches on its version of the budget and is counting on the GOP majority in the Senate to back the President's requests almost down the line.

WITH CONSERVATIVE Democrats going along with the Republican majority on most issues, the Senate panel went even further than the Reagan Administration had sought in cutting some social programs.

The committee deepened the proposed cutback in subsidized housing and community development programs $139 million more than the President requested. The added "savings" was then used to reduce the cut the Administration had proposed for the Export-Import Bank. Ironically, the cut in the bank funds had been cited by Office of Management & Budget Director David A. Stockman as evidence that large corporations, as well as the poor, are being required to make financial sacrifices.

The panel also voted deeper cuts in Medicare and Medicaid than Reagan had asked. And it rejected, 12-6, an attempt by Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) to lessen the severity of the budget cuts by closing off $2 billion in tax loopholes and tax shelters for investors.

The committee did, however, moderate cuts in nutrition programs for pregnant women and infants, restore some funds for education aid to the poor and for youth job training, reject a proposed cut in black lung benefits and approve a year's reprieve for three public health service hospitals the Administration wants to close.

It also decided not to tinker with the cost-of-living formula for social security benefits as a means of cutting government outlays. The AFL-CIO had testified against such manipulation. Republican senators who had advocated it dropped the proposal after President Reagan told them he opposed it.

In the House Budget Committee, conservative Democrats are expected to line up with Republicans to support total cuts approaching the Administration target. But there is likely to be more reshuffling of the ingredients of the budget, with constituent reaction playing a more important role.

A legislative alert from the AFL-CIO and similar communications to key members around the country by the various unions and other coalition groups, spelled out the details of the Reagan budget as "a potential disaster" that would throw more people out of work and make life harsher for the jobless and the poor.

The AFL-CIO alert urged letters, telephone calls and personal visits to senators and representatives.

"Tell them you want a balanced economy, not a slashing of vital programs built over decades," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged.

MEANWHILE, at every possible hearing, labor challenged the rush to dump programs and withdraw protections through the device of setting budget ceilings.

Social security, unemployment compensation, public assistance, Medicaid and other social programs stem from the belief that all Americans are entitled to a degree of protection from poverty and deprivation, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman stressed in testimony before two House panels.

Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor translated proposed spending cuts into reduced enforcement of safety and minimum wage laws, and to tripling the backlog of NLRB cases awaiting action. She urged the House Appropriations Committee not to go below the stringent hold-the-line budget that President Carter sent up before he left office.

LEGISLATIVE REP. Robert McGlotten, at Senate hearings, said that with unemployment over 7 percent and at depression levels in many cities, "it makes no sense to reduce funding levels for programs that are specifically designed to develop skills and put people to work."

Instead of reducing food stamp assistance, Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson told a House Agricultural subcommittee, the thrust should be to reduce unemployment. It's not the average allowance of 44 cents a meal that has pushed up costs, he suggested, but the fact that each additional 1 percent rise in the unemployment rate increases food stamp participation by more than a million people.

The thrust of their testimony and the testimony of other union and coalition witnesses was that the budget does not, as the Administration claims, provide a "safety net" for the "truly needy."

RATHER, THEY pointed out at the House and Senate hearings, it is the programs marked for destruction or severe cutbacks that are in fact the safety net.

Thus, the Health Security Action Council, headed by Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, noted that 45 percent of people eligible for Medicaid assistance are children, and they would be among the hardest hit by proposed funding cuts.

The Administration would pass responsibility for a host of other health care programs on to the states, but severely cut back the money to pay for them. Their concern is "with numbers and dollars," Fraser protested, rather than "people and needs."

Bommarito to Retire As URW President

Fresno, Calif.—Peter Bommarito, president of the Rubber Workers for the past 14 years, announced he will not seek reelection at the union's convention in October.

Bommarito, who is 65, disclosed his intention to retire at a URW District 5 council meeting here. He told the group that it has been an enriching experience to serve the international for the past 21 years as vice president and later as president.

He has been a member of URW Local 101 in Detroit since 1936 and was president of the local when he was elected vice president of the union in 1960. He was first elected president of the URW in 1966.

Bommarito has been a vice president of the AFL-CIO since 1969 and is chairman of the Executive Council's Community Services Committee.

STRATEGIES TO COMBAT union-busters were explored at a Chicago conference that drew some 500 union representatives. Discussing problems posed by anti-union employers and their consultants are, from left, Director Alan Kistler of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, Prof. Jack Barbash of the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and Stanley H. Ruttenberg, economic consultant. The conference was jointly sponsored by the Chicago AFL-CIO and the Illinois AFL-CIO.

Chicago Conference Tackles Challenge of Union-Busters

Chicago—No union is safe from attack from union-busting employers and their paid consultants, President Robert G. Gibson of the Illinois State AFL-CIO warned at an all-day conference on the problem here.

Gibson told the 500 union officers and representatives taking part in the conference that labor will not shrink from the challenge posed by the union-busters. To the contrary, he said, "we're going to stand our ground, and fight because . . . the union is the only safeguard for the worker."

SPONSORED jointly by the State AFL-CIO and the Chicago AFL-CIO, the conference featured speakers who reviewed various aspects of current union-busting activities including techniques unions are developing to protect their members' interests. Workshops focused on the problem as it exists today in five industries—construction, manufacturing, public employment, service employment, and transportation.

In an address to the conference, President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers observed that setbacks in last year's elections have not diminished labor's influence among workers. He predicted that legislators will be looking for organized labor's support as the 1982 elections draw near. He added that in the next six months, as the full meaning of the Reagan budget cuts is realized by more and more Americans, the nation's voters will develop a better appreciation of the issues involved.

Finley pointed out that, while Reagan got the support of most voters last fall, between 55 and 58 percent of all union members who cast ballots backed former President Carter, who had the AFL-CIO's support.

ALAN KISTLER, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, reported on the federation's program for gathering and sharing information on the union-busters and on the seminars dealing with consultants' tactics. Teams of union organizers who know the tactics of specific union-busting firms are being developed, Kistler reported, to help individual unions withstand the anti-labor attacks.

Prof. Jack Barbash of the University of Wisconsin School for Workers discussed the changes demanded of the labor movement because the environment in which it functions is changing. The New Deal years, he noted, brought a peaceful revolution that fostered radical improvement in the lives of workers. He said President Reagan is now offering a counter-revolution, an attempt to return big business to a position of power.

BARBASH expressed the belief that labor is fully capable of changing its approaches to meet the challenge—in bargaining, internal affairs, politics, legislation and worker education.

Stanley H. Ruttenberg, a research consultant for a number of labor organizations, said the most revealing aspect of a survey of union members' attitudes was how workers felt about what they would lose through new laws. They were most concerned, he noted, about losing pensions and retirement benefits, next came medical benefits, third came wages.

House Report Spotlights Role Of Consultants

The report quotes extensively from the testimony of witnesses at the House hearings, including union organizers, workers, supervisors and consultants themselves.

"Perhaps the most distressing aspect of the emergent consultant industry is the perspective it brings to labor-management relations," the subcommittee report stressed.

"IT IS A philosophy of labor-management relations which is first and foremost anti-union. The defeat of unions is an end of itself, and in many instances consultants come dangerously close to justifying whatever means are necessary to accomplish that end."

The subcommittee hearings also dealt with invasions of privacy, including the use of so-called lie detectors and electronic surveillance.

The report recommends enactment of federal legislation to prohibit private employers from requiring or asking workers or job applicants to take so-called lie-detector tests.

In a related area, the subcommittee noted that some consultants have recommended pre-employment screening designed to weed out potential union supporters, even though denial of employment because of union sympathies is clearly unlawful.

EVEN WHEN union attitudes are not the goal of the screening, much of the information sought invades all standards of privacy, the report observes.

"At issue," it stresses, "is whether men and women who are guilty of no more than desiring to work are to be required to submit to a search by private employers that law enforcement agencies are constitutionally prohibited from forcing upon suspected criminals."

The Proper Federal Role

OVER MANY DECADES, workers, the young, the very old, the disadvantaged, the economically dislocated, and the handicapped have turned to their government system for the justice that was not provided to them by the market system. And the government responded.

Programs were proposed, carefully considered, enacted by the Congress, deliberately funded, checked and reviewed—as is provided for under this nation's system of governance.

As a result, social progress was exacted from an economic system that refused to grant it. It has been a slow, painful process, but a necessary one.

The proposals that this Administration has placed before us in the past month—particularly when they are considered together with the very substantial further reductions that are planned for future years—question fundamentally the legitimate role of the federal government in labor, health, education and welfare programs. The notion that there is no legitimate role is as impractical as the idea on the other end of the spectrum that the state should be totally controlling and all services should be run by the government.

A 20-PERCENT reduction from current funding that has been proposed by the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee to the Budget Committee would have a disastrous effect on labor law enforcement, safety and health protection and labor-management relations.

A 20-percent cut from 1981 activity levels would mean 14,000 fewer Fair Labor Standards Act investigations, 800 fewer Farm Labor Contract Registration Act investigations. The Pension & Welfare Benefits Administration would conduct 350 fewer ERISA investigations into pension plans, which in 1975 covered $460 billion in pension assets.

A 20-percent cut in safety and health enforcement would mean 12,600 fewer federation inspections and 22,600 fewer state inspections. Additionally, severe cutbacks would be made in employer consultation, employee education and standard setting.

FOR THE FIRST TIME in its history, the National Labor Relations Board has begun building up a serious backlog of cases as a consequence of the Carter Administration hiring freezes.

The 20-percent cutback would triple the current 7,000 case backlog to 25,000. The NLRB is a case-processing agency and has no control over the number of cases sent for consideration. At present approximately 50,000 cases are handled a year. The multi-year effect of compounding the 25,000-case backlog would be to grind the agency to a virtual halt.

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service mediates labor disputes when the parties involved request their help. In the past four years FMCS staff have been reduced by 13 percent, eliminating all "fat" and cutting administrative expenses to an absolute minimum.

The 20-percent reduction would literally mean that a significant number of disputes needing mediation assistance would not get it. The cuts would mean reductions in force and closing field offices.

Federal Debt Getting Smaller In Terms of Ability to Carry It

By Gus Tyler

AT LEAST ONCE a year, Sen. Russell Long (D-La.) renders a valuable public service. He tells the truth about the federal debt and does so in print.

As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, he has been using his prerogative to ask the U.S. Treasury to give him the facts and figures on what Uncle Sam owes private lenders. He wants to know how big it is, what part of total public and private debt it is, and what percentage of the gross national product (total output of our economy in any one year) it is. Those are all vital facts because they tell us whether or not that debt burden is about to break our back.

AFTER SEN. LONG gets the final figures, he enters them in the Congressional Record for all to see and to study. He did so again this year. Here are the facts:

The debt is big: in 1979, it was $546 billion. In 1945, it was only $228 billion. So, in 35 years, the total debt has more than doubled.

The burden has become bigger, much bigger; but the shoulders to carry that burden have grown even more rapidly than the debt itself. The "shoulders" are the GNP, the mighty output of this country. In 1945, the GNP was only $212 billion; in 1979, it was two and a half trillion. As a result, our federal debt in 1945 was 107 percent of the GNP; in 1979, it was a mere 22.6 percent.

TAKE THESE statistics personally, if you please. Would you rather be a person whose income is $10,000 a year with an indebtedness of $11,700 or someone with an income of $70,000 a year with a debt of $25,000?

While the federal debt has been going down as a portion of the GNP, private indebtedness has been on the rise. In 1945, all private debt—individuals and corporations—was only two-thirds of the GNP, but by 1979 that private debt had risen to 137 percent of the GNP. (State and local government debt has remained fairly steady as a portion of the GNP.)

So we discover that the big borrowers, the big spenders, the big debtors are the great American corporations and just plain consumers like you and me—and not Uncle Sam. Today his debts are only 15 percent of all the indebtedness in this country, a big reduction since 1945 when the federal debt was 60 percent of all debt.

For good measure, Sen. Long threw in another fact by comparing the federal debt with all wages and salaries in the country. In 1946, the public debt was 240 percent of worker earnings; in 1980, it is only 68 percent.

IN SHORT, if we view the federal debt in terms of ability to pay, we are far better off today than we were in the first years after World War II.

The facts appear on page S 993 of the Congressional Record for Feb. 5, 1981. I mention that because you are not likely to be exposed to these startling statistics easily if you don't know where to look. Apparently, the plain truth is just too embarrassing to those who insist that we must cut our budget to the bare and bleeding bone if we don't want to go broke as a country.

How Consultants Sour Workplace Relations

There is a growing trend on the part of management to contract out for specialists . . . consultants entrusted with the task of keeping a company "union free."

Perhaps the most distressing aspect is the perspective it brings to labor-management relations. It is a philosophy of labor-management relations which is first and foremost anti-union. The defeat of unions is an end of itself. And in many instances, consultants come dangerously close to justifying whatever means are necessary to accomplish that end.

They are hired to win an election. The consultant's reputation is built upon a winning percentage. . . . The result can be lingering conflict and antagonism.

Once the election is over, the consultant is paid his fee and leaves. Management and workers are left to deal with the aftermath.

New 'Middle Class' Created

Extremist Attacks Fail to Slow Land Reforms in El Salvador

The author of this article is executive director of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development. Two AFL-CIO representatives working with an El Salvador union on land reform were slain by terrorists earlier this year.

By William C. Doherty, Jr.

FOR MANY, many years, the AFL-CIO has urged our government to support those groups (and particularly unions) whose legitimate desire for social and economic change have all too often become frustrated in the face of rightist dictatorial governments, and have become easy prey for the false prophets of the ideological extreme left. Historically, those countries which have been victimized by the deceit of communist totalitarianism, have suffered as much, if not more, from their new masters.

At the February 1981 meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., the AFL-CIO Executive Council called for three conditions for the continuation of U.S. aid to El Salvador: a reduction of domestic violence, an expansion of the reform programs, and the calling of free and democratic elections as soon as possible.

THE AGRARIAN REFORM program, of course, has been the centerpiece of the centrist government's attempts to modernize and democratize that impoverished nation. Had not the AFL-CIO long ago opted to work closely with the democratic Peasant Workers Union of El Salvador, the reforms could not have taken place and a democratic form of government would have been unachievable.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development, founded by the AFL-CIO in 1962 to support the development of free and democratic Latin American unions, was able to respond to the requests of the Union Comunal Salvadoreña for technical advice and financial support when the political opportunity for a real land reform presented itself in October 1979.

Land reform had been studied for many years, and half-hearted attempts at reform had been made. But it was only with the appointment of José Rodolfo Viera, the secretary-general of the UCS, to head the Land Transformation Institute, that a meaningful agrarian reform program could be put into effect. With this program, a "middle class" was created—persons with a stake in democratic solutions to their political problems.

FROM THE START, our efforts to support the land reform programs have been under attack. The criticisms originate from those groups that have a vested interest in the program's failure: the Marxist left which needs discontent in the Salvadoran rural areas if they are to obtain the goal of power through violent revolution; and the extreme right which would like to regain its positions of prestige and influence through the exploitation of millions of Salvadoran campesinos.

Both extremes have lost. Despite the fact that the killings by fanatical proponents of the left and the right continue, the land reform process has been a success. It is not something yet to be accomplished—it is a fact. Of the 300,000 families of landless peasants in El Salvador before the reform, 210,000 (more than two-thirds of the total) have already received land. The land transfer was conferred on the campesinos a year ago, on Mar. 6, 1980, and the "formalization" of this process, the issuing of titles began in earnest in February 1981. The campesinos are in effective control of the land.

It would be difficult to tell these families that land reform is a "cruel hoax," as it has been called, and impossible to convince them that the program is reversible.

This success is all the more remarkable when one realizes that this historic reform has taken place in only one short year: twelve months filled by killings, torture, and repression by the communist guerrilla movement on the left and by the uncontrolled military and para-military groups on the extreme right. That crop production, under these circumstances, has been as high as the previous year is not only a great tribute to the campesinos of El Salvador, but also the best evidence of the program's success.

THIS SUCCESS does not, or should not, suggest complacency. The fighting continues and many dangers to El Salvador's future are presented to us daily in the press. Nevertheless, the government of El Salvador has begun making preparations for elections to be held in 1983, an event that would not have been worth mentioning a year ago.

The campesinos of El Salvador still risk their lives to obtain freedom from economic and political repression. But in this effort, they know that they will continue to have the active support of the AFL-CIO, through the AIFLD, which has suffered tragic losses in El Salvador along with the campesinos through the brutal murders of Mike Hammer and Mark Pearlman. A successful land reform program and a democratic political solution is their lasting memorial.

Coupled with Reagan Cuts

Tuition Tax Credit Proposal Called Threat to Public Schools

TUITION TAX CREDITS could destroy the nation's system of free public education, President Albert Shanker of the American Federation of Teachers warned in a network radio interview.

Taxpayers should not be forced to pay for essentially "private services" that are not available to everyone, Shanker declared. He said that principle should be preserved whether the private service is a security force, a swimming pool or a school. He urged Congress to reject the Packwood-Moynihan proposal to grant tax credits for 50 percent tuition costs up to $500 a year per student.

Public schools have a responsibility to accept everyone who applies, Shanker pointed out, while private schools are free to pick and choose. "That's not very fair competition," he asserted on Labor News Conference.

SHANKER SAID the deep cuts in education grant programs proposed by the Reagan Administration would have a severe impact on the nation's public schools, particularly those in a score of major cities that have already cut back large numbers of teachers and guidance counsellors and are still on the brink of bankruptcy. He said the proposed $4 billion cut in aid to poor families, handicapped children, nutrition and bilingual education programs—coupled with a drastic cut of CETA workers and the proposed tuition tax credit scheme—will further damage the quality of public education.

Shanker predicted that if the Reagan plan is approved, "a dual system of education" will develop rapidly in the United States and "the children are going to suffer."

Reporters questioning Shanker were Stephenie Overman of the National Catholic News Service and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The program is produced by the AFL-CIO as a public service and is broadcast weekly on the Mutual radio network.

AFTER A DECADE of heartening progress in the struggle to reduce hunger and malnutrition in America, the Reagan Administration and some in Congress apparently want a cease-fire.

If the Reagan budget-cutters succeed in winning cuts of nearly 20 percent in food stamps and 35 percent in child nutrition programs, the recent hard-won gains will be seriously undermined.

The food stamp program has been reviewed periodically and tightened up and is mainly helping those whom it was intended to help. The Census Bureau recently issued this data about the recipients:

"About 7 percent (5.9 million) of U.S. households received food stamps in 1979. Median income of this group was $5,300 (compared with $16,530 for all U.S. households), and 60 percent had annual income below the poverty level in 1979."

THE REPORT said 42 percent were families in which the family head was female with no husband present; in 35 percent the family head was black; and in 10 percent the family head was of Spanish origin.

"The average annual value of food stamps received by all households was $810," the report said. That comes to $15.58 per week.

In 1967, when teams of Field Foundation doctors visited the Bronx, the isolated areas of Appalachia, the Mississippi delta, coastal South Carolina, the barrios of Texas and the migrant camps of Florida, this is what they told Congress they had found:

"Wherever we went and wherever we looked, we saw children in significant numbers who were hungry and sick, children for whom hunger is a daily fact of life. . . ."

Ten years later, in 1977, six teams of doctors returned to the same poverty areas. The outward evidence of poverty may have been there still—poor housing, schools and health services—but there was one noticeable change:

"Our first and overwhelming impression is that there are far fewer grossly malnourished people in this country today than there were ten years ago . . . children with swollen stomachs and dull eyes and poorly healing wounds characteristic of malnutrition—such children are not to be seen in such numbers."

THE FOOD STAMP, child nutrition and the women, infants and children programs "made the difference," according to the doctors' report.

Yet, in its quest for big budget cuts, the Reagan Administration is going after the food stamp program in particular and is relying on old myths.

One myth is that food stamps are used by people too lazy to work. But the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture in a 1979 survey reported that 53 percent of the 22 million food stamp users were children under age 17. Eight percent were elderly. The remainder were mostly disabled and very poor working people. Those considered employable must be actively seeking work.

More than half of all families getting stamps had no liquid assets whatever. Some 70 percent did not own cars and only 29 percent owned their homes. Amendments by Congress have tightened eligibility to permit assets of only $1,500 for the non-elderly and $3,000 for the elderly.

Some critics say food stamp benefits are too generous and are used to buy luxury foods.

The rising costs of the food stamp program have been due not to fraud or abuse, but rather to the nation's stagflation.

Since every 1 percent rise in unemployment adds $1 billion to the cost of the food stamp program, continuing high-level unemployment keeps the program costs high. Rising employment would not only bring down food stamp costs but would increase federal revenue as well, so the sounder remedy lies more in economic growth policies than in budget cuts.

FREE PUBLIC SCHOOLS are threatened by the push for tuition tax credits and the deep cuts in education programs President Reagan has called for in his 1981 budget proposals, President Albert Shanker, center, of the American Federation of Teachers, warned on Labor News Conference. Questioning Shanker were Stephenie Overman of the National Catholic News Service and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News.

Rail Unions Hit Reagan's Amtrak Cuts

Budget cuts proposed by the Reagan Administration for Amtrak, the federally financed national passenger rail service, threaten to set back the railroad's steady gains over the past decade and bring about its extinction, railroad union leaders warned Congress.

"This country cannot afford to dismiss the existence of Amtrak" simply to trim the federal budget, said Fred J. Kroll, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

"THIS COUNTRY should not be deprived of a valuable transportation resource which it can never recover in order to save three-tenths of 1 percent of our federal budget," he said.

Kroll testified before a House Energy & Commerce subcommittee that denial of federal aid to Amtrak in anything like the magnitude suggested by the Administration would "exterminate" it as the National Railroad Passenger Corp. and reduce it to a Northeast Corridor Rail Corp.

"That act will forever remove intercity rail passenger service from our transportation system," he said. "Does the proposed national budget reduction justify the destruction of intercity rail passenger service in this nation? If our national budget must be cut, must that cut deprive all future generations of Americans of the benefits of intercity rail passenger transportation? We cannot believe that to be true."

Kroll said the future of American transportation will be determined by the availability and the cost of fuel. He warned that the day is fast approaching when gasoline may become so expensive and scarce that intercity rail service, if it exists, will be preferred to travel by private auto.

IF AMTRAK is destroyed, the country will lose what is potentially its most energy efficient means of passenger transport, Kroll said. The railroad employs some 20,000 workers, has a national orute system of about 27,000 miles serving 571 stations, and maintains a fleet of over 1,600 rail passenger cars.

Kroll suggested that if Amtrak cuts are deemed essential, budget-trimmers should take a hard look at non-revenue items. Substantial cuts could be made in items relating to the lines headquarters offices, he said.

"The fat should be cut from Amtrak before the bones are removed," he said.

UNION EFFORTS to help victims of a severe typhoon that struck the Philippines in late 1980 were aided by a grant from the AFL-CIO which bolstered the relief work of the Philippines Food & Tobacco Workers. The grant, recommended by the AFL-CIO's Asian-American Free Labor Institute, enabled the union to buy and distribute food, clothing and medical supplies to storm victims. Shown with union volunteers packing bags of supplies are Tobacco Workers President Laureano Sayas, Jr., far left, and AAFLI Program Officer Phillip A. Fishman, third from left.

Appeals Court Backs NLRB On Corporate-Wide Access

The Steelworkers won a major legal victory in principle against Florida Steel Corp., with a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upholding the right of the National Labor Relations Board to grant unions corporate-wide access remedies in appropriate cases.

The USWA, with the help of the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept., has been attempting to organize the company for a number of years.

The NLRB had held that an unfair labor practice at the company's Indiantown, Fla., plant was part of a pattern of unlawful conduct by the employer over the years that reflected a rejection of the principles of self-organization and collective bargaining.

CITING among other past violations, a 1975 decision in which the firm had withheld a wage increase to retaliate for its workers' union activities, the board found that extra relief was required over and above the conventional "cease-and-desist" order and "make whole" remedy. It directed that the company grant union organizers access to deliver a 30-minute speech at any plant where an NLRB-conducted election might be scheduled within a two-year period, and equal access during the same two years to respond to any management speech given workers concerning union representation.

In its decision, the NLRB said that its unusual remedy was required because of Florida Steel's "proclivity to disregard the statutory rights of its employees and their chosen bargaining representatives."

THE APPEALS COURT agreed that when dealing with recidivist violators, the NLRB "has the power—and indeed the obligation—to take into account a history of recalcitrance" in designing a remedial order. It held that the board may require access at unorganized plants of a repeater violator based on a finding that the employer's unlawful tactics at an organized plant have chilled employee rights at the other plants.

The court specifically rejected the Fifth Circuit Appeals Court's reasoning last year in another case that such a remedy was punitive, and therefore beyond the NLRB's authority. Both the union and the board have raised the same issue in this case. Florida Steel has been cited for unfair labor practices in 17 separate cases since 1974.

"We agree that access at unorganized plants may be necessary in an appropriate case to remedy a refusal to bargain at an organized plant, and that such access therefore would not be improper," the court said. It added that it would reject employer arguments of interference with property rights, and enforce such an access order in appropriate cases.

The District of Columbia Circuit, in this instance, referred the access order back to the NLRB for further consideration. It held that while the NLRB has the power to impose such access remedies, the agency failed to make explicit findings that employer misconduct at the Indiantown plant had a chilling effect on worker rights at other unorganized plants.

Court Asked to Overturn Settlement of TV Dumping

Legal action initiated by two labor and industry groups charges the Commerce Dept. with "utter disregard" of federal trade law in failing to collect several hundred million dollars in duties while 21 American companies were forced out of business by the dumping of Japanese television sets on the U.S. market.

The suit filed in the U.S. Court of International Trade challenges the Commerce Dept.'s attempt last year to settle the biggest dumping case in American history for little more than 10 cents on a dollar owed the Treasury.

THE COURT action was taken by COMPACT, the Committee to Preserve American Color Television, and by a division of the Electronic Industries Association. COMPACT is a coalition of 14 industry and labor groups, including the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which has been fighting to halt the erosion of U.S. production and jobs by TV imports.

An earlier suit the two groups initiated was stayed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to give the new Court of International Trade an opportunity to decide if it will accept jurisdiction.

The appellate court issued an injunction against the Commerce Dept.'s settlement of the 10-year-old dumping duty case for $77 million in the face of Customs Service data showing that as of 1977 Japanese exporters and U.S. importers owed nearly $400 million in duties under provisions of the 1921 Antidumping Act. COMPACT etimates that the duties have said increased to at least $600 million.

DUMPING IS THE practice of selling exported goods below the going domestic market price in an effort to break down competition.

"It is well known that Japanese 19-inch color TV sets that sold for less than $300 in the U.S. market for years were selling for $550 to $600 in Tokyo—a clear indication of dumping," COMPACT charged.

In a related action, the U.S. International Trade Commission postponed a decision on a Japanese petition to drop the 1971 dumping finding until the Commerce Dept. completes a review of the current margins of dumping.

COMPACT said there were "serious legal and factual errors" in the margin calculations currently being computed by the Commerce Dept.

The new suit argues that the dumping margins should be based on values assigned the Japanese TV sets by Japan's commodity tax system rather than on information submitted by Japanese manufacturers, which the Customs Service found to be false and inaccurate.

Jobless Rates Up over Year In Most States

Nearly all the states—42 of 46 reporting—had higher unemployment rates in January than a year earlier, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The government survey showed 28 states had increases of 1 percent or more, six of which were 2 percentage points or more over year-earlier levels.

SIXTEEN STATES reported jobless rates of 8.5 percent or higher in January compared with eight a year before. The national unemployment rate for January, not adjusted for seasonal fluctuations, was 8.2 percent, or 1.4 percent above the year-earlier mark.

The north-central region continued to be most severely affected by rising unemployment. Four of the six states in the area with over-the-year unemployment rate increases of 2 percentage points or more were in that region—Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, and Wisconsin. Similar jumps occurred in South Carolina and West Virginia.

Employment declines in construction and manufacturing occurred in all those states with large over-the-year unemployment rate increases, the BLS said.

UNEMPLOYMENT rates were 10 percent or higher in Alaska, Michigan, Ohio, Oregon, and West Virginia in January. A year earlier, Alaska, Michigan, and West Virginia had 10 percent or higher unemployment. No state had an unemployment rate below 4.5 percent in January 1981, compared with four states in January 1980.

Among major urban areas, unemployment rates rose by 1 percent or more over the survey period in 77 of the 146 reporting metropolitan centers. In 34 of those areas, the increase was at least 2 percent. In Kenosha, Wis., where there were large employment reductions in durable goods industries, the jobless rate rose by 5.6 percentage points over the year.

Mediators Enter Transit Dispute In Philadelphia

Philadelphia—Members of Transport Workers Local 234 pressed their picketing of the city's bus, trolley, and subway lines as a state mediator attempted to break the impasse in the week-old transit strike.

The mediator shuttled between offices of the union and the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority, known here as SEPTA, in an effort to gain agreement on a new contract to replace one that expired on Mar. 14. But Dominic DiClerico, president of the local, said "we're at a stalemate."

The strike involves about 5,000 drivers, mechanics, and cashiers. Wages are not a major issue in the strike, DiClerico said. The two big stumbling blocks are the transit authority's desire to hire part-time workers for up to 5 percent of the work force and its proposal to require that maintenance employees pass written examinations before being promoted.

The union also is resisting any move to eliminate the no-layoff clause in the expired contract.

SOME 200 MEMBERS of the United Transportation Union employed by SEPTA's Red Arrow bus line were suspended when they honored TWUA picket lines.

Over the last six years, three of four contract expirations have resulted in Philadelphia transit strikes, including one in 1977 that lasted 44 days. In 1979, a new contract was reached without a strike.

ACTWU Vice President Wayne Dernoncourt Dies

Lynchburg, Va.—Wayne L. Dernoncourt, a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers and director of the ACTWU Textile Division's upper south region, died after a heart attack Mar. 16.

Dernoncourt, who was 62, was with the Steel Workers Organizing Committee in the late 1930s. In 1946, he joined the staff of the Textile Workers, which merged with the Clothing Workers to form ACTWU.

Program to Strengthen Social Security Outlined

panel, Seidman also made the point that the burden of a later retirement "would fall disproportionately on those in poor health who cannot qualify for disability benefits and blue-collar workers whose jobs demand more strenuous physical effort."

Seidman protested Reagan Administration budget proposals that seek to hold down government outlays by permanently reducing "the level of protection for which people have worked and paid contributions" and thus break what amounts to "a social compact between citizens and government."

Continued benefits through age 21 for surviving children attending school full time are part of the insurance protection the social security system was set up to provide and should not be eliminated, Seidman said. He noted also that the Administration is at the same time trying to cut back on college student assistance, which it contends make the added years of social security payments unnecessary.

SEIDMAN PROTESTED also Administration proposals to eliminate the minimum social security benefit, which guarantees payment of $122 a month, and further tightening of disability insurance eligibility.

He outlined AFL-CIO proposals for improving the funding of social security, including general revenue payments during periods of high unemployment to compensate for loss of payroll tax income.

That concept was recommended by President Carter in 1977, Seidman noted, and was endorsed by the last Advisory Council on Social Security.

Seidman also urged a provision in the law stating that "social security benefits, like interest on the national debt, will be paid from general revenues in the event payroll taxes are insufficient."

MAKING THE present moral obligation a legal one, Seidman suggested, would shore up public confidence in the program.

He cautioned against overdependence on long-range economic and demographic assumptions in projecting the future funding needs of the program in view of the substantial margin for error.

He noted also that there are other facets to the concerns expressed that "because of the low birthrate, a proportionately smaller labor force will have to support a much larger proportion of older people."

AMONG THE offsetting factors, Seidman suggested, "a lower birthrate will mean a proportionately smaller labor force but also fewer children, unemployed and disabled." Thus, "the total dependency burden for active workers will not change much . . . the burden of the retired for the economy as a whole will be offset to a large degree by the decline in society's support required for other groups."

The national commission report also noted the uncertainty of assumptions of future birth rates and unemployment levels but argued that the protections society can give its elderly must necessarily be limited by the nation's resources and to avoid a "generalization conflict."

Miller, Duskin and Cohen viewed the commission majority's concerns as somewhat overdrawn in view of the potential of the American economy.

THEY ALSO dissented from the commission majority on proposals to modify the indexing of special security benefits during periods of high inflation as a means of holding down costs.

Any revision in the indexing, they urged, "should be a professionally independent decision by the Bureau of Labor Statistics and not by legislative fiat or political intervention."

In his testimony before the Ways & Means subcommittee and in subsequent testimony before a House Budget Committee task force, Seidman voiced concern at the impact of the Reagan budget proposals on key entitlement programs.

"SOCIAL SECURITY, unemployment compensation, public assistance, Medicaid and other social programs are not governmental acts of charity," Seidman insisted.

They stem from the belief that all Americans are entitled to a degree of protection from poverty and deprivation, he said. Labor's concern is that through the budget process, "the social progress made over so many years will now be reversed."

Laborers Aid Fund On Atlanta Slayings

Atlanta—The Laborers have given the city of Atlanta $5,000 to help pay the costs of the police investigation into the murders and disappearances of more than 20 black children in the city.

Laborers President Angelo Fosco and Sec.-Treas. Arthur E. Coia, in a letter to Atlanta Mayor Maynard Jackson, said the union "shares with you a determination that these vicious incidents be stopped and their perpetrators brought to justice."

The check was presented to Jackson by LIU Vice Presidents Robert E. Powell and Ledger Diamond, Regional Manager Howard I. Henson and Amos Beasley, Jr., business manager of Local Union 438.

ducing major enforcement programs 20 percent below this year's funding levels.

Cuts of that magnitude, Taylor warned, would mean:

- For OSHA, 12,600 fewer federal inspections and 22,600 fewer state inspections as well as reduced levels of employer consultation, worker safety education and standard setting.
- In employment standards, 14,000 fewer wage-hour investigations, 800 fewer Farm Labor Contract Registration Act investigations and 1,300 fewer federal contract compliance investigations.
- An estimated 350 fewer investigations into pension plan administration, and severe reductions in mine safety programs.
- Probable tripling of the backlog of cases awaiting action by the National Labor Relations Board and comparable damage to the workload of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and the National Mediation Board, which deals with railroad and airline labor-management relations.

Taylor also urged against scuttling the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act'c program of creating public service jobs.

While it may be appropriate to shift a bigger emphasis to employment and training programs geared to the private sector, she said, a public sector program still has a place in dealing with "complex job market problems" and should not be entirely eliminated.

Likewise, Taylor urged, youth training programs should be kept intact, rather than folded in with adult job programs with a heavy funding cut.

SHE PROTESTED that Administration proposals for cutbacks in labor, health, education and welfare programs appear to have been motivated by a "purist" economic and political philosophy that appears to deny "the legitimate role of the federal government."

She objected also to the attempt to use the budget-setting process to minimize the "deliberative role" of congressional committees and to "stifle" debate.

REDUCING MANAGEMENT ranks and increasing the efficiency of operations are the keys to Conrail's financial problems, President Fred Hardin of the United Transportation Union declared at a Washington news conference. The carrier's proposed $200-million-a-year labor concessions would lop off $2,800 annually from workers' current pay of about $20,000, he said. Seated next to Hardin is UTU Vice President James Burke, labor board member of the U.S. Railway Association, Conrail's banker and overseer.

UTU Links Conrail Losses To Management Weakness

The United Transportation Union has called for a program to improve service and build business on Conrail, the federally subsidized freight railroad, by reducing the carrier's losses.

"Today this railroad system is reeling economically—dependent on federal financial support for its very survival," Fred A. Hardin, the union's president, observed at a Washington news conference.

"THE UTU, however, thinks it is possible to preserve Conrail jobs and upgrade services over the entire network while reducing federal financial assistance. Our goal must be profitability for Conrail," Hardin said.

Conrail management recommended in a recent report to Congress that the unions representing the line's 71,000 employees give up about $200 million a year through concessions in this year's round of collective bargaining. The UTU represents about 21,000 operating employees of the carrier.

"UTU is willing to do everything that is reasonable and practicable to make strong railroads," said Hardin, "but we don't think our agreements have to be raped, abandoned, as Conrail proposes."

INSTEAD, the union called for effective quality control and sound railroad business management, and pledged to do its part to cooperate. Labor's share of Conrail problems is secondary, Hardin said; "it's a management problem on scheduling and utilization of equipment."

The union proposes to apply to the troubled Conrail system the same methods that have proved successful for Japanese industry. It has already hired W. Edwards Deming, the American consultant to whom the Japanese turned in 1950 to upgrade their railroads. Now, the union will ask Congress to mandate a one- to two-year study by Deming to determine where and if cuts in the Conrail system should be made.

Hardin released a memorandum from Deming observing that "in our experience, over a wide variety of industries, service industries as well as manufacturing, the bulk of the problems that we discover—around 85 percent—are the fault of the system and hence chargeable to management. . . ."

THE UTU is urging an approach to Conrail's troubles that would pinpoint weaknesses. Hardin said it will take the cooperation of labor and management to correct the system's faults. A joint session between him and Conrail chairman L. Stanley Crane is scheduled for Apr. 24.

'80 Jobless Rate Of Blacks Double That of Whites

Joblessness among black and other minority workers last year continued at more than twice the rate among whites.

The annual average unemployment rate for minority workers was 13.2 percent in 1980, compared to an average of 6.3 percent for whites, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. The comparable 1979 figures were 11.3 and 5.1 percent. BLS said there were about 1.7 million minority unemployed and about 5.8 million jobless whites on the average.

Joblessness for both whites and blacks and other population groups was highest in states most directly affected by slowdowns in the automotive industry and related areas, BLS said. The highest rates for black and other races were in Michigan, 23.5 percent, and in Montana, 20 percent.

The jobless rates for white workers in most of the industrial north-central states were over 7 percent and, in Michigan, exceeded 11 percent. By contrast, the rates for whites were below 5 percent in the central farm belt of the nation from North Dakota down to Texas and in several southern states.

NEARLY ONE-THIRD of both unemployed whites and minorities were concentrated in four large states last year—California, Illinois, Michigan, and New York—where about 27 percent of the white labor force and 30 percent of the minority labor force resided.

In eight states—six in the north-central region—the unemployment rate for minorities was at least 10 percentage points higher than for whites. Only Hawaii had a rate that was lower for minorities than for whites.

In 35 of the 38 states where separate figures were available for the annual unemployment averages the jobless rates for blacks and other minorities were at least 10 percent, and in 15 states the rates were at least 15 percent.

CONVENTIONS

The Building & Construction Trades Department will hold its 1981 convention Oct. 18-25 in Atlantic City, N.J.

The Television & Radio Artists will hold its 1981 convention July 23-26 in Cleveland.

In Senate Testimony

Labor Presses Renewal Of CETA Job Program

Slashing budgets for federal job and training programs is "the wrong approach at the wrong time," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Targeted programs under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act aimed at providing jobs for young people, women and minorities are vital in the current period of high unemployment, Legislative Rep. Robert McGlotten stressed in testimony before a Senate Labor & Human Resources subcommittee.

McGLOTTEN'S testimony endorsed the Youth Demonstration Amendments of 1981 which would extend for one year CETA programs that provide funding to help teenagers learn skills and find employment.

The solution to the high level of joblessness among teenagers, minorities and women is a full employment economy, McGlotten told the subcommittee. But until the nation's general economic policy is directed toward full employment, he emphasized, specially focused government programs are essential to "provide the basic underpinnings" for developing skills and jobs for "the most disadvantaged groups in our society."

CETA Title III funds, McGlotten explained, have enabled the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute and similar organizations to provide specific outreach and training services for minorities, veterans, women, the handicapped, native Americans, migrant workers, ex-offenders and others.

HE EXPRESSED the AFL-CIO's concern over the Reagan Administration's proposals to turn targeted Title IV youth job programs into block grants as well as over the proposed cuts in funding. The Reagan budget suggests a total outlay for CETA programs $670 million less than for fiscal 1981 and a reduction in spending authorizations of $1.5 billion.

"At a time when unemployment is well over 7 percent and many cities in this country are in the middle of a depression, it makes no sense to reduce funding levels for programs that are specifically designed to develop skills and put people to work," McGlotten emphasized.

He stressed that cutbacks in training and employment programs will be offset by higher unemployment insurance and welfare costs and other effects of "rampant, pervasive joblessness" such as increased crime.

THE AFL-CIO called for continuation of Title IV programs such as the Youth Employment & Training Program and the Youth Community Conservation & Improvement Projects, which would assume that a specific amount of employment and training funds are earmarked for youth programs.

While block grants would not necessarily mean that teenagers would be totally ignored by CETA prime sponsors who provide training and jobs, "the fact that the Administration has thrown 350,000 public service employees out on the street" will mean stiffer competition for CETA dollars in the future, McGlotten pointed out.

"Targeting is the only way the CETA system has of assuring that all groups that need its services have a fair chance of getting them," he told the Senate subcommittee.

"THE BLOCK GRANT concept," McGlotten said, "will only serve as a means of denying our neediest, most desperate citizens of the services they need to become productive, self-supporting members of their communities."

Similarily, the proposed slash in funds for such CETA Title III programs as youth demonstration projects, apprenticeship outreach and employment counseling and placement services would "have a devastating effect on programs aimed at the most disadvantaged people in our society," McGlotten declared.

He also expressed the AFL-CIO's strong opposition to the Administration's plan to abolish the CETA public service jobs program, which he pointed out provides jobs for people who are victims of "structural" unemployment or who cannot find other unsubsidized jobs.

STRICT TARGETING of these programs from the national level assures that they go to those who need them most, McGlotten stressed.

CETA programs exist to provide jobs and skill training to the most disadvantaged people in our society, McGlotten pointed out, and reducing or cutting these programs tells those already unemployed and discouraged they are "no longer important enough to deserve our help."

PRESERVING HARD-WON RIGHTS of workers has emerged as the primary objective of labor in dealing with a conservative Congress and Administration, President Harold J. Buoy of the Boilermakers stressed at the union's legislative conference in Washington. The five-day session drew more than 300 delegates from across the country.

Congress Urged to Bar Plan To Juggle Benefit Indexing

Cost-of-living indexing intended to protect the buying power of government benefits should not be manipulated in order to impose an artificial ceiling on budget costs, the AFL-CIO declared.

A House Budget Committee task force is exploring possible changes in the indexing of various government retirement and income maintenance programs that have escalated in cost because of the high inflation rate.

AFL-CIO RESEARCH Director Rudy Oswald told the panel that the federation's position is that "the purchasing power of benefits under these programs should be maintained in full."

For the most part, he testified, the benefits go to people whose living standards would fast deteriorate without inflation protection.

"They are not in the active labor force," Oswald noted, and can't cope with inflation "by such means as getting a better job, negotiating a better benefit, starting up a business or committing resources to high-yielding money-market funds."

ONE PROPOSAL the panel is exploring would hold benefit increases to the percentage rise in either wages or prices, whichever is less.

That would be a "double-whammy" for the retired, disabled or disadvantaged, Oswald protested. "If general living standards are rising, beneficiaries would participate only to the extent of price increases," he pointed out. "If prices are rising more than wages, the modest protection afforded by benefit payments is eroded. Beneficiaries would always share real income losses, but never real income gains."

Oswald said a good case can be made for developing a separate consumer price index for retirement benefits because the cost of living expenses for retirees differ in composition from those of the working age population. Thus food, utilities and medical expenses may represent a higher share of a retiree's budget and housing a lesser share. But this is a matter for objective determination, he stressed, not a gimmick to hold down the budget.

THE EXISTING cost-of-living index for the general population is valid and should not be tampered with, Oswald urged. The alternative "experimental indexes" that are being pushed as money-saving alternatives are largely proposals that had previously been considered and rejected by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, he noted.

Any decisions on computation of the consumer price index "should be based on the best expert evidence possible and removed from considerations of whether or not it will produce savings for the federal budget," Oswald stressed.

Millions Face Slash in Health Care Aid

Proposed cuts in federal health programs resulting from President Reagan's budget for the next fiscal year will extract a heavy human price, the Health Security Action Council warned.

Reacting to the economic package that Reagan sent to Congress, HSAC Chairman Douglas A. Fraser charged that the slashes in health programs will have a severe impact on many people—"children, the poor, the sick, migrants, the mentally ill, low-income workers, and millions of other vulnerable Americans."

FRASER, WHO is president of the Auto Workers, said the Administration's budget cuts and revisions reflect a tragic reversal of the nation's concern for its people.

"We have wanted to support the President in his efforts to combat inflation and increase employment, but it makes little sense to expect that this be done at the human price the President expects us to pay," he declared.

Fraser also heads HSAC's sister organization, the Committee for National Health Insurance. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland is secretary-treasurer of both groups.

THE STATEMENT pointed out that children, who account for 45 percent of the 13 million people eligible for Medicaid, would be hard hit by program cutbacks.

It questioned the Administration's plan to alter the program by dropping eligibility requirements, eliminating mandatory basic benefits and allowing each state to determine how it wishes to handle the program, but with substantially less money.

"In the game of pass the medical care buck," Fraser observed, "the poor and the sick can only be the losers."

HSAC also noted that the Administration would abandon federal support for 750 community mental health centers, put the funds in block grants to the states and reduce the funding by one-fourth. For millions of Americans, HSAC pointed out, the mental health centers are the primary source of treatment.

Similar reduced block grant funding for the states will affect treatment programs for people with alcohol, narcotics and high blood pressure problems, migrants and those with genetic disorders and venereal disease.

"What is startling about the Administration's health cut plans is how utterly devoid they are of creative ideas," Fraser observed.

"THEY ARE concerned with numbers and dollars, but not with people and needs. They want to abandon support for programs which protect the quality of health care, and those which encourage cost-saving community health planning.

"They propose to give up federal government encouragement of nonprofit community-based health maintenance organizations," Frazer pointed out.

He said that these efforts had been "enthusiastically supported by previous Republican and Democratic administrations as a means of getting better health care to more people at lower costs. In their place, they offer nothing."

Senate Confirms Three For Labor Dept. Posts

The Senate has confirmed three presidential appointments to the Labor Dept., all by voice vote after endorsement by the Labor & Human Resources Committee.

They are Thorne G. Auchter, a construction company executive as Assistant Secretary for Occupational Safety & Health; Albert Angrisani, a bank executive as Assistant Secretary for Employment & Training, and Timothy J. Ryan, who has been an attorney for employer groups, as Solicitor of Labor.

President Reagan has not yet nominated an Under Secretary of Labor, the number two job in the department, or assistant secretaries for employment standards; for policy, evaluation and research; labor-management services, and to head the Mine Safety & Health Administration.

Oil Decontrol Fuels Price Surge, Saps Earnings

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, March 28, 1981 No. 13

By James M. Shevis

Gasoline and fuel oil prices—zooming as a result of President Reagan's decontrol of domestic oil prices—kept the nation's inflation rate in the double digits in February, and contributed to the largest monthly drain in workers' buying power since April 1979.

Rising prices for energy accounted for about two-thirds of the nine-tenths of 1 percent increase in the federal government's consumer price index last month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Gasoline prices shot up 6.7 percent over the month. Heating oil prices soared 8.1 percent.

"THE DOUBLE-DIGIT price increases of February are directly traceable to the stepped-up oil decontrol order of the President," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said. "The inflationary effects of higher energy prices will continue to move their way throughout the economy in the months ahead.

"The immediate jolt to gasoline and fuel oil prices has had a severe impact on the buying power of workers' wages. All the proceeds from the higher energy prices represent a transfer of funds from U.S. workers to U.S. oil companies."

At a hearing of the congressional Joint Economic Committee, Chairman Murray Weidenbaum of the President's Council of Economic Advisers estimated that about 6 cents of the 8.4-cent increase in gasoline prices last month was the result of Reagan's decision to decontrol domestic crude oil and gas prices at the end of January rather than to phase out the controls through October, as former President Carter had planned. He said the rest of last month's gasoline price increase reflected an oil price jump by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries and other factors, such as dealer markups.

Weidenbaum added that the Administration expects "several more months of disappointing price performance" before the inflation rate begins to improve.

For workers, last month's steep climb in

Labor Assails Youth Pay Plan

TEENAGE UNEMPLOYMENT should be dealt with by job training programs and an expanding economy, not by reducing the minimum wage, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged at Senate hearings. With him are Legislative Director Ray Denison, left, and Research Director Rudy Oswald. Earlier, Kirkland testified before the House Ways & Means Committee, urging labor's alternative to the "grossly unfair" tax cuts proposed by the Administration.

Kirkland Hits Tax Proposal As 'Unfair'

The AFL-CIO protested the Reagan Administration's "grossly unfair" tax proposals and urged the House Ways & Means Committee to endorse a more equitable alternative.

Instead of big tax cuts for the very wealthy, Federation President Lane Kirkland said a 20-percent social security tax credit would provide greater tax relief for more people at less cost.

The Administration plan, Kirkland charged, "would add to inflation, exaggerate fundamental economic problems, and dissipate funds needed for their resolution."

Likewise, the Administration's proposals for business tax relief, including a vast speedup in depreciation tax writeoffs, would give "huge benefits" to prosperous firms that don't need them without any assurance that the added revenues will go to productive investment.

THE ADDED CASH could as easily be used "to buy up other companies, increase dividends, invest overseas, speculate, or to finance shutdowns and relocations that destroy jobs and blight local communities," Kirkland protested.

He contrasted this approach with the AFL-CIO's proposal for targeted tax cuts to help finance a reindustrialization program for American industry.

The AFL-CIO has also proposed that all employers receive a tax rebate equal to 5 percent of their share of the social security payroll tax—an action that would be "of particular help to smaller, more labor-intensive firms," Kirkland noted.

One of the inequities of the Reagan proposal, Kirkland testified, is the lack of

Senate Asked To Sidetrack Subminimum

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called on Congress to reject proposals for a subminimum youth wage, block the dismantling of effective job training programs, and consider raising the minimum wage for workers of all ages to restore buying power eroded by inflation.

Kirkland and other union witnesses during two days of Senate hearings sharply challenged the claims of sponsors of assorted "youth opportunity" bills that lowering the wage floor is the answer to teenage unemployment.

Teenage unemployment is too high, but so is unemployment generally, Kirkland reminded members of the Senate Labor subcommittee. Adults made up 6 million of the 7.8 million persons seeking jobs last month, he noted. And of the 5 million persons, mostly women and minorities, who work for the minimum wage, 70 percent are adults.

DOES CONGRESS really want to encourage employers to substitute teenagers for adults in the low-skill jobs at the bottom of the wage ladder, Kirkland asked.

He reminded the Senate panel that more than half a million young people are already being paid less than the $3.35 an hour minimum wage under student and learner exemptions allowed by the Labor Dept. Further, employers who hire disadvantaged youths are currently entitled to generous tax credits, up to $1.50 an hour for each such employee.

If lowering wages created additional jobs, Kirkland said in reply to a question, there should have been no unemployment in the depths of the Great De-

Reagan Acts to Change Or Kill 63 Regulations

The Reagan Administration announced that it intends to change or eliminate 63 federal regulations many of which were designed to protect workers and the health and safety of all Americans.

Included are rules now in effect—for many years in some cases—or pending adoption by a number of government agencies. They cover a broad spectrum, ranging from job safety to education of handicapped children, surface mining, and workplace cancer policies.

VICE PRESIDENT George Bush, who chairs the President's task force on regulations, told a news conference that he expects "there will be an awful lot of changes" made in the regulations to comply with a January Executive Order by Reagan requiring cost-benefit analyses of rules and selection of the most cost-effective choice.

This approach to regulatory relief was denounced by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting as ignoring the contributions to a higher quality of life made by federal rules protecting the workplace, the environment, health and safety, and consumers.

"In the name of business efficiency, he would let the marketplace determine if, when and how workers, buyers and natural resources are to be protected," the council said. "Past experience demonstrates that the market undervalues the need for these protections."

LABOR SEC. Raymond J. Donovan, in an announcement separate from Bush's, said that five of the regulatory actions proposed in the closing days of the Carter Administration would be withdrawn Mar. 27, and that the department is moving to scrap other regulations.

Donovan said he had withdrawn a cancer policy for the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, which would have set guidelines on how the government would detect and regulate potential cancer-causing agents; a rule that would have required employers to pay workers for time spent on work-site inspections; an action that would have denied approval of the Indiana OSHA program; a regula-

'No' Vote Urged on Deep Budget Cuts

The Senate opened debate on a labor-opposed budget resolution that would compel massive cutbacks in virtually all non-defense programs, and bite even deeper than the Reagan Administration had proposed.

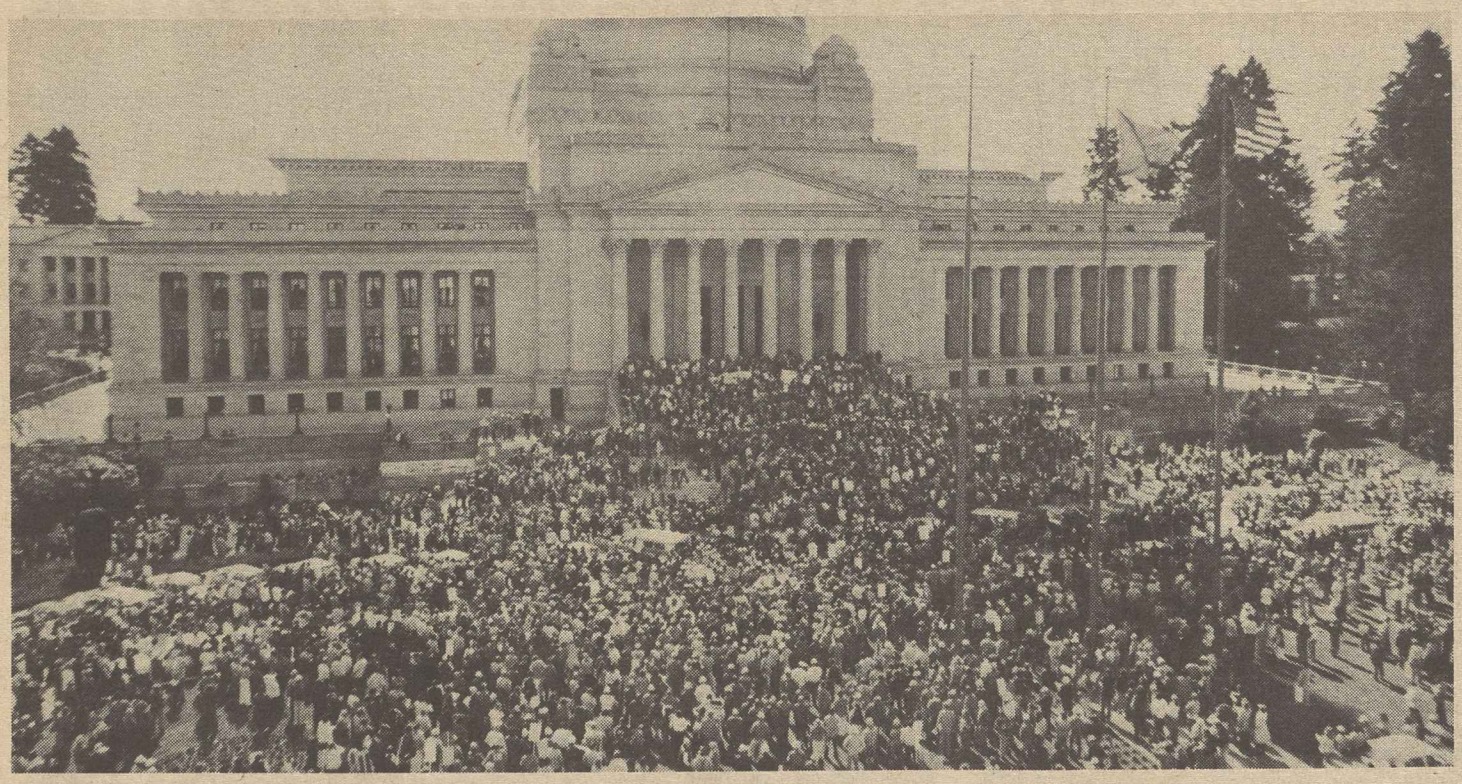
AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison called on senators to vote against the resolution, to answer "no" to the proposed "massive destruction of jobs and programs."

THE BUDGET measure would compel Senate committees to approve by May 31 permanent changes in laws and funding authority that would slash $36.4 billion from the belt-tightening budget that President Carter submitted before leaving office in January.

Even that wouldn't be the end. Another $8.8 billion in cuts is expected to be included in a later budget resolution.

Denison reminded senators of the increased unemployment that would be caused by such a budget—which ironically at the same time would compel reductions in unemployment assistance, food stamps, health services and the array of "safety nets" for the needy. He cited reduction of educational opportunities, cuts in transportation programs—and the inevitable shifting of burdens to states and cities.

THE REAGAN budget may be praised by the wealthy and those corporations that will profit, Denison observed, "but the price to the rest of America is simply too high."



There was no doubt, however, that the Republican majority in the Senate had the votes to push through the spending cuts with few, if any, concessions.

Conservative Democrats who have jumped on the Reagan economic bandwagon outnumber the handful of Republicans who might dissent from some portions of the cutbacks. Senate Democrats caucused for three days in an only partially successful attempt to agree on a package of amendments aimed at restoring about $4 billion of the budget cuts.

EVENTUALLY, the Senate's action will have to be meshed with the budget resolution adopted by the House—still some weeks off. But the Senate figures will be the benchmark for all future budget actions by Congress.

The Senate jumped off to a quick start as part of a Republican strategy to take advantage of President Reagan's supposed "honeymoon" period, the first months in

SOME 8,000 trade unionists rally outside the Washington state capitol in Olympia to protest a measure before the legislature that would slash workers' compensation benefits and allow private insurance companies to write industrial coverage policies for profit. The state has operated the nonprofit program since 1911. The so-called Three-Way Bill, which already has cleared the House, is vigorously pushed by the Republican majority in the Senate with the strong backing of big business and insurance company lobbies. President Marvin L. Williams, left, of the Washington State AFL-CIO, which cosponsored the Mar. 18 "No Way on Three-Way" rally along with other labor groups, pledged an all-out fight to keep the state from turning over "profits to insurance conglomerates."

Miners Voting On Coal Pact For 160,000

A new three-year agreement between the Mine Workers and the soft-coal industry provides for substantial wage and fringe benefit improvements for 160,000 miners in eastern and midwestern states.

Approved by the unaffiliated union's 39-member bargaining council, the tentative contract now goes to the coal fields, where a ratification vote will be held after local union hall briefings.

UMW PRESIDENT Sam Church, Jr., said he expects the pact, which includes a 31-percent pay boost over the next three years, will be ratified. The current agreement with the Bituminous Coal Operators' Association expired on Mar. 27.

Reached on Mar. 23, the accord takes at least nine days to ratify, making a strike of a few days' duration inevitable. Under the UMW constitution, a "no contract, no work" rule prevails until a new contract is ratified. Final results of the voting on the settlement are expected to be known by Apr. 1.

The contract's provisions will increase wages and benefits by a total of about 36 percent over three years. Top-scale wages would rise 31 percent over the life of the contract through a combination of annual and quarterly raises, from the current $10.56 an hour to $13.86.

THE MINERS also achieved other significant gains, and agreed to certain trade-offs with the industry. Among the contract improvements:

- Increased pension benefits. General pension benefits would rise to $375 a month, from the current $275 a month, for miners who retired before 1974. For the first time, the 45,000 widows of these older miners would receive a pension of $100 a month.
- A new dental care plan. Optical care coverage was negotiated in the last settlement.
- An agreement to dismantle a centralized arbitration review board created in the last contract. The board had been the focus of strong rank-and-file resentment. The industry agreed to return to regional arbitration.
- The industry's reversal on its demand for mandatory Sunday mining. Miners preferred more time off, and Sundays off was a pivotal issue for them.
- An 11th paid holiday, the day after Thanksgiving.

Government Union Scores Bid to Shift Loan Collection

The Government Employees attacked the Administration's decision to contract-out the job of collecting defaulted student loans to the private sector, a function performed by federal workers over the past four years.

AFGE President Kenneth Blaylock said that "it's appropriate that this idea is coming to pass during Reagan's so-called 'waste and fraud' week, because it wastes the taxpayers' money and perpetuates the fraud that government is less efficient than the private sector."

Government employees, who have performed the task of collecting over 600,000 overdue loans to students a year, have a collection record of more than 90 percent, Blaylock said. Their collection rate averages $3 for every $1 in cost to the taxpayer.

Normal procedure in the private sector is for the collection agency to take 50 cents on the dollar in collection fees, Blaylock noted.

Education Sec. Terrel Bell, in a memo to his staff, supported these facts and noted that federal collectors have "proved to be very efficient," Blaylock observed. Yet Bell expects the agency to cut the current staff of 955 collectors to 390 by the end of the current fiscal year with further reductions next year.

Blaylock said that Bell also is seeking to "expedite" the contracting process, targeting Aug. 30 as a final selection date.

The AFGE head said the union is reviewing the Education Dept.'s plans for possible legal action "to block the contracting decision, save the jobs of the collectors, and stop this ridiculous waste of tax dollars."

NLRB's Caseload Reaches New Peak in First Quarter

The National Labor Relations Board's caseload for the first three months of 1980 reached a record 14,986, or 7.8 percent higher than in the same period a year earlier.

The NLRB said the case intake exceeded the previous record quarter, April-June 1979, by more than 300 cases.

Unfair labor practices by employers, unions, or both totaled 11,234. In the representation areas, there were 3,588 petitions seeking employee elections, 158 for unit clarification, and six for amendment of certification.

During the first three months of 1980, the board conducted 1,708 representation elections, with workers voting in favor of unions 49 percent of the time. Eighty-nine percent of the employees eligible to vote did so. AFL-CIO unions participated in 1,039 elections, won in 498 and lost 541. Unaffiliated unions participated in 724 elections, winning 337 and losing 387.

NLRB REGIONAL offices, which receive the cases initially, were successful in settling or resolving a major percentage of the unfair labor practices and their underlying disputes early in the case-handling process.

The great bulk of charges which investigation showed to be without merit were also resolved at the regional level, the board said. Regional directors, working on the remainder of the cases, issued 1,398 complaints, setting the cases for trial.

After further settlement efforts following the issuance of complaints, NLRB administrative law judges conducted 268 trials of unfair labor practice cases during the quarter.

Administration Pulls Back 63 Key Regulations

tion establishing a minimum wage for farm employers who wish to use alien labor, and a rule that would have barred federal contractors from paying membership fees for their employees in private clubs that discriminate.

DONOVAN, WHO is a member of the Reagan deregulation task force, also postponed for another 30 days proposed new regulations under the Davis-Bacon and Service Contract Acts and under the new OSHA lead standards. In calling for a review of the prevailing wage rules, the Bush panel said that "their effect over time . . . has been to escalate wages above rates prevailing in the private sector."

Bush said it would take several weeks to several months to determine whether the rules comply with the Administration's regulatory objective. Final action would be administrative; new legislation would not be required to change or kill the regulations, government officials said.

Of the 63 regulations under discussion, 27 are already on the books. The remainder are among the 172 rules proposed in the closing days of the Carter Administration but suspended in an initial 60-day freeze imposed by Reagan on Jan. 29. These 36 proposed regulations will not be made final, but will be reviewed by affected government agencies, which will decide whether to cancel or modify them.

BUSH SAID 41 other regulations caught in the January freeze have since been allowed to take effect and 95 more would be permitted to become effective on Mar. 30, when the freeze ends.

Among the rules singled out for review and possible modification or elimination are procedures for setting area prevailing wages on federally financed construction, occupational noise standards, and federal contract compliance requirements—the basis of the government's affirmative action program since the Kennedy Administration.

College Faculties Covered Under Joint Affiliation

The Teachers and the unaffiliated American Association of University Professors signed an affiliation agreement covering the 10,000 AFT-represented faculty members of the City University of New York.

The agreement was hailed by both principal signatories—AFT President Albert Shanker and AAUP President Henry Tom Yost — at signing ceremonies in Washington, D.C., as a welcome development toward achieving unity.

Shanker said the action will enable the AFT and AAUP "to work together in promoting and protecting the interests and concerns of their respective memberships."

Yost concurred, adding that the AAUP will look forward to the new coalition that "will effectively work to maintain a system of quality education in this counrty."

The AFT-affiliated Professional Staff Congress at CUNY will continue as the bargaining agent for the faculty and non-classroom professionals in the 19-campus system.

A separate "no raiding" agreement was signed by the AFT's New York State United Teachers and the AAUP in which both sides pledged not to challenge established campus bargaining units of the NYSUT or AAUP.

Job Claims Challenged

Congress Urged to Kill Subminimum Pay Plan

pression, when there was no minimum wage law and employers cut pay.

Youth unemployment should be countered by targeted programs coordinating training with placement in jobs "that have a future," he said. That's what the AFL-CIO has been trying to do through its Human Resources Development Institute and various budget-threatened outreach programs, Kirkland added. And labor's proposals for reindustrialization would enlarge private sector job opportunities for workers of all ages, he pointed out.

KIRKLAND URGED Congress to index the minimum wage so it remains a meaningful floor and so that full-time workers will not have to rely on public assistance to subsidize inadequate pay.

Labor views the employer campaign for a subminimum wage as part of an attack on the entire concept of a minimum wage law, Kirkland testified.

It is "in the interests of society," he told a questioner, that the minimum wage be set above the level of exploitation and that its "real value" be maintained against inflation.

A scattering of employer groups testified for a subminimum youth wage, but they were countered by unions representing workers in traditionally low-paying industries and representatives of other groups opposed to a two-tier minimum wage.

In union testimony:

● Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin cited findings by secretaries of labor in both Republican and Democratic administrations that past increases in the minimum wage have not resulted in higher teenage unemployment. He warned that a youth subminimum would merely steer teenagers into "subminimum jobs" without career opportunities. "Surely we can do better than that," he observed.

● Service Employees President John J. Sweeney testified that a youth subminimum wage would "pit sons and daughters against fathers and mothers—with no winners."

Most minimum wage workers are in service jobs, he said, where "the minimum wage is not some abstract number but a vital floor for economic survival." The SEIU's members, Sweeney said, "including teenagers," would join in testifying "that the subminimum proposals are for the benefit of minimum wage employers who will reap windfall profits."

● Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing & Textile Workers, termed the federal minimum wage an essential "safety net" for millions of low-paid workers. "A youth subminimum could rend it, perhaps beyond repair," Sheinkman said.

A BILL BEFORE the Senate subcommittee that would set the teenage minimum at 75 percent of the adult rate is a "cut-rate wage bill for cut-rate employers," he charged. It is based on a series of "false premises." And the fast-food chains that have been most actively pushing for a subminimum wage "aren't losing any money now—there's no need to make them richer."

● William Lucy, secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employees, said minority teenagers "can't afford to take a 15 percent or 25 percent pay cut" through a lower minimum wage.

Apart from its income floor, the minimum wage helps to maintain the principle of "equal pay for equal work for America's low-wage employees," Lucy testified.

● Michael Tiner, assistant government affairs director for the Food & Commercial Workers, said the UFCW "rejects the notion that the way to increase employment is to decrease wages."

The federal minimum wage was intended to apply to covered industries, he reminded the panel. "No workers, young or old, should be required to exchange their labor for less than the minimum wage." The path to increased employment, Tiner urged, lies "in a strong and healthy economy, not discrimination in the wage structure."

OPPONENTS OF a youth subminimum wage, testifying at Senate Labor subcommittee hearings, included this panel of Althea T. L. Simmons, director of the Washington bureau of the NAACP; Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin, and William Lucy, secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

NASA Space Scientists Give Strong Vote to Union

Greenbelt, Md.—Some 1,200 engineers and scientists at the National Aeronautics & Space Administration's Goddard Space Flight Center here voted overwhelmingly to be represented by the Professional & Technical Engineers.

The Federal Labor Relations Authority said that a clear majority of the almost 70 percent eligible to vote wanted the IFPTE as their bargaining agent.

High Court Urged to Bypass Warrant Rule on Mine Safety

The federal government does not need a court warrant to carry out worksite inspections required by the Mine Safety & Health Act, the AFL-CIO contended in a brief to the Supreme Court.

At issue is whether a 1978 Supreme Court decision that an employer can insist on a warrant before allowing the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to inspect his premises also governs workplaces covered by the mine safety law.

The Labor Dept., the AFL-CIO and several federal appellate courts cite important differences that keep the OSHA ruling from applying to mine safety inspections.

THE MINE SAFETY law (MSHA) requires that underground mines be inspected four times a year and that surface mines and quarries by inspected twice a year. There is no comparable provision under OSHA, which was a factor in the Supreme Court's split decision that a warrant could be required to assure that the decision to inspect a particular workplace was part of a national plan of inspections or justified on the basis of an employee complaint.

Further, the industries regulated by MSHA are among the most hazardous in the nation.

A federal judge in Wisconsin held otherwise, however, and upheld the right of the Waukesha Lime & Stone Co. to insist that MSHA obtain a warrant allowing it to carry out an inspection. It is this ruling that the Labor Dept. is asking the Supreme Court to reverse.

THE AFL-CIO BRIEF noted that a number of employers have taken advantage of the Supreme Court's ruling on OSHA inspections to delay the inspection process and to tie up OSHA personnel on procedures for getting warrants, to the detriment of enforcement of the law.

Also, the AFL-CIO suggested, the Supreme Court's OSHA ruling left largely undefinied the criteria for issuance of a warrant, resulting too frequently in "a level of judicial scrutiny of inspection decisions which severely hampers an effective inspection system."

If the Supreme Court should decide the MSHA case as it did the OSHA dispute, the AFL-CIO asked that the decision make clear that any warrant requirement could be met without an adversary proceeding on a showing by the government that the inspection was part of a rational plan for enforcing the law or was based on a complaint or some other indication of possible safety hazard.

White House Hedges Stand on Youth Wage

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan told Republican senators who have sponsored youth subminimum wage bills that the Administration can't support any of their proposals at this time.

Donovan gave a qualified endorsement to the "concept" of a lower minimum wage for teenagers. But it wouldn't be a "cure-all for youth unemployment," he testified.

More information is needed, Donovan told the Senate Labor subcommittee, to determine whether lowering the minimum wage would in fact open up new jobs for young people or merely bump older workers out of existing jobs.

DONOVAN NOTED that a Minimum Wage Study Commission established by Congress is scheduled to report in May, and he told the panel he would want to "carefully review" the commission's studies on the issue of a subminimum youth wage. The Administration's decision to back off from a minimum wage battle at the start of a new Congress was made at the Cabinet level, Donovan indicated.

The Secretary of Labor's first testimony since his confirmation hearings brought praise from committee Democrats, but expressions of impatience from conservative Republicans who have been pushing for a subminimum youth bill.

The issue has been "studied to death," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) complained.

Hatch is chairman of the full Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee and the sponsor of a bill that would enable employers to pay workers under the age of 20 only 75 percent of the minimum wage for up to six months.

SUBCOMMITTEE Chairman Don Nickles (R-Okla.), whose bill would totally expel employees under 18 from the wage-hour law, said the best hope for youth employment is "an unrestrained free enterprise system."

Donovan testified that "before the Administration can endorse a specific legislative approach," it must consider such questions as:

● The effect of youth differentials on jobs of adult wage-earners.

● The most effective means of enforcement to prevent adult displacement and the firing of teenagers when they can no longer be paid a subminimum wage.

● The effect of a subminimum wage on poor families who depend on the earnings of teenagers.

● The extent to which employers will create additional jobs that can be filled by teenagers, and the experience of other countries with a youth wage.

He noted that under present law nearly 500,000 students are employed at 85 percent of the minimum wage in after-school jobs and summer employment.

When Nickles said that existing procedures for hiring at subminimum rates are "cumbersome," Donovan suggested that it might be even more cumbersome to supervise a general youth subminimum wage to make sure that it is not being abused.

Neither Donovan nor the White House ruled out a future push by the Administration for a subminimum youth wage, which was one of the planks in the Republican platform last year. A White House press aide stressed that President Reagan supports a lower youth wage "in principle."

WHILE TRADE associations of restaurant owners and retail food stores testified for the subminimum bills, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce merely sent a somewhat ambiguous letter endorsing the "concepts" of the various bills and saying it is working on its own "comprehensive analysis" of the issue.

Press reports had indicated that the business association was concerned that enactment of a youth subminimum might be accomplished through an increase in the wage floor for adults.

The two ranking Democrats on the Labor & Human Resources Committee, Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (N.J.), noted that inflation has deeply eroded the buying power of the present $3.35 an hour wage floor. But Donovan said he didn't expect the Administration to support a higher minimum wage anytime soon.

Fuel Assistance Cutbacks Termed Blow to Elderly

A retired Steelworker member from Claremont, N.H., urged a Senate subcommittee to reauthorize the low-income energy assistance program and reject an Administration proposal to fold it into an overall state block grant program and cut available funds by 25 percent.

Earl Bourden, who has been involved in helping needy families in his home area get federal assistance in meeting high fuel costs, testified on behalf of the National Council of Senior Citizens. He is president of the NCSC affiliate in Claremont and a member of the organization's national board.

"Our senior citizens must not be forced to choose between heating and eating," Bourden urged. "For thousands of senior citizens, the rising cost of fuel has far outstripped the financial assistance they have been able to get."

Bourden suggested that their plight offers "a true test of the compassion that this Administration claims to have for America's needy."

Calistri Named Editor Of Labor Newspaper

Richard J. Calistri has been named editor of Labor newspaper to succeed the late Ruben Levin. Calistri, 55, had been with the paper during the 1960s and returned to Labor last year as associate editor.

Calistri also had worked on union publications for the Machinists, Seafarers and Government Employees. Labor newspaper is published tri-weekly by 14 unions with members in railroads, airlines and related transportation fields.

An Unfair Tax Tilt

THE PRESIDENT'S tax package is grossly unfair and much too costly. It would add to inflation, exaggerate fundamental economic problems and dissipate funds needed for their resolution.

The facade of even-handedness implied in the 10 percent per year across-the-board cuts (for individuals) quickly disappears upon closer inspection.

Despite claims to the contrary there is no tax cut under the Administration's proposal for some 15 million low-income working Americans. Their taxes went up this past January as a result of the social security increases; this same group will be among the first to feel the impact of the Administration's cuts in social programs.

The average worker in the private sector who, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, earns about $12,000 a year, would receive a first-year cut of $128 if single; but only $92 if supporting a family of four.

A FAMILY AT THE national median of approximately $20,000 would receive $228. At twice the national median ($40,000) the cut amounts to $648—almost three times as much. At $100,000 the cut is $1,840—eight times as much.

The three-year program amounts to a 9.2 percent increase in after-tax income of the $100,000-a-year salary earner compared to 3.4 percent for the $20,000 family and only 1.9 percent for the $12,000 wage earner.

According to the estimates of both the Administration and the Joint Committee on Taxation nearly 30 percent of the benefits of the tax cut will go to those with incomes of $50,000 and over—the top 5 percent of the nation. When fully effective, the average cut for this group will be $5,669. The remaining 95 percent of the population will receive an average reduction of $743.

Clearly a scheme which gives more to those at the top—in absolute as well as relative terms—cannot be considered fair or even-handed.

The so-called supply-side notion that such cuts in marginal tax rates will entice more people into the labor force and encourage them to work harder completely ignores the fact that there are nearly eight million Americans looking for work, four million on part-time schedules because full-time work is not available, and over one million workers who have dropped out of the labor force because the search for jobs was futile.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S depreciation proposal amounts to a rapid and arbitrary speed-up in depreciation write-offs which would render the concept of business income for income tax purposes meaningless. Huge revenue losses would result and the corporate contribution to the costs of government would be cut by over one-third.

We see no justification, particularly in this time of budget slashing and proclaimed need for austerity and sacrifice, to throw as much as $60 billion a year in federal tax cuts to the nation's corporations and their stockholders and wait and hope that this largess will trickle down to workers and consumers in the form of needed jobs and more goods and services at reasonable prices.

Inflation Fueled, Not Curtailed By Forcing Up Unemployment

By Gus Tyler

IN A LONG PIECE in the Wall Street Journal, Herbert Stein includes one short paragraph that may tell us more about why the Nixon and Ford Administrations failed to check inflation than countless commentaries that have spouted from legions of pundits.

That mighty little paragraph comes from a man who wielded much might in the nation's capital for many years: he was the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford and, for a moment there, was considered to be a likely choice to end up as top adviser to President Ronald Reagan. So what Stein has to say is not of minor consequence.

HIS PARAGRAPH refers to what happens when the government embarks on a policy of shrinking the economy in order to check inflation. Although such a "cooling" of the business engine is what Stein continues to advocate, he does grant that such a process does have a few negative side effects.

First, he says, "the process of reducing inflation creates a period of unemployment and excess capacity."

This is a refreshing admission. It tells us that unemployment didn't just happen to us; it was made to happen. Unemployment was manufactured as part of that "process of reducing inflation."

That same pithy little sentence tells us that the "process" creates "excess capacity." That means that much of our productive machinery in the United States is idled. Such idle overhead is very costly and is, quite naturally, added to the price of the commodities we purchase. So—to put it bluntly—this "process" to reduce inflation is, in itself, inflationary.

That's why, for a full decade now, we have been suffering simultaneously from unnecessarily high unemployment and needlessly high prices—the sickness called "stagflation."

THE CURRENT CURE for this ailment, the fundamental faith of the new Administration, is to enrich the rich so that they will have the necessary "capital" to invest—to spur jobs, to increase supply. Along the way, the Administration also proposes to cut government spending.

But, says Stein, a condition of unemployment and excess capacity is "not an economic environment in which there will be much new investment, movement of workers, or cuts in government spending programs. It will also be an environment of large budget deficits."

What Stein is saying seems, after it is said, so obvious that one wonders why we needed a learned authority to say it. After all, if a plant is going unused or only partly used, why should the company put up a second plant or enlarge the present facility?

If there is higher unemployment, how can we put more people to work? And if there are more people without a steady income because they were frozen out of the cooled economy, how can the government expect to balance its budget when it must pay the added billions in assistance while losing additional billions in income?

The amazing thing is that, despite all these arguments, Stein insists that we must go right ahead and cool the economy some more. Someday somehow, he expects that the poison will cure the patient. Just when, he does not say.

Vol. XXVI—No. 13 March 28, 1981

THE ADMINISTRATION PLAN

The Threat to Jobs and Social Progress

The AFL-CIO has long maintained that the federal budget must be based on a careful determination of the nation's needs and the federal government's responsibility in meeting those needs. Currently, these needs and responsibilities are being ignored and preempted by a combination of honest misunderstandings of the role and function of government; exaggerated conceptions of government growth, influence or waste; and simplistic notions that all of the nation's problems would go away if the budget were balanced and our government would simply spend less, tax less and protect less.

The budget proposed by the President for fiscal 1982 is not the usual compendium of expenditures, revenues and proposals that reflect the nation's needs and circumstances.

It will result in the loss of 1,260,000 jobs. And it will have multiple negative effects on the entire U.S. economy.

It adds up to a massive attempt to reshape and restructure programs that have been devised, proposed, carefully considered, enacted by the Congress, deliberately funded, checked and reviewed as is provided for under the nation's system of governance.

It proposes revisions in law without the benefit of careful, prudent consideration and a short-circuiting of the appropriate legislative process of deliberation and oversight.

It is based on economic theories that have no foundation in fact, defy logic and ignore compassion.

The AFL-CIO does not believe that this nation has been too generous in helping the poor, the disadvantaged and the unemployed.

We do not believe the nation has been too ambitious in revitalizing its cities, enhancing educational opportunities, improving transportation or meeting its energy problems.

We do not believe the nation has been overzealous in protecting its environment, its natural resources, its consumers or its workers.

And, we do not believe the tax structure overburdens those with wealth and power and treads too lightly on everyone else.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council called the President's program . . . "a high-risk gamble with the future of America" with workers and the poor taking the lion's share of the risk.

This report, produced by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research, highlights the impact on jobs and people of the reductions proposed by the Reagan Administration in the fiscal 1982 budget.

Jobs and Training

The most direct and greatest impact of the Reagan Administration Budget in creating unemployment would occur in the jobs and training programs. Terminations of various programs under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA), youth employment and training programs, and National Endowments for the Arts and the Humanities would abolish opportunities for the training and entry experience employment for hundreds of thousands of people who would be added to the number of unemployed.

COMPREHENSIVE EMPLOYMENT & TRAINING ACT (CETA)

Budget Cut: $3,600 million

Job Loss: 340,000

CETA Titles II D and VI would be terminated. These programs provide training and public service jobs in state and local government agencies for workers on welfare or who have been unemployed at least 10 weeks and whose family income was below $10,000. About 340,000 workers are currently employed in such programs. These jobs would be terminated by the Reagan Administration proposal and the workers would not be eligible for unemployment benefits because of recent changes in the law. Many would be forced on welfare. A sizable part of the budget cut would be transferred to state and local budgets. This is on top of cuts in the '81 CETA budget which will cost many more jobs.

YOUTH INITIATIVE—CETA GRANT CONSOLIDATION

Budget Cut: $800 million

Job Loss: 160,000

The Administration is withdrawing the youth education, training and employment program, and youth initiative proposed in the Carter January 1981 budget. The youth initiative was intended to help needy junior and senior high school students learn the basic academic and employment skills necessary to find jobs. The Administration is proposing a consolidation of youth programs into a general purpose CETA grants, resulting in a reduction in fiscal 1982 of $670 million in outlays from the January levels.

NATIONAL CETA PROGRAMS

The Administration recommends a $100 million or 50 percent cut in Special National Programs and Support Services under CETA's Title III. Title III is a source of assistance to groups with serious disadvantages in the job market—minorities, veterans, women, the handicapped, migrant workers and native Americans. It also assists on the job training programs operated by such national groups as the Urban League, the Human Resources Development Institute, and some 20 international unions for the benefit of disadvantaged individuals, as well as apprenticeship outreach programs that have played a critical role in creating opportunities for minorities and females in the skilled trades.

YOUTH CONSERVATION CORPS

Budget Cut: $60 million

Job Loss: 2,000

This Administration proposes to phase out the Youth Conservation Corps of the Dept. of Interior by the end of 1981. This program provides summer jobs on public lands for youths age 15 to 18. It gives them environmental training and jobs.

YOUNG ADULT CONSERVATION CORPS

Budget Cut: $179 million

Job Loss: 18,000

This program would be terminated. It provides employment to youths age 16 to 23 in such work activity as flood control, park maintenance and forestry on public land.

NATIONAL ENDOWMENTS FOR THE ARTS AND THE HUMANITIES

Budget Cut: $87 million

Outlays for these programs would be cut by about $87 million in 1982; budget authority would be cut by nearly 50 percent. They provide grants to state and local agencies, cultural institutions, organizations and individuals to encourage creative efforts, enhance access to the arts, support art institutions and maintain the artistic heritage of different cultural and ethnic groups. The Endowment for the Humanities provides support to promote understanding and teaching of the humanities. The Reagan proposal cuts in half the support for these programs, which help dedicated and talented people enter into cultural and artistic pursuits.

LABOR ENFORCEMENT PROGRAMS

The Administration is proposing that there be reductions of from 6 to 9 percent in the full-time permanent employment levels of agencies that regulate labor standards and workers health and safety. These cuts would reduce employment levels for Fiscal Years 1981 and 1982 from Dec. 31, 1980, levels. The inspectors of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration would be reduced by 250 or 9 percent over two years. The Mine Safety & Health Administration would be reduced by 6.6 percent. The Employment Standards Administration would be reduced by 300 employees or 6.1 percent.

The Administration also proposes reductions of 10 percent in the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, 7 percent in the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and 2 percent in the National Labor Relations Board.

STATE EMPLOYMENT SECURITY AGENCIES

Budget Cut: $150 million

Job Loss: 5,000

Grants to states to help unemployed workers find jobs will be reduced by $150 million in 1982 and further reductions made in subsequent years. The aim is to reduce staffing levels from the present 30,000 to less than 25,000 in the state agencies, a cut of 17 percent.

Transportation

Transportation—by road, rail, air, and water—is of central importance to the nation's "infrastructure." Federal government programs—mainly centered in the Dept. of Transportation—supply money to the states to help build highways and promote highway safety; provide assistance to railroads; provide grants and subsidies for urban mass transit systems, and assist the construction of airports and ocean-going merchant ships. The National Railroad Passenger Corp. (Amtrak), supported mainly through federal financing, is the nation's most important supplier of intercity rail passenger service. Consolidated Rail Corp. (CONRAIL) receives federal subsidies for operating freight and commuter trains in the northeast and midwest. The total reduction in outlays for transportation is $1.7 billion, about 8 percent. Job losses probably exceed 100,000.

FEDERAL HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

Budget Cut: $421 million

Job Loss: 44,000

Current outlays would be reduced by 5 percent, and the Reagan Administration proposal would cut 20 percent from budget authority for federal highways. This would result in a $2 billion reduction in highway construction. Ten percent of the Interstate system needs resurfacing, many bridges require rehabilitation and new area developments demand increased road capacity. Shifting responsibility to state and local governments would require about a 2-cent per gallon increase in state gasoline taxes. If highway construction is curtailed by $2 billion, 44,000 man-years of work would be lost.

MASS TRANSIT

Budget Cut: $420 million

Job Loss: 33,000

A 15-percent cutback ($420 million) is proposed in mass transit capital outlays, accompanied by a 35-percent ($1.3 billion) reduction in budget authority. Grants for new construction would be discontinued entirely after 1982. A $1.3-billion cut for construction would mean a loss of about 33,000 man years of work. Operating subsidies would not be reduced in 1982 but would be entirely phased out by 1985.

Budget Coalition

The AFL-CIO is working with more than 185 national organizations in a Budget Coalition pledged to fight against the "unnecessary and unwise destruction of social and economic advances achieved in the past 50 years." The Budget Coalition can be contacted at 202-637-5086.

AMTRAK

Budget Cut: $304 million

Job Loss: 10,000

Amtrak train subsidies would be reduced by nearly one-third in 1982. Fares would be increased and the financial burden shifted to passengers or state governments. Certain trains will be eliminated, hurting the economies in less populated areas. As Amtrak equipment has been improved on some routes, a greater capacity ratio has been achieved. This cut would allow the deterioration of the most efficient long-distance transportation, and the fixed and rolling capital that is already invested.

LOCAL RAIL SERVICE

Budget Cut: $100 million

Job Loss: 2,300

Local Rail Service Assistance Grants would be cut by 40 percent. These provide subsidies to cushion shippers against rail line abandonments. No additional budget authority would be provided for the program. Areas in midwestern states and Texas and Oklahoma would be most affected by higher shipping costs or abandonment of rail service. CONRAIL subsidies would be reduced in 1982 and terminated thereafter. Substantial track abandonment and ultimate dismemberment of CONRAIL is the likely outcome.

NORTHEAST RAIL CORRIDOR

Budget Cut: $155 million

Job Loss: 2,000

Outlays on improvement of the Northeast Rail Corridor would be reduced by one-third with a resulting loss of 2,000 jobs. Railbed improvement would lead to improved freight handling, more passenger traffic and a reduction of subsidies required for railroad operations.

AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION

Budget Cut: $50 million

Job Loss: 6,000

A reduction of 8 percent is proposed in 1982 outlays for the airport construction program. There would also be a $300-million cut in budget authority for airport expansion and improved safety.

MARITIME SHIP CONSTRUCTION

Reduced levels of subsidy of construction of new privately-owned commercial vessels in ocean foreign commerce would result in a $40 million cut in 1982. Budget authority is reduced by $107 million leading to continued low-level of support for modernization and expansion of the U.S. merchant fleet.

Education

Major federal education support programs would be sharply reduced. Through proposed consolidations and cutbacks of programs, there would be reduced outlays for Elementary & Secondary Education Grants, Vocational Education, School Assistance in Federally Affected Areas and Student Loan Assistance programs. Education activities at all levels, from elementary through higher levels, would suffer serious financial setbacks.

ELEMENTARY & SECONDARY EDUCATION GRANTS

Budget Cut: $1.1 Billion

Consolidation would cut the total funds by $1.1 billion in 1982 and $1.7 billion in 1983, or 27 percent of the projected budget. All or part of 44 federal elementary and secondary education assistance programs would be reduced to two block grant programs. Localities would no longer have to provide specific educational activities and services, such as special education for the handicapped and adult education. The requirements for matching funds by localities would be eliminated. This proposal would reverse hard-won laws to gain educational equity for the nation's young people, permitting state and local agencies to ignore the needs of minorities and disadvantaged. Budget authority would be cut by $1.5 billion in 1982, and states and localities forced to assume increased education costs in their budgets.

STUDENT ASSISTANCE

Budget Cut: $944 million

A $230 million reduction is proposed in 1982 for higher education assistance to students and parents. The amount of discretionary income for Pell Grants that families must contribute to the support of a student has been increased and a $750 self-help contribution from students going to college is now required. The new parental loan subsidy will be eliminated.

Guaranteed student loan changes would push out of college an estimated one million students, or 50 percent of those currently benefitting. This program has been frozen until final details of the cuts are worked out. The total cost of attending public colleges in 1981 was $2,500 for residents and $3,800 for non-residents.

STUDENT LOAN MARKETING ASSOCIATION

Off-budget Cut: $1,400 million

The Reagan Administration proposes to eliminate access of the Student Loan Marketing Association ("Sallie Mae") to the Federal Financing Bank. This would bring about a drastic curtailment in Sallie Mae's efforts to assist student loans. "Sallie Mae" provides a market in which banks and other commercial lenders can sell their guaranteed loans and helps to free private capital for further student loans.

SCHOOL ASSISTANCE IN FEDERALLY AFFECTED AREAS (IMPACT AID)

Budget Cut: $450 million

The number of districts receiving impact aid in 1982 will be reduced from approximately 3,900 to 330. Funds will be reduced by 45 percent. This money is vital to support schools in communities with large federal installations which do not pay property taxes.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Budget Cut: $200 million

The $200 million cut in 1982 outlays is nearly one-fourth of the funds available for vocational education which is designed to improve the job skills and employability of young people. The vocational education program dates back to 1917 and needs expansion, technology and modern equipment:

Commerce, Credit And Housing

Hundreds of millions of dollars in outlays as well as billions of dollars in budget authority would be cut from programs in these activity areas. Major programs involve housing finance, rehabilitation and new construction, Small Business Administration and National Consumer Cooperative Bank lending, economic development and rural electrification.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION (EDA) AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT COMMISSIONS

Budget Cut: $481 million

Job Loss: 116,000

Programs of EDA, regional commissions and the Appalachian Commission programs would be terminated. This would greatly reduce economic development in some of the most depressed areas. Recent EDA program experience suggests that its loans and grants result in the creation of about 116,000 jobs in eligible areas by triggering private capital investment. Total investment is several times the EDA contribution as private funds are induced in building plants and starting new businesses.

GOVERNMENT NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION

There is no significant change in GNMA (below market interest rate) housing finance outlays for 1982. However, it is proposed that after making mortgage purchase commitments in 1982 to purchase eligible low-income housing mortgages for projects already under development, the "tandem plan" program for such mortgages would be discontinued. If market interest rates remain at high levels, the absence of tandem plan financing would mean a phase-out of federally subsidized low-income rental housing, which would leave many families ill-housed and add to construction unemployment.

FARMER'S HOME ADMINISTRATION

Budget Cut: $105 million

Job Loss: 41,000

Outlays would be reduced by $105 million or 7 percent in 1982. New loan commitments by three funds administered by the FmHA would be cut many times that amount. The Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund which makes and guarantees loans for the purchase and operation of family farms and provides disaster loans, would have its loan commitment authority cut by $1,139 million in 1982 in a gamble on a reduction in natural disasters.

The Rural Housing Insurance Fund makes and guarantees subsidized loans to low and middle-income home purchasers and developers of rental property in rural areas who cannot get financial assistance from other sources. The Rural Development Insurance Fund makes loans related to water and waste disposal and the development of rural business and community facilities, including fire and rescue services, health care, transportation and community, social, cultural and recreational facilities.

These programs are needed to stem the departure to urban areas of rural residents

Unfair Cuts from Untested Theory

The measures advocated by the Administration are inequitable, unfair and short-sighted. They are based on an untested theory; unrealistic projections and questionable logic.

Budget cuts in income-support programs ignore the harm that befalls millions of Americans and will result in further shrinking purchasing power.

Budget cuts in alternative energy programs ignore the recently-learned lesson that the nation cannot be dependent upon a single source of energy or a single group of suppliers, be it a cartel of countries or a cartel of businesses.

Budget cuts in urban development, transportation and essential municipal services ignore their integral role in building the nation's economic competitiveness by providing the base for reindustrialization.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Mar. 4, 1981, to the House Budget Committee.

and assist economic growth and development. These cuts would result in a 1982 reduction of $166 million in home financing and $630 million for community development, representing losses of about 41,000 man years of work. In total, loan obligations would be cut by $2,935 million, greatly setting back economic development, provision of housing, family farm operations and disaster relief in rural areas.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

Budget Cut: $98 million

Outlays by the Small Business Administration in 1982 would be reduced about $100 million for business loans and $16 million for technical assistance. More significant would be a reduction of $1.5 billion in loan guarantee commitment authority. SBA makes and guarantees business loans and provides technical assistance for newly developing small business, giving special attention to minority-owned business. The proposed cutbacks would decrease job creation for which small business is a major source, and minority-owned businesses would be particularly affected.

NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK

Budget Cut: $133 million

The entire $133 million of outlays proposed for 1982 for the National Consumer Cooperative Bank would be eliminated. This action would close a source of financing for cooperatives that was established about a year ago and is just getting started. Many areas in which consumers could benefit from formation of cooperatives, such as in housing, day care centers for working mothers, and prepaid medical care, would not be supported.

HUD REHABILITATION LOAN FUND

Budget Cut: $199 million

Job Loss: 4,000

The HUD rehabilitation loan fund would be terminated, 1981 budget authority rescinded, and no funds authorized for future years. Providing below-market interest rate federal loans to rehabilitate older housing and some commercial properties is vital to urban areas. The loans are used mostly to help low-income homeowners, conserve older properties and neighborhoods and thus reduce the need for new construction expenditures. Termination of this program would lead to a net reduction of rehabilitation activity, a net loss of housing and more inflationary pressures on home prices and rents. It would also mean about 4,000 man-years less of construction employment.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

Budget Cut: $1,152 million

Job Loss: 158,000

Loan guarantee commitments for rural electric cooperatives would be reduced by $5.5 billion. The Reagan Administration would stop origination of REA-guaranteed loans by the Federal Financing Bank to electric cooperatives and to telephone companies and cooperatives. This would result in increased production costs for farmers and higher prices of farm products that would add to inflation. A slowdown in rural utility construction would also add to unemployment.

SUBSIDIZED HOUSING

Budget Cut: $138 million

Job Loss: 51,000

The Administration proposes to cut outlays for 1982 rent subsidies by $119 million, increasing rental costs of low-income tenants. In addition, cuts of $8.7 billion are proposed in program level authorization, which would reduce support of new units and the leasing of additional existing units. Instead of supporting a total of 260,000 units in fiscal 1982, as under the Carter Budget, there would be budget authority for only 175,000 subsidized units. Instead of authorizing 130,000 new units, there would be only about 79,000 new units. This reduction of 51,000 new units would mean the loss of about 51,000 man-years of work.

PUBLIC HOUSING MODERNIZATION

Budget Cut: $500 million

Job Loss: 13,000

The program authority to modernize and conserve the stock of low-income public housing would be reduced one fourth or by $500 million in 1982. This is justified by the Administration on an assumption that there will be a reduction of inflation-caused increases in operating costs for public housing. For the longer run, it will mean further deterioration of a valuable publicly-owned asset. For 1982, the $500 million cutback in the program level will mean a loss of approximately 13,000 jobs.

More than 1.2 million jobs will go down the drain.

This massive dismantling of federal programs and jobs can be stopped if Senators and Representatives are urged by the voters back home to oppose in every way they can the destruction of programs detailed in these four pages.

Natural Resources And Environment

Fiscal 1982 outlays for the natural resources and environment function would be reduced by about $2 billion or 14 percent from the level of the budget proposed in January through a variety of reductions, including water resource construction and municipal waste treatment grants. The budget revisions propose a moratorium on Federal land purchases and elimination of major grant programs for recreation land acquisition and development and historic preservation.

WATER RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

Budget Cut: $230 million

Job Loss: 2,000

The Administration proposes a 15 percent reduction in planned construction for water resources programs, primarily involving recreation area, flood control and irrigation deliveries. About one-fourth of all projects would be delayed. Funding would be eliminated for the Water Resources Council and the Office of Water Research & Technology.

WATER PURIFICATION

Budget Cut: $290 million

Job Loss: 91,000

The Administration proposes to reduce funds for the municipal waste treatment grant program at a time when water supply problems are becoming critical in many regions of the country. This would cut budget outlays $290 million and budget authority $3.7 billion in 1982, severely crippling the program for years to come.

Energy

Energy research and development programs outside the nuclear area and conservation programs would be sharply cut back by the Administration. These cuts would seriously retard the nation's efforts to reduce reliance on imported oil and to deal with hardships due to price increases and supply disruptions.

SYNTHETIC FUELS SUBSIDIES

Budget Cut: $789 million

Job Loss: 91,000

Outlays of $263 million for fiscal 1981 would be rescinded and $789 million for fiscal 1982 would be cut. The Administration would eliminate nearly all direct subsidies for a half-dozen major synthetic fuels projects supported by Dept. of Energy, transferring them to the Synthetic Fuels Corp., which may or may not provide loan guarantees. This would rescind Synthetic Fuels Corp. funding support for a proposed TVA coal gasification plant, and other demonstration projects that have been approved. The cuts would set back the construction of large-scale synfuels production capacity by several years and would discourage a number of investments in large-scale synfuels production. These subsidies would have assisted at least $4.2 billion in plant construction in 1982 and 91,000 man-years of work.

OTHER ENERGY SUPPLY PROGRAMS

Budget Cut: $196 million

A one-forth reduction in outlays is proposed. There would be significant reductions in funds for research and development for geothermal, hydropower, electric energy systems and energy storage systems. The geothermal loan guarantee program would be terminated. Funds would be slashed for research and demonstration projects to analyze health and environmental effects of different energy policies and programs. Energy impact assistance, badly needed by coal and oil shale development "boomtowns," would be eliminated. Uranium resource evaluation field work needed to assess the availability of domestic uranium reserves would be phased out.

SOLAR ENERGY & ENERGY CONSERVATION BANK

Budget Cut: $134 million

Job Loss: 2,700

The Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank program, administered by HUD, would be terminated. It promotes the use of passive solar design features in new residences and active solar systems for new and existing homes and buildings. The energy conservation subsidies are primarily for low- to moderate-income households.

SOLAR ENERGY

Budget Cut: $380 million

Job Loss: 2,500

A 69-percent cut would be made in solar research, development, and demonstration projects. This, combined with the cut of the solar bank, would cripple an important alternative energy source.

ENERGY REGULATION

Budget Cut: $179 million

Scheduled for elimination are the coal conversion program requiring utilities to shift to coal; programs that help state public utility commissions review utility rate reforms and conservation investments; state grants for emergency preparedness planning; and emergency gasoline rationing.

LOW INCOME-ENERGY ASSISTANCE

Budget Cut: $390 million

The Administration would fold this program in with several others and cut total funding by about 27 percent. The low-income assistance program was funded at $1,850 million in 1981. A 27-percent cut would amount to $390 million. The program helps poor people pay their heating bills, using a portion of the windfall profits tax to alleviate the impact of oil deregulation.

NUCLEAR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

The Energy budget contains an additional $200 million for nuclear research and development to get the Clinch River Breeder reactor program under way.

FOSSIL ENERGY PROGRAMS

Budget Cut: $321 million

Job Loss: 4,600

Research and development in fossil fuels would be cut in half, including projects in coal liquifaction and gasification, oil shale and tar sands. An estimated 4,600 jobs could be affected.

ALCOHOL FUELS/BIOMASS ASSISTANCE

(Dept. of the Treasury Administers)

Budget Cut: $122 million

Support for alcohol fuels and biomass energy would be terminated.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

Budget Cut: $442 million

Job Loss: 17,000

Energy conservation programs would be cut by 59 percent. The Administration would rely on accelerated oil and gas price decontrol to induce conservation. Programs affected include technology development for energy from urban waste, more efficient consumer products and improved automotive engines and industrial processes. Funding would also be eliminated for low-income home weatherization assistance, which alone would cost 12,000 jobs.

Income Support

The Reagan Administration is proposing a wide range of budget reductions that would reduce significantly the Federal government's level of support for the income security of its citizens.

FOOD STAMPS

Budget Cut: $2,304 million

The Administration proposal would cut food stamps by more than 18 percent. The program provides economically disadvantaged Americans an average of little more than $1 a day—38 cents per meal—for food. Ninety percent of the recipients have incomes below the poverty line, 80 percent are children, and 13 percent are elderly or disabled. Of the 22 million individuals receiving such aid nearly 15 million need it to supplement their meager benefits from AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) and SSI (Supplemental Security Income).

Unless an additional $1.4 billion is appropriated for the current fiscal year, the entire program will collapse by July. Cuts would include lower benefits for low-income families with children receiving free school meals—43 percent of food stamp recipients—a program designed to supplement, not duplicate, food stamps. Escalating fuel and housing costs would no longer be figured into entitlement formulas, seriously hurting the elderly and working poor families who use food stamps. Other measures would reduce or eliminate benefits to the working poor and deny benefits to the newly unemployed or those whose unemployment insurance has been terminated.

CHILD NUTRITION

Budget Cut: $1,530 million

The Administration proposes to cut by over 40 percent programs that provide school lunches and breakfasts, meals at day care centers, summer programs and nutritional supplements to low-income pregnant and nursing women and infants at nutritional risk. The official budget reduction is estimated at approximately $1.5 billion, but authoritative estimates show that $2 billion is more accurate. The amount of the subsidy varies with family income. The cuts will have a particularly severe effect on poor children attending inner-city schools.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Budget Cut: $2,520 million

The Administration would cut disability insurance by 3 percent for 1982, restricting benefits or removing eligibility altogether for 55,000 now receiving these benefits; eliminate the social security minimum benefit affecting 1.5 million beneficiaries; eliminate the lump-sum death benefit for about 700,000 deceased workers without a surviving spouse or child, and phase out benefits for surviving children who are full-time students, age 18 through 21. Some 200,000 students would lose benefits immediately and another 560,000 would be cut off over four years. About three million persons would lose benefits altogether or undergo cutbacks in benefit levels. These cutbacks of social security protection provisions for workers and their families would be most harmful to widows, the disabled, the young and the poor.

AID TO FAMILIES WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN

Budget Cut: $636 million

The Administration proposes to cut Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) by about one-sixth. AFDC provides monthly payments ranging from $29 a month per person in Mississippi to $125 a month in California to 10.7 million individuals, 7.4 million of whom are children. While proposed cuts in other programs, including CETA and unemployment insurance, will force large numbers of people to seek welfare assistance, AFDC will also have been reduced. Mothers on AFDC with children 3 years of age or over would be forced into part-time make work jobs (so-called "workfare") in which they will receive no wages but will simply work off their welfare payments.

Generous to Whom?

We do not believe that the nation has been too generous in helping the poor, the disadvantaged and the unemployed. We believe the Administration's proposal is too generous in supporting the wealthy and the powerful.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Mar. 4, 1981, to the House Budget Committee.

The Budget estimate of the cut is apparently a gross understatement. HHS estimates the cut at about $1.2 billion.

MEDICAID

Budget Cut: $944 million

A cut of 8 percent would be imposed on Medicaid, the health program most directly targeted to the needy. More than half those eligible for its health services have incomes below the poverty level of about $3,600 for a single person and $7,400 for a family of four. If Medicaid is slashed, the inability of the poor to pay for health care could increase chronic illness, mortality and disability, particularly of children. This could affect 22 million persons now receiving Medicaid.

NATIONAL INSTITUTES OF HEALTH

Budget Cut: $73 million

There is a $73 million reduction in the NIH budget base for 1982, involving a broad spectrum of program cuts.

The leadership of the United States in advances in basic biomedical knowledge is recognized throughout the world. Almost all this basic research is funded by the National Institutes of Health. Privately funded research cannot be expected to finance this research.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Budget Cut: $1,836 million

The Administration's proposal would cut 25 percent from the amounts available in programs to provide life sustaining services to the aged, blind, disabled, poor and children. Included in the consolidation would be the activities presently carried on by local agencies, funded by the Community Services Administration, to make the poor self-sufficient, such as job training and instruction on food and nutrition. The Administration would give states discretion as to how to distribute the remaining funds, eliminating all federal minimum standards and doing away with any accountability by states as to how the federal funds are used. State and local governments would be forced to assume the entire burden for increased caseloads and future inflation.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY & HEALTH

Budget Cut: $27 million

A $27-million cutback would constitute a one-third reduction in the funds available to the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health in 1982. All NIOSH training of professionals for evaluation of health hazards at the workplace would be brought to a halt, and evaluation would be curtailed along with research on toxic substances to which workers are exposed. These fund reductions would be reflected in reductions in the health, safety and lives of workers.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE HOSPITALS

Budget Cut: $82 million

Since 1798, merchant seamen and their dependents have received medical care by the Public Health Service. Such services have been provided by a network of public service hospitals and clinics. During recent years this program has been curtailed from 23 to 8 hospitals. The Administration proposes to close down the remaining hospitals and clinics, which also provide care for low-income people in their areas.

HEALTH PLANNING

Budget Cut: $45 million

The Administration proposes phasing out health planning by the end of fiscal year 1983. Though health planning is federally financed, it delegates almost complete power over the planning and development of health facilities to the states and local planning agencies, which help restrain costs by controlling duplication of facilities and equipment.

NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE CORPS

Budget Cut: $38 million

No new scholarships for medical students would be awarded under this program, which offers tuition and living stipends in exchange for later service in areas of the country that are short of physicians. Scholarships and loans are also directed to those who intend to specialize in primary care, family practice, internal medicine or pediatrics.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Budget Cut: $238 million

The Administration proposes a 60-percent slash in extended unemployment insurance benefits (EB), imposing a severe hardship on 1.2 million long-term jobless workers with long and firm attachment to the labor force.

The proposed cutbacks include: (1) eliminating the national "trigger" requiring payment of extended benefits all over the country when the insured unemployment rate reaches 4.5 percent (the equivalent of a total unemployment rate of 7.5 percent or more); (2) removing EB recipients from national and state unemployment figures used to trigger EB benefits; (3) increasing the optional state trigger from 5 percent to 6 percent; and (4) denying extended benefits to anyone with less than 20 weeks of qualifying unemployment.

In addition, the Administration has proposed that all recipients of unemployment insurance benefits, regardless of their skills or experience, be forced to accept any job paying as much as the minimum wage or the unemployment benefits, whichever is higher.

Finally, ex-service members who leave the military service voluntarily after July 1, 1981 would no longer be eligible for unemployment compensation. Those who choose not to re-enlist would have no protection while they are seeking jobs.

While the official budget reduction is estimated at $238 million, official Labor Dept. estimates are that $1,456 million is more realistic.

BLACK LUNG TRUST FUND

Budget Cut: $378 million

The Black Lung Disability Trust Fund is to be cut by 78 percent. The fund compensates miners suffering from pneumoconiosis or black lung, a disabling disease caused by inhalation of coal and other mineral dust. The Reagan Administration cuts would come through much stricter eligibility requirements.

TRADE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE (TAA)

Budget Cut: $1,150 million

A 77-percent cut is proposed in TAA, which pays benefits in addition to unemployment insurance to workers when increases of imports "contribute importantly" to their job losses. Benefits cover 70 percent of prior weekly wages up to a maximum benefit of $269 for 52 weeks. Workers over 60 years of age or in approved training can draw 26 additional weeks. Administration proposal would limit TAA payments to people who have exhausted U.I. eligibility, cap weekly TAA payments at the maximum U.I. amount, and limit total U.I. and TAA payments to a maximum of 52 weeks. The projected budget cuts would mean a two-thirds reduction in the weekly benefits and purchasing power of TAA recipients and a one-third reduction in the period of payments. It would reduce the benefits to below the poverty level, and greatly increase the losses from long-run unemployment for hundreds of thousands of workers.

A Costly Roll Of the Dice

The Reagan budget constitutes the most costly roll of the dice ever proposed for this nation by economic policymakers. On the line are the living standards of millions of working Americans, the unemployed and the poor, the opportunity for energy security and the hope of reviving the nation's industries and cities.

The Administration is gambling with the well-being of those who can ill afford to gamble in order to provide a sure winner for the wealthy who are not asked to take any of the risk.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Mar. 4, 1981, to the House Budget Committee.

Federal Employees

Contrary to popular belief, federal employment has been declining over the years, despite the rising number of government programs and the country's population growth. As of 1980, there were 2,161,000 federal employees and 660,000 post office employees. Of the federal employees, 28,000 were workers under special work-opportunity programs. A large portion of regular federal civilian employment, over 43 percent, is in the Dept. of Defense.

The Reagan Administration plans large cutbacks in federal civilian employment (except for Defense, which would be increased), and reductions in the federal subsidy to the Post Office. Stepped-up contracting with the private sector for needed goods and services will be encouraged. The Administration also plans changes in the "pay comparability" program that would produce smaller increases for federal workers.

FEDERAL CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT

Job Loss: 43,100

The budget cuts in federal employment will be accomplished through program cuts and lower agency staffing levels. The cuts will fall entirely on civilian agencies, where 63,100 jobs will be eliminated from the 1982 level projected in the Carter Administration budget. However, 20,000 civilian jobs will be added at the Defense Dept., so that the net government-wide reduction would be 43,100.

PAY COMPARABILITY

Budget Cut: $300 million

The Reagan program incorporates pay comparability changes proposed by the Carter Administration, so that the cuts from the Carter budget estimates are relatively small (about $300 million), but the combined effect of Carter and Reagan proposals is very large—about $3.7 billion.

Under the Carter proposals, adjustments in the method of figuring comparability include: "Total compensation" comparisons, rather than pay rates only; adding state and local government pay in the comparisons; setting white collar pay on a locality basis; changing the blue collar wage system; reducing protection under federal premium pay laws; and introducing "pay flexibility" for management purposes. In addition, the Administration would set comparability at 94 percent of average non-federal compensation and require agencies to absorb 40 percent of the cost increase of higher salaries, rather than 30 percent. As a result the estimated pay increase for "comparability" is 4.8 percent in the Reagan Budget, as against 5.5 percent in the Carter Budget.

POSTAL SUBSIDY

Budget Cut: $250 million

Job Loss: N.A.

The Reagan Budget would cut outlays for the Postal Service by about 17 percent in 1982, producing higher costs for users and adverse effects on mail deliveries and jobs.

In addition, the amount of revenue foregone represented by the subsidy for non-profit mail would be cut $289 million. The effect would be a doubling of postage costs for non-profit organizations, effective Oct. 1, 1981.

Additional Programs

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Budget Cut: $1,100 million

Aid to poor countries through the Agency for International Development, the Peace Corps and food aid programs would be reduced about $300 million, and contributions to international funds previously committed would be stretched out for another $200 million reduction in 1982 outlays. In total, it would be a 7 percent reduction.

A 7-percent or $800 million reduction is proposed in international affairs outlays primarily through assumed lower interest rates, requiring less subsidy of Export-Import Bank loans, and through slower disbursements of such loans and of contributions to international organizations. There would also be a reduction in lending authority.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Budget Cut: $236 million

This program provides credit support to promote sales of American goods and services overseas. It makes direct loans to purchasers, guarantees private loans and provides loan insurance against defaults on loans to foreign purchasers. The bank's activities are concentrated in some areas where American producers must compete against government-subsidized foreign companies, most notably overseas aircraft sales and large construction projects. The program changes would mean higher financing costs and a weaker competitive position for U.S. airplane manufacturers.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Budget Cut: $8 million

The Administration is proposing a 40-percent staff reduction in the Federal Trade Commission by 1986 by phasing out the regional offices and decreasing the headquarters office. The FTC helps prevent the free enterprise system from being stifled by monopolistic and unfair or deceptive practices. Both the FTC's antitrust and consumer protection functions would be substantially weakened and the burden would be at least shifted to state and local government consumer agencies and other federal agencies, such as the Justice Dept.

GENERAL SCIENCE, SPACE AND TECHNOLOGY

Outlays in 1982 for activities of the National Aeronautics & Space Agency (NASA) and the National Science Foundation that are supported under this function would be cut about $600 million or 8 percent.

NASA

Budget Cut: $428 million

For fiscal 1982, there is a 7-percent reduction in funding for NASA space activities. Reductions affect the development of Spacelab, elimination of funding for the solar electric propulsion system and rescheduling of space science flight projects. There will be a deferral of projects such as the gamma ray observatory spacecraft, the Venus orbiting imaging radar project and spacelab experiments. There would also be deletion and reductions in space applications and general support activities.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Budget Cut: $209 million

National Science Foundation 1982 outlays would be cut $209 million, or 15 percent. Programs that would be reduced or eliminated would include those in science and engineering education and in the behavioral, social and economic sciences. University laboratory modernization grants would be deferred. The cuts thus would retard the development of human capital trained for scientific work and basic laboratory research.

JUSTICE

Program cuts for the Justice Dept. and legal aid programs total about $500 million, or 10 percent. The main reduction is accomplished through elimination of $312 million in outlays for the Legal Services Corp., which would disappear into the social services block grant for states. The corporation is the largest provider of legal aid for people unable to afford it. It has helped people to assert rights with respect to government programs, while assisting with rent disputes, family troubles, and creditor problems.

CONSUMER PRODUCT SAFETY COMMISSION

Budget Cut: $14 million

The $14-million cut for the Consumer Product Safety Commission would reduce its funds by about 30 percent in 1982. CPSC performs an important consumer protection function in identifying dangerous consumer products (including children's toys) developing product safety standards, and removing extremely hazardous products from the market.

Public Hearing Rule Ignored

Oil Decontrol Shortcut Adds $11.7 Billion to Consumer Costs

The following article is from the New York Times op-ed page of Mar. 19, 1981. It was written by David I. Greenberg and Ann K. Lower, who are on the staff of the Consumer Federation of America.

WHEN PRESIDENT REAGAN decontrolled crude oil, gasoline, and home-heating oil, he did so without formal counsel from Congress and the public. His desire to act on his own came at the expense of public hearing requirements set out in The Economic Stabilization Act of 1971, which Congress later incorporated into statutes governing oil price controls.

The Administration's accelerated decontrol program also comes at great expense to consumers. It provides an immediate 1 percent increase in inflation, and by the end of fiscal 1981 it will have added $11.7 billion to the price of oil products.

IF OUR EXPERIENCE with oil decontrol has taught us anything, it is the wisdom of public cross-examination of presidential oil-pricing initiatives. In 1979, Secretary of Energy James R. Schlesinger estimated that decontrol would cost consumers $16 billion between June 1979 and September 1981. Later, congressional hearings forced the Carter Administration to raise its estimate to $48.9 billion for that period.

Under scrutiny, Jimmy Carter's promise of only a three-tenths of 1 percent rise in the consumer price index by September 1981 also proved fanciful. A House subcommittee demonstrated that the impact of energy price increases added nearly 4 percent to inflation in 1979.

Reagan has offered the public a set of decontrol promises that also borders on the fanciful. These forecasts underscore Congress's wisdom in requiring public hearings "to the maximum extent possible."

When Reagan signed the Executive Order Jan. 28, his advisers projected retail price increases from "almost nothing" to 3 cents to 5 cents per gallon of gasoline. "That was ridiculous," said John Lichtblau, executive director of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation. "They were wrong within a week." Actually, they were wrong within two days. On Jan. 30, Standard Oil of California increased wholesale gasoline prices by 6 cents and home-heating oil by 5 cents as a "direct result" of decontrol.

WITHIN TWO WEEKS, gasoline prices rose an average of 7 cents and the price of jet fuel had airline companies clamoring for fare increases. The Congressional Budget Office projected increases of 9 cents a gallon of gasoline at the pump by the end of the first month. Today, consumers are paying an average of 10 cents a gallon more. At minimum, then, the impact of decontrol will be double the Reagan team's projections.

A similar fate appears to await Administration estimates of increased production, as well as Energy Secretary James B. Edwards's projected savings of 50,000 to 100,000 barrels of oil per day.

Even the industry greeted these promises with skepticism. A Gulf Oil executive put Reagan's "increased incentives" argument into perspective: "There aren't too many rigs unoccupied currently," said Charles Campbell, a senior vice president. And Lichtblau said that he anticipated only slight improvements in both production and conservation.

THESE COMMENTS fit the reality of oil economics. While the price of crude oil has jumped 1,600 percent in the last 10 years, the number of exploratory wells in the United States has risen only 10 percent.

Ultimately, the Administration's decision to forgo hearings on decontrol makes political sense. No President wants to defend an inflationary energy program that produces neither exploration nor conservation.

What the President's program will produce is tax revenues in fiscal 1981 and 1982—a projected $7.9 billion in corporate income taxes and windfall profits that oil companies collect from consumers. But a President who cherishes his tax-cutting image is unlikely to seek public comment on a tax plan posing as energy policy.

In the end, President Reagan only hastened the challenge to decontrol.

The challenge began a few weeks later. On Feb. 26, Federal District Judge Harold H. Greene heard arguments in a lawsuit filed by Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum of Ohio, Rep. Toby Moffett of Connecticut, New York State, the Consumer Federation of America, and others that sought to overturn the decontrol order. On Mar. 5, Judge Greene refused to reverse the President's action, ruling that the plaintiffs had failed to meet the heavy legal burden required to support an injunction.

STILL, THE PLAINTIFFS scored on two important points. First, Judge Greene affirmed that the President lacked unfettered discretion to order decontrol without hearings; second, he recognized that injury to consumers "clearly appears to exist."

That economic injury will form the basis of a broader challenge to accelerated decontrol. The challenge will come from consumers, as they feel the pinch of energy costs and energy-fueled inflation. At that point, Reagan may well wish he had stayed in closer step with the law.

Targeted Relief Needed

Tax Cut Scheme Fails to Focus On Specific Industry Problems

THE ADMINISTRATION'S business tax cut proposal would apply an across-the-board solution to economic problems that are sharply different in specific industries and areas of the nation, AFL-CIO economist Arnold Cantor said.

Basic industries such as steel, autos, rubber and others have been "severely hurt by unfair foreign competition, changes in demand and a variety of other factors," Cantor noted. But, he pointed out, the Administration's across-the-board approach "goes on the basis that everyone is in the same shape." He said that unless the relief is targeted to industries and areas where it is most needed, less than half of the cut will go to additional investment in U.S. industries.

"At least 60 cents of every dollar" of the business tax cut that the Administration proposes will probably be used for corporate mergers and takeovers, overseas investments or speculation, but "none of these things do anything to boost productivity" and create jobs, he declared.

Cantor said on the network radio interview Labor News Conference that the individual tax cuts that the President is urging Congress to approve also lack balance and fairness.

THERE IS "an elegant facade of equity" in a 10 percent across-the-board cut for all taxpayers, regardless of their income level. He pointed out that under this plan, an average factory worker who makes $12,000 a year would get $92, but a $100,000 annual income earner would get $1,840.

There is "a huge risk" in the Administration's tax program, Cantor warned, and those who are taking that risk "are the people who are going to be severely hurt by the budget cuts"—low- and moderate-income taxpayers who have been hit hard by inflation and increased social security taxes.

Reporters questioning Cantor on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Ben Rathbun of Daily Labor Report and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. Labor News Conference is broadcast weekly on Mutual radio.

Washington Window

IN THE ORGY of budget-cutting pushed by the Reagan Administration and embraced by conservatives of both parties on Capitol Hill, the reasons usually given are the need to cut waste and fight inflation. So it seems odd that President Reagan and his advisers want to abolish the Legal Services Corp., a model of efficiency and integrity in serving the poor.

The idea of equal justice under law is part of the very foundation upon which this nation rests. In 1963, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the cost of a defense lawyer can make some people more equal than others. In hearing Gideon vs. Wainwright, the high court ruled that people charged with a crime who are not able to afford a lawyer must be provided one at public expense. This decision inspired the public defenders system in criminal law.

However, the cost of legal aid still prevented some people from being equal under civil law. Recognizing this disparity, the American Bar Association, in 1965, under the leadership of its then-president Lewis F. Powell—now Supreme Court Justice—adopted a resolution calling for federal legal services in civil cases. The ABA pledged at that time to cooperate with the federal Office of Economic Opportunity to make civil legal services available to the poor.

IN 1974 CONGRESS created the Legal Services Corp. to "provide high quality legal assistance to those who would otherwise be unable to afford adequate legal counsel."

Legal Services distributes funds to local and state programs to meet the legal needs of poor people in housing problems, consumer disputes, family law matters and other civil law problems.

In 1981, the more than 6,000 lawyers employed in 323 local and state programs handled over 1.5 million cases. The federal appropriation for the programs is about $321 million. Since there are about 30 million poor people in the United States, the federal appropriation works out to about $10 per person. Only about 3 percent of its budget goes for administrative costs.

The maximum income levels to qualify for help from Legal Services are $4,738 per year for an individual or $9,313 for a family of four.

LEGAL SERVICES helps poor people with problems like these—often without having to go to court.

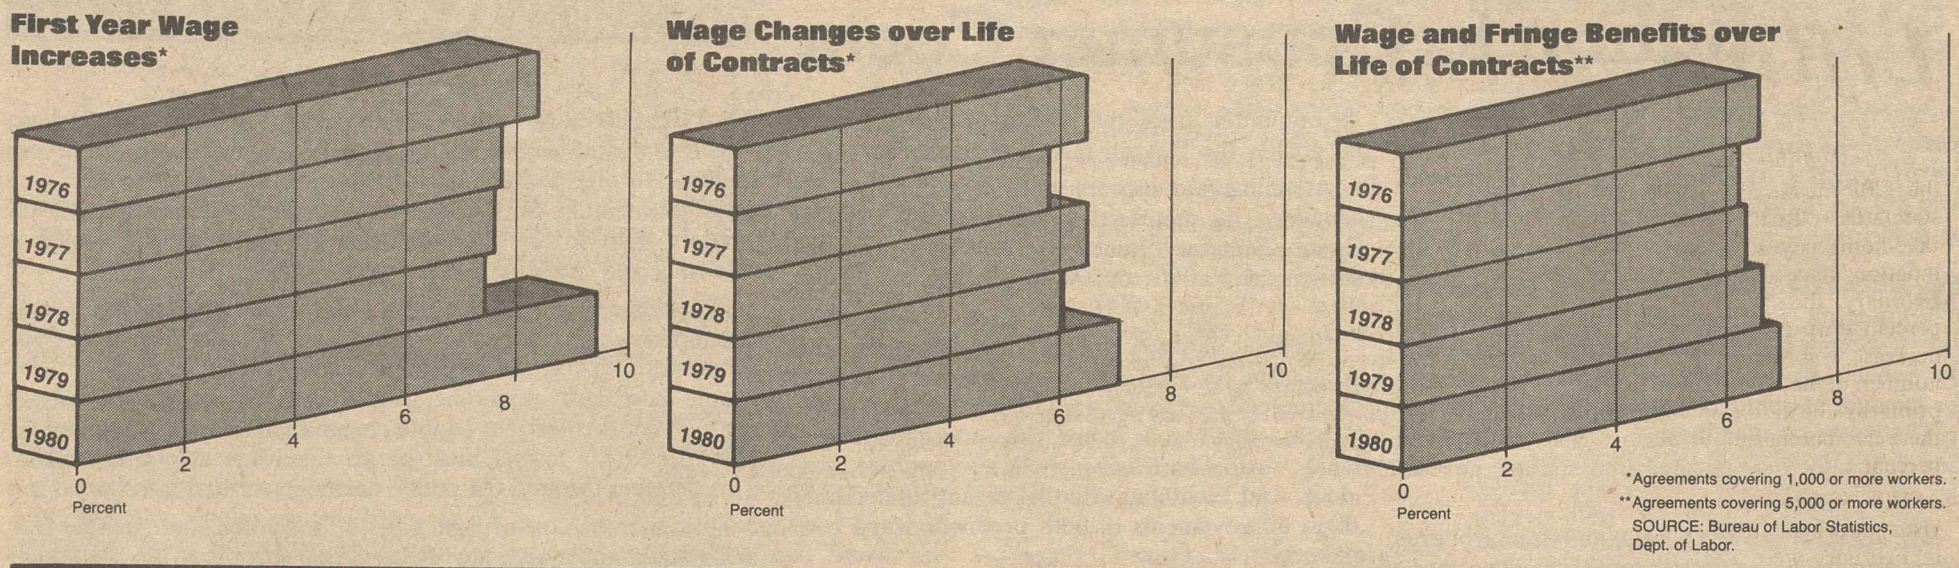
If Legal Services is providing equal access under the law to poor people at a comparatively small cost and is doing it efficiently, why is the Administration seeking to destroy the corporation?

Some are convinced the motive is political.

During Reagan's first term as governor of California, he sought to cut funds for state welfare and medical aid to the poor. California Rural Legal Services lawyers representing the poor, forced 21 counties in that state to broaden food stamp and school lunch programs and to restore the cuts.

Following his loss in this battle in 1970, Reagan vetoed a $1.8 million federal grant from the OEO to Rural Legal Assistance on the grounds that the poverty law agency had "misused taxpayers funds and . . . failed in its mandated purpose of serving the true civil legal needs of the poor."

However, a commission appointed by OEO to investigate Reagan's claims called the California Rural Services agency "competent, efficient and exemplary," with not a "shred of evidence showing actual misconduct." The grant was restored.



The Administration does not say outright that it is against legal services for the poor. Rather it is lumping funds for that and dozens of other programs into block grants, cutting the total, and turning the job over to the states and localities. They are then free to fund their own legal services programs. The Catch 22 is that the federal agency has battled many of these same governments on behalf of the poor.

ACROSS-THE-BOARD business tax cuts that the Administration is proposing will not ease the economic problems of specific industries, AFL-CIO economist Arnold Cantor, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned in the public affairs interview by Robert Cooney, left, Press Associates, Inc., and Ben Rathbun of the Daily Labor Report. The program is broadcast weekly on the Mutual radio network.

Wage Catch-Up Heads '81 Bargaining Agenda

Collective bargaining on major contracts this year will affect an estimated 2.6 million workers, a lighter schedule than in either 1979 or 1980.

The prognosis for 1981 is for more of the same problems—trying to keep up with inflation, says Arne Anderson, research associate in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research in the current issue of the American Federationist.

IN 1980, collective bargaining faced a relentless treadmill, Anderson notes. Inflation, as measured by the federal government's consumer price index, was up 12.5 percent—the second highest annual rate in over 30 years, behind only the 13.4 percent increase of 1979. Over the year, real average weekly earnings—take-home pay stripped of inflation since 1967—fell 3.8 percent. During the last two years, workers' purchasing power has declined by 10 percent.

At the same time, last year's unemployment situation was bad, and has not really improved that much so far this year. The nation's jobless rate rose from 6 percent in December 1979 to 7.6 percent last May. Since May, the jobless rate has fluctuated between 7.4 and 7.6 percent, for the most part, declining to 7.3 percent only last month.

"Because of the economic conditions, collective bargaining in 1980 was a year of scrambling to keep even," the article in the federation's monthly magazine observes. Workers under major private collective bargaining agreements—defined as those involving 1,000 or more employees —received an average first-year wage increase of 9.5 percent last year — way behind the cost of living. While the figure does not include adjustments under escalator clauses, COL provisions were unable to make up for all the purchasing power lost by workers.

"Roughly 61 percent of the workers in 1980 settlements were covered by some form of COLA provision," Anderson notes. "The average 1980 gain negotiated by all COLA clauses, both current and previously negotiated, was 7.3 percent, or less than 60 percent of the actual increase in the cost of living."

THE 2.6 MILLION workers covered by major 1981 bargaining compares with about 3.7 million in each of the two previous years. The major industries where bargaining takes place this year are railroads, mining, postal service, airlines, maritime, West Coast longshoring, and construction. The two largest units involve 570,000 employees of the U.S. Postal Service and 438,000 railway workers under contract with the nation's major railroads.

In 1981, about 6.1 million workers are slated to receive an average 7.3 percent increase under previously negotiated pacts. This compares to a 6.7 percent deferred increase for almost 5 million workers last year. The hikes excluded COL adjustments. Deferred 1981 increases will average 7 percent in manufacturing, 7.7 percent in non-manufacturing, and 9.6 percent in construction.

EXAMINING THE leading trends of last year's bargaining, Anderson notes that pension plans gained added importance. As hard hit by inflation as wages, pension benefits were improved wherever possible.

The Machinists, for example, raised pension rates at Lockheed from $12.60 to $14 per month per year of service prior to 1981. For each year worked after 1981, the rate will rise from $14 to $17. In 1983, the monthly benefit for past service will go up an additional $1 per year of service.

Although court rulings have held that issues relating to retired workers are not mandatory bargaining issues, current retirees were not neglected in last year's bargaining. The Steelworkers, for instance, secured pension increases of 10 to 70 percent for past retirees from the nation's major steel firms. Those who retired before July 31, 1966, received the full 70 percent boost. The USWA and other unions also negotiated major increases for new retirees in their settlements in the copper and aluminum industries.

Escalating medical costs also increased the need for protection, which often took the form of higher major medical, improved coverage, and dental plans, Anderson notes. Along with wider coverage, higher employer contributions to health and welfare funds were negotiated.

PLANT CLOSINGS made job security and severance conditions another prime issue in bargaining last year. In its three-year contract with A&P, the Food & Commercial Workers won a provision that gives workers a $300 lump sum payment for each consecutive year of employment if a store is closed and the worker was hired before Aug. 7, 1971.

Attendance and paid leave time were connected in a contract provision between the UAW and the J. I. Case Co. Employees with one to 10 years of seniority will receive 1.5 bonus hours for each week of perfect attendance and an additional 3.75 hours for every consecutive five weeks of perfect attendance.

For workers with 10 to 20 years of service, the bonus goes to two hours a week with five hours for five weeks of perfect attendance. For workers with over 20 years of service, the bonus hours go to three and 7.5, respectively. The worker can take up 80 hours in paid leave per year, and receive pay for the excess.

In other areas, better vacations were achieved through shortened eligibility requirements; work conditions, grievance procedure, and union security improved; prepaid group legal plans adopted, and educational leave approved. Also, some smaller contracts provided unique fringe benefits not found in major contracts.

Reagan Budget Cut to Inflate Nonprofit Press Postal Rates

Detroit—Every member of Congress should quickly be made aware that one of the Reagan Administration's proposed budget cuts would seriously jeopardize the continued existence of much of the nation's nonprofit publications, the International Labor Press Association's executive council declared here.

The proposed slashes, unless restored, would result in the immediate doubling, and more, on Oct. 1, 1981, of second- and third-class postage rates for nonprofit publications.

Among those affected would be newspapers, newsletters and magazines published by churches, veterans' and farm groups, educational and charitable institutions and community organizations as well as unions at all levels—from locals through internationals.

THE DOUBLING of the rates would occur through the Administration's proposal to eliminate appropriations mandated by Congress in 1970 and 1974 to phase in over 16 years steep increases in nonprofit mailers' postage so that it will cover costs directly attributable to their publications' delivery, the ILPA council noted in a "statement of concern."

Nonprofit publications' postage rates have increased by about 1,500 percent in the last ten years—the largest percentage increase of any class of mailer—and under the phase-in program are due to double again by 1987.

THE ILPA'S mailing consultant, Edwin M. Schmidt, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Reproduction, Mailings & Subscriptions, projected the increases several unions' publications would face Oct. 1 under the Reagan budget:

- More than 150 percent, to just over $2,000 per issue, for an eight-page tabloid newspaper with 25,000 circulation.
- More than 130 percent, to over $8,200 per issue, for a magazine of 100,000 circulation.
- Just over 100 percent, to $19,400 per issue, for a tabloid of 325,000 circulation.

"Since enactment of the Pony Express statutes" circulation of the printed word in the mails has been treated as "a public service to be promoted by the government," the ILPA council declared.

"The freedom of speech of nonprofit organizations would be seriously jeopardized by the high cost of postage" if the Reagan proposal to eliminate the nonprofit rate phase-in appropriation is allowed to stand, the ILPA said.

Real Wages Drop

Price Surge Follows Lifting of Oil Controls

the CPI meant another decline in living standards. "Real" spendable earnings—take-home pay adjusted for the impact of inflation since 1967—fell 1.5 percent in February, the largest decline since a 2.4 percent drop in April 1979. Last month's decrease was helped by a decline in the number of hours people worked, but was primarily the result of higher prices. Over the year, purchasing power was down 4.4 percent.

The average earnings of all non-supervisory workers in private, non-farm jobs in February were $247.46 a week in current dollars. Adjusted for inflation, however, the average worker's "real" weekly pay was only $93.66. January's comparable figures were $249.21 and $95.19.

The sharp increase in petroleum-product prices last month far outweighed price advances for other goods and services. Food and beverage prices were up only two-tenths of 1 percent, after declining by that much in January. Shelter costs increased six-tenths of 1 percent, compared to seven-tenths of 1 percent the month before. Apparel and upkeep costs rose five-tenths of 1 percent after gaining by three-tenths of 1 percent in January.

THE BIG increase in gasoline prices last month pushed the CPI's transportation component up 2.4 percent, the largest advance in 12 months. Automobile finance charges continued to rise, although by less than in recent months. Used car prices rose five-tenths of 1 percent. Prices for new cars, softened by rebate programs of domestic automakers, declined one-tenth of 1 percent, following an increase of one-tenth of 1 percent in January.

About three-fourths of the six-tenths of 1 percent increase in the housing index was due to higher costs for fuel and other utilities. Increases in maintenance and repair, property taxes, and rent were offset by a decline in house prices.

The relatively small two-tenths of 1 percent rise in food and beverage prices reflected another sharp drop in prices for meats, poultry, fish and eggs. Prices for fresh fruits and vegetables rose 2.3 percent in February, partly due to severe weather conditions. Prices for cereal and bakery products rose eight-tenths of 1 percent.

MEDICAL CARE charges rose nine-tenths of 1 percent over the month, down from the 1.3 percent January increase. Entertainment costs jumped by 1.2 percent as against nine-tenths of 1 percent in January.

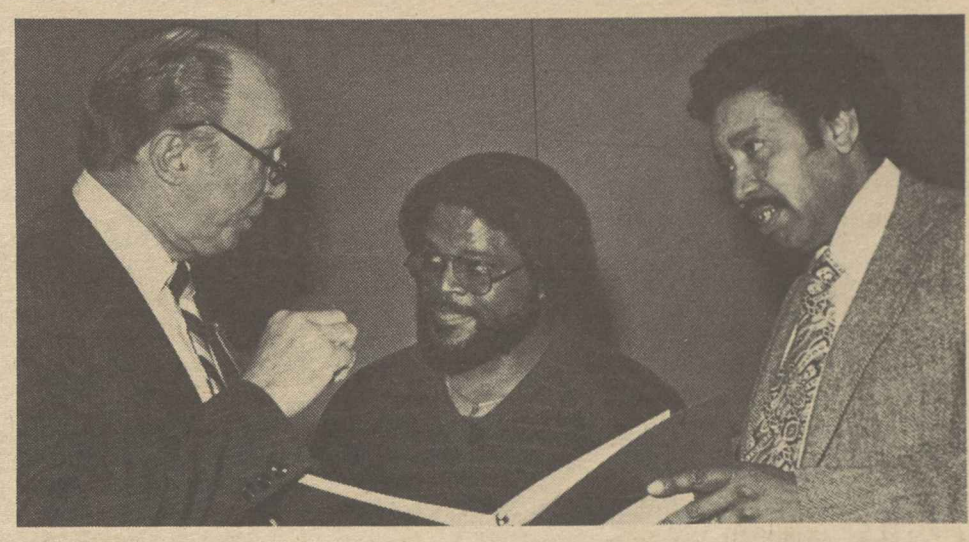
Weidenbaum told the congressional panel that he expects April to be the "peak month" for inflation this year, when an overall rate of about 1.1 to 1.2 percent, as food price increases speed up and auto rebates end.

The Administration is forecasting an average inflation rate of 11.1 percent this year, dropping to single digits next year. Weidenbaum said that the Administration's 1981 forecast "allows for the possibility of very sluggish economic activity —or even a period of outright decline— during the spring and summer quarters of the year, until the elements of the (Administration's) economic program are put into place."

Crafts, Industry Revise Plan to Settle Disputes

Five AFL-CIO building trades unions, the unaffiliated Teamsters, and the Associated General Contractors of America have agreed on a revised voluntary plan for the settlement of impasses to "avoid costly and sometimes unnecessary work stoppages" in the construction industry.

The plan, which updates procedures developed in 1978, includes a 30-day waiting period during which local bargaining parties at an impasse would agree not to engage in a strike, lockout, or any other economic action.



The deadlock would be referred to a dispute settlement board consisting of two national representatives from the contractors' association and two from the union whose local is involved in the bargaining impasse. The board must issue its decision within 30 days.

THE BOARD may be expanded, when appropriate, to include representatives of other affected associations. If more than one basic trade has reached an impasse in the area, there will be coordination between the involved dispute settlement boards.

The plan was unveiled by AGC's Basic Trades Joint Labor Management Committee co-chaired by AGC President-elect Thomas Dailey and President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers. Other unions that have endorsed the plan are the Iron Workers, the Laborers, Plasterers & Cement Masons, and the Carpenters.

California High Court Upholds State Employee Bargaining

The California Supreme Court has upheld a collective bargaining law covering 130,000 state employees whose unions previously had only "meet and confer" rights.

Its 4-2 decision, welcomed by the state's labor movement, paves the way for union representation elections and negotiations of contracts.

A court challenge brought by the anti-union Pacific Legal Foundation had blocked implementation of the 1977 law, the State Employer-Employee Relations Act. A state appellate court had struck down the law as an infringement on civil service provisions of the California constitution, but the supreme court majority found no conflict.

THE HIGH COURT also rebuked State Atty. Gen. George Deukmejian for switching sides and filing his own challenge to the law. Deukmejian was elected as a Republican, but the court noted that he is by law the attorney for the governor, Democrat Edmund Brown, Jr., and for the state.

The supreme court said Deukmejian was within his rights in withdrawing from the case and authorizing the appointment of a special counsel to defend the law. But it could find "no statutory or ethical authority" to justify the attorney general to "represent clients one day, give them legal advice with regard to pending litigation, withdraw, and then sue the same clients the next day on a purported cause of action arising out of the identical controversy."

It is "generally understood," the court said, that before an attorney may represent interests adverse to a client, he must obtain the client's consent in writing.

The four-member majority of the state supreme court said the legislation under review follows logically from earlier state laws that established collective bargaining procedures for teachers and other school employees and for the state's colleges and universities.

INVALIDATION of the law, the state justices said, "would be a sorrowful step backwards" in establishing a framework to resolve employer-employee disputes.

One of the two dissenters was William P. Clark, who was confirmed last month as Deputy Secretary of State, but refrained from taking his oath in order to take part in a final group of decisions of the California Supreme Court.

Clark, a close personal associate of President Reagan who came under fire during his confirmation hearings for an apparent lack of knowledge of foreign affairs, resigned from the state court on Mar. 24, after the decision on the collective bargaining case was handed down.

Senate Launches Floor Debate on Budget Slashes

office in which a new president is presumed to have the goodwill of the public and of the polls-conscious Congress.

With Republicans in the majority, the legislative committees dutifully and promptly notified the Budget Committees of the amount of "savings" they estimated could be made from cuts in programs in their jurisdictions.

IN THE FEW instances when the projected cuts were below the Administration's blueprint, the conservative-dominated Budget Committee did not hesitate to overrule the legislative committees.

For example, the Democrats and moderate Republicans on the Labor & Human Resources Committee agreed to fund some programs at higher levels than the Administration proposed. But the Budget Committee voted to direct the Labor & Human Resources Committee to cut its programs $1 billion more than it had planned to do.

THE EXACT programs to be cut are not specified in the budget resolution, so there is some flexibility for the legislative committees to shift funds among the various programs.

Technically, the resolution directing the cuts is a measure to cut spending authority for the balance of this fiscal year, which runs through Sept. 30, 1981. But its chief impact is to reduce outlays for the 1982 fiscal year, with still further cuts mandated for fiscal 1983.

Protest Rally Scheduled

Rail Unions Plan Battle To Save Conrail, Amtrak

Railway labor organizations called for an Apr. 29, Washington, D.C., rally to protest President Reagan's "misguided budget cutting" of Conrail and Amtrak rail service.

The Administration proposals, which would cut Amtrak service by 75 percent and liquidate Conrail by selling its lines to other railroads, is "the most serious crisis for America's railroad workers since the dismal days of the 1930 Depression," Chairman Fred J. Kroll of the Railway Labor Executives' Association declared.

"THE THREAT to jobs and living standards is so menancing that it cannot be accepted passively by the unions of railroad workers in this country," Kroll said in a statement.

Kroll said he expects several thousand members of the various railway labor organizations affiliated with RLEA to come to the nation's capital to express their opposition to the Reagan proposals on federally subsidized rail transportation.

Earlier, Kroll presented the unions' position in testimony before a Senate Commerce subcommittee on surface transportation. His views reflected those expressed at an emergency meeting of the 16 RLEA affiliates in Washington on Mar. 18.

The Administration's proposed dismantling of the Amtrak passenger service comes at a time when it is increasingly popular with the traveling public, particularly those in the lower income levels, Kroll observed in his statement. Fund reductions would leave only Amtrak's northeast corridor intact, wiping out some 21,000 jobs.

BY SPLITTING up Conrail and selling its lines to other railroads, the viability of the nation's northeastern and midwestern rail freight systems most certainly would be endangered, Kroll said. The Administation also proposes to relieve Conrail of its obligation to run intercity passenger and commuter trains. Some 50,000 jobs would be cut altogether, and remaining Conrail employees would be expected to take severe wage cuts and loss of their employee representation, Kroll noted.

"History offers no parallel to our present situation: the government of an industrially advanced nation giving serious consideration to a series of programs which contain such obvious shortcomings and dangers not only for railroad transportation but for the entire economy.

"In their passionate zeal for budget-cutting, the Reagan Administration and its congressional allies appear to ignore completely the economic and social costs of battering the railroad industry and the workers who are employed in its operations.

"It is time to remind President Reagan and his advisers that there is a 'community side' and an 'employee side,' as well as a 'supply side,' to the national economy."

RLEA affiliated unions are the Train Dispatchers, Locomotive Engineers, Maintenance of Way Employees, Signalmen, Carmen, Railway & Airline Clerks, Hotel & Restaurant Employees, Machinists, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Longshoremen, Seafarers, Marine Engineers, Yardmasters, Sheet Metal Workers, Transport Workers, and United Transportation Union.

SERIOUS CRISIS for America's railroad workers is posed by the Administration's plan to slash Amtrack and Conrail passenger and freight operations at a cost of about 22,000 jobs, rail union officers told the Senate Commerce subcommittee on surface transportation. Testifying are, from left, Railroad Clerks President Fred J. Kroll, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association; William Mahoney, RLEA counsel; United Transportation Union President Fred A. Hardin, and UTU Vice President James Burke.

Tax Breaks Opposed For Special Accounts

Congress should reject legislation that would add a host of new tax deductions for persons establishing individual retirement accounts and other forms of special bank accounts, the AFL-CIO urged.

Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor cautioned in a statement to a Senate Finance subcommittee that tax exemptions on interest for accounts set up for future education or home purchase would benefit primarily persons with the largest incomes. The revenue loss would have to be made up by other taxpayers, he noted.

Kirkland Hits Unfair Tax Cut, Urges Social Security Credit

any tax relief for some 15 million low-income working Americans—even though their social security payroll tax went up this year.

THEY ARE NOT the only ones who would be better off under the AFL-CIO proposal for a social security tax credit, Kirkland said. Most moderate and middle-income wage and salary earners would also receive a larger first-year tax cut under the AFL-CIO plan.

The top 5 percent income bracket—those over $50,000 a year—would still get 5 percent of the total tax benefits under the AFL-CIO proposal, Kirkland noted. But under the Reagan plan, they would take away 30 percent of the tax savings.

Kirkland stressed the labor movement's dissent from the Reagan Administration's "upside-down notion of equity" in tax relief—and from the "supply-side" economic theory on which it is based.

"WE SEE NO justification, particularly in this time of budget slashing and proclaimed need for austerity and sacrifice, to throw as much as $60 billion a year in federal tax cuts to the nation's corporations and their stockholders," Kirkland said.

Nor, he added, does the AFL-CIO consider it probable "that this largess will trickle down to workers and consumers in the form of needed jobs and more goods and services at reasonable prices."

The Administration's tax plan was also scored by Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts, who told the committee that its result would be to further shift the tax burden from the wealthy to middle- and low-income wage earners.

Further, he protested, "while the Administration program shifts major spending responsibilities from the federal level to state and local governments, it also takes away funds needed to meet these new obligations."

THE PRESIDENT'S tax plan gained the enthusiastic endorsement of the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, however. Both groups urged the Ways & Means Committee to give approval to the Reagan proposal.

Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) has said the committee is likely to come up with a one-year tax package close to what the President has asked, but with some "compromises" that reflect the diversity of views presented at the hearings.

Move to Cut Flight Attendants Held Threat to Safety, Service

The safety and rights of the traveling public could be jeopardized by a proposal to change the rules governing the size of cabin crews on airliners, the Association of Flight Attendants charged.

The union called on the Federal Aviation Administration to withdraw a proposed change in regulations that would allow air carriers to base the number of attendants on each flight on the number of ticketed passengers instead of on the seating capacity of the plane.

The AFA, an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots, represents 23,000 professional flight attendants.

AT A NEWS conference called to launch a public awareness campaign opposing the change AFA President Linda Puchala called it "dangerous and foolish."

In addition to its safety implications, Puchala emphasized, the new rule would permit the airlines to do away with most passenger seating preferences at the carrier's convenience.

The new rule, proposed Jan. 19, would require only one flight attendant for every 50 ticketed passengers with a minimum of two attendants per flight. The current standard, adopted in 1974, requires one attendant for every 50 seats in the aircraft.

Under the new proposals, Puchala told reporters, it is possible that a 400-to-500-seat Boeing 747 would be allowed to take off with as few as two flight attendants.

"In an emergency," she emphasized, "we must evacuate a plane in a matter of seconds, not minutes. To accomplish this, we need an adequate, well-trained crew of professionals."

The union estimates that safety-trained professional flight attendants have an average of 50 seconds to get passengers off a burning plane. The primary function of flight attendants on any commercial aircraft is passenger safety, the union points out. By law, flight attendants must take part in safety training programs every year.

PUCHALA explained that the original standards for safety crews were set by the FAA based on aircraft seating capacity, number of exits, seat spacing and width of aisles. Seating capacity was accepted as a "good indicator" of all these measurements, she noted.

The proposed FAA rule would allow airlines to concentrate passengers in blocks in one part of a plane, yet there is no evidence that grouping passengers in a particular area increases safety, Puchala said.

"In fact," she warned, "such a seating arrangement might well hinder people from reaching the nearnest functioning exit if an emergency should arise."

GIVING THE air carriers the option of seating passengers in designated areas interferes with a traveler's right to sit in the part of the plane where he or she is most comfortable, Puchala asserted.

Preferences such as aisle or window seating, first class, buffer zones between smoking and non-smoking sections could become unavailable, she pointed out.

The union's public awareness program, the Campaign for Air Passenger Safety (CAPS), will include demonstrations at major airports on Apr. 3 and 4. Passengers will be asked to write the FAA and President Reagan to urge that the rule change be dropped.

Governor's Veto Blocks New Mexico R-T-W Law

Santa Fe, N.M.—Gov. Bruce King slammed the door on a "right-to-work" bill, making New Mexico the third state to block the anti-union strategy this year. King, a Democrat, vetoed the measure on Mar. 20 just one day before the end of the legislature's official session. He had vetoed a similar bill in 1979.

Earlier this month, a "right-to-work" proposal was stalled in Idaho where the state senate indefinitely tabled the measure by voting to return it to the lower house. A bill designed to cripple Montana's public employee unions, branded by the State AFL-CIO "a first step to 'right to work,'" was killed in committee.

Although the New Mexico legislature is meeting in special session to discuss budget issues, the State AFL-CIO said the governor's action was sufficient to make the issue "definitely dead" for this year.

The legislature also sent the governor a bill repealing the state's prevailing wage law, but it did not reach his desk within 72 hours of adjournment of the legislature. In such cases, state law gives the governor until mid-April to decide whether to veto the bill, which passed by only a slim margin.

Unions Hit Stall on Cotton Dust Rule

Will Fight Court Delay On Standard

By John R. Oravec

The Reagan Administration's attempt to block the federal cotton dust standard from moving forward was assailed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland as a disservice to workers who face the hazards of brown lung.

In a two-step move, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration called for an economic impact review of the regulation and asked the Supreme Court to delay a pending decision on the 1978 standard.

"WE BELIEVE it is a disservice to the exposed workers and the legal process for the Labor Dept. to make an eleventh hour attempt to reopen a rulemaking proceeding that began more than five years ago," Kirkland said.

He pledged that union parties involved in the cotton dust case—the federation, the Industrial Union Dept. and the Clothing & Textile Workers—will oppose efforts to delay the high court's decision.

Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter, the new head of OSHA, said in announcing the agency's action that the cotton dust standard would remain in effect while the cost-benefit analysis is conducted.

AUCHTER SAID the action is in line with President Reagan's Executive Order of Feb. 19 which requires federal agencies to assess the costs and benefits of major federal regulations.

Although OSHA will focus only on the cotton dust standard at this time, Auchter acknowledged at a press conference that the economic impact study would be done with a view toward subjecting other OSHA standards to similar scrutiny.

OSHA initiated the review on Mar. 27, the same day that textile employers were required to establish and implement a written program of engineering controls and work practices aimed at sharply reducing worker exposure to cotton dust. Provisions of the existing standard require the industry to have engineering controls and work practices completed by Mar. 27, 1984.

WORKERS exposed to excessive levels of cotton dust are particularly susceptible to byssinosis, the crippling brown lung disease. Government studies show that up to 800,000 workers, mostly in the textile industry, are exposed to cotton dust.

A booklet issued by OSHA last year said that "over 35,000 cotton workers have already been crippled from cotton dust exposure, and thousands of others show some signs of brown lung."

Auchter ordered the recall and destruction of some 100,000 of the booklets that had been sent to OSHA field offices before he took office.

THE STANDARD that OSHA issued in June 1978 provides for a graduated reduction in exposure levels—first through

Labor Joins in Outrage At Assault on President

Kirkland Calls Mad Violence Threat to All

By David L. Perlman

America's trade union movement reacted with shock and outrage to the attempted assassination of President Reagan, and workers everywhere joined in the prayers for the full recovery of all the victims.

In Denver, hours after the shooting, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland spoke to participants in a 10-state regional conference of the shock waves from the gunfire.

SUCH MAD violence threatens society's foundations, Kirkland said, assaulting "not only the public servants who stand in the line of fire, but the people at large." Democratic institutions such as the trade union movement "require for their survival civilized discourse in a humane society," he noted.

"Whatever our differences with the President's policies," Kirkland said, "we have never doubted that we share with him an overriding common purpose—the good of our country."

The trauma and dismay was especially felt by more than 5,000 delegates and guests at the legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., where Reagan had spoken just minutes before the shooting.

Reagan had addressed the group at the start of the afternoon session on the opening day of what was scheduled as a three-day legislative conference. It was his first speech to a union meeting since he assumed the presidency.

Senate Actions Affirm Reagan's Budget Cuts

The Senate directed its legislative committees to rewrite laws and change funding levels of government programs so as to achieve the drastic budget cuts demanded by the Administration.

Through a week of debate, an alliance of Republicans and conservative Democrats repeatedly crushed labor-supported attempts to salvage programs that have provided a cushion against the severe unemployment brought on by economic recession and unrestricted imports.

TWO KEY VOTES on issues of special importance to the trade union movement reflected the Senate's uncompromising mood.

One test came on the issue of scuttling the trade adjustment program so that workers who lose their jobs because of increased imports resulting from the government's virtually tariff-free trade policy would get no more in weekly benefits than is provided through their state's unemployment compensation program.

Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) sought to strike from the budget reconciliation bill an instruction to the Senate Finance Committee that would virtually compel it to enact the Administration plan in order to achieve a $500 million savings in trade-related categories of the budget.

HIS AMENDMENT was beaten, 69-29.

Another Administration proposal, which Senate Republicans are seeking to compel through the budget reconciliation process, would drastically curtail eligibility for extended unemployment benefits for those who are still without jobs when their state payments run out. It would eliminate the national trigger for the program, and per-

Congress Urged to Keep Trade Act Benefits Intact

The AFL-CIO and unions representing workers whose jobs are threatened by imports urged Congress to reject Administration cost-cutting proposals that would effectively destroy the trade adjustment assistance program.

The program, which labor has urged be broadened to cover additional groups of workers, now allows 70 percent of lost pay up to a maximum of $269—the average factory wage—to workers whose jobs have been wiped out by increased imports. Benefits can continue for up to 52 weeks of unemployment, with an additional 26 weeks allowed to complete retraining programs or for displaced workers over the age of 60.

A panel of labor representatives, testifying before a House Ways & Means subcommittee, protested that changes sought by the Administration would deny workers hurt by imports the income protection that the Trade Act of 1974 and predecessor laws directed they be given.

THE ADMINISTRATION assumption, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan charged, is that "the way to solve the budget problem is to deny workers payments the law entitles them to receive."

Under the Administration proposal, designed to chop 77 percent from the program's budget cost, eligible workers would

Economic Index Drops for Third Straight Month

The government's index of leading economic indicators fell for the third month in a row in February, portending a bumpy road for the nation's economy in the months ahead.

The three consecutive drops in the index, which is designed as a barometer of future economic activity, followed six straight months of increases.

THE FEBRUARY index fell three-tenths of 1 percent following declines of six-tenths of 1 percent in January and one-tenth of 1 percent in December. Both of the latter figures represent revisions of earlier Commerce Dept. estimates.

OSHA Kills Pamphlets on Brown Lung

A 16-page booklet that alerts textile workers to the health hazards of cotton dust has been recalled by the new head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

It was one of the first acts of Thorne G. Auchter after his confirmation by the Senate as assistant Secretary of Labor.

AUCHTER SAID he ordered the recall of the booklet, titled Cotton Dust: Worker Health Alert, because a photo on the cover "makes a clearly biased statement" in favor of workers and against employers.

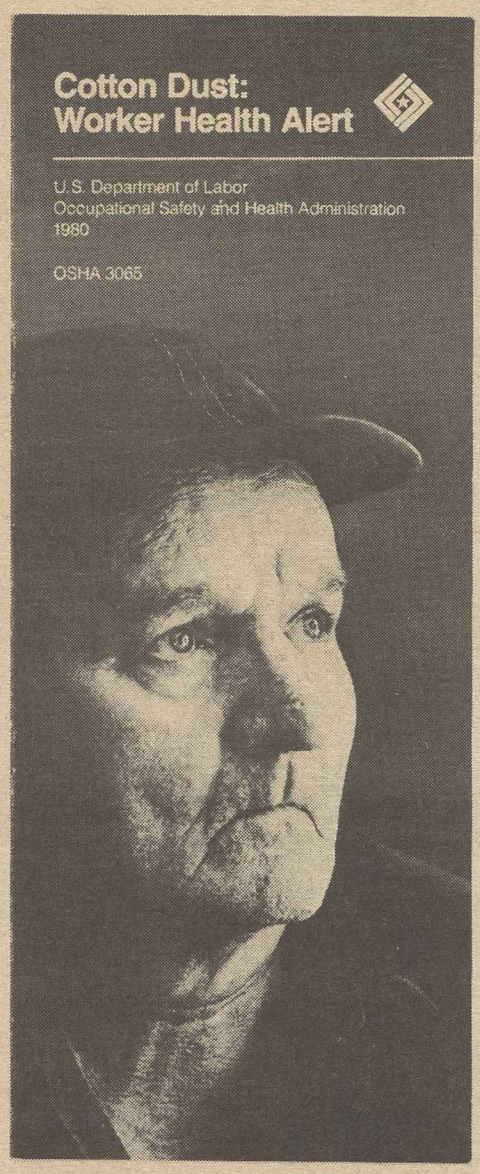
The photo is a candid portrait of a worker. The inside cover identifies him as Louis Harrell, who "worked 44 years in the cotton industry. He died of brown lung in 1978."

Brown lung, or byssinosis, is a crippling and sometimes fatal respiratory disease resulting from the inhalation of excessive levels of cotton dust.

Auchter disclosed the recall of the booklets at a press conference at which he announced OSHA's plans to review the federal cotton dust standard and undertake a cost-benefit analysis. He denied that he had ordered the booklets destroyed.

BUT A MEMORANDUM issued Mar. 19 by Auchter's acting director of information, Jim Foster, said the booklet "should be withdrawn from circulation and destroyed."

A copy of the memorandum, which was acquired by the Clothing & Textile Workers, also calls for the destruction of another OSHA booklet, titled Cotton Dust Standard: Management's Role, and a related poster carrying the message, "Cotton Dust Can Destroy Your Lungs."



The publications were issued last year by the then OSHA chief, Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham.

Sol Stetin, senior executive vice president of ACTWU, accused Auchter of undermining OSHA's responsibility of protecting workers.

IN A STRONGLY worded letter to Auchter, Stetin said, "Your order to not only withdraw these publications but also to destroy them, was both grossly imprudent and wasteful of government funds, and a callous disregard of your responsibility to educate workers about the hazards of cotton dust."

Several other worker education materials have been recalled under Auchter's order. They include three films on the history of OSHA, workplace hazards, and worker rights under the federal job safety law. Also banned are two slide presentations dealing with the hazards of cotton dust and acrylonitrile, a carcinogen, that were developed to meet the training requirements of OSHA standards.

Copies of the banned visual aid materials are available through the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health.

CHARGING that this cover photo was slanted against employers, Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter ordered the recall and destruction of some 100,000 OSHA booklets on cotton dust hazards.

Performers Ask Budget Reprieve For Aid to Arts

New York—The Actors & Artistes—the federation of AFL-CIO performer unions—appealed to Congress to save arts and humanities programs that would be crippled by President Reagan's proposed budget.

The organization cited a proposed 50-percent cut in the budgets of the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities as "completely out of line."

It protested that a suggested cut of 25 percent for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting will force the system to become "almost entirely dependent on commercial interests and, contrary to the congressional mandate, create little more than an echo of commercial networks.'"

It also urged continued funding through the Labor Dept.'s Employment & Training Administration for job development programs of the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment.

Cuts Would Scuttle Aid

have to exhaust their state unemployment insurance benefits before qualifying for additional weeks of payment at the same weekly benefit rate they had been getting under unemployment insurance—and subject to the same requirements the administration is seeking to impose that recipients take minimum wage jobs if available.

TOTAL BENEFITS, including state payments and retraining programs, could not continue beyond 52 weeks.

Further, the Administration has also proposed toughening the eligibility criteria so that fewer workers would be certified as meeting the test of import-related unemployment.

Koplan noted that by the Administration's own estimate, its proposals would result in dropping the average payment for each worker covered by trade adjustment assistance from $6,400 to $1,800.

WHILE THE Administration has said it will support some training and relocation assistance for workers forced into unemployment by imports, Koplan said retraining holds limited potential if the jobs are not available. Just recently, he reminded the subcommittee, some 5,000 unemployed workers in Toledo, Ohio, "lined up for 16 hours for 90 jobs in an auto battery plant."

Wilbur Daniels, executive vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, said the proposed cutbacks in trade adjustment assistance would also "make more difficult" development and acceptance of government policies to promote international trade. "They would break the long-established covenant between the government and worker and industries adversely affected by imports."

DANIELS referred to the trade adjustment aid as "a social contract" and noted that it was first adopted as part of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962. He quoted from a congressional committee report accompanying that legislation, declaring that "the special nature of employment disruption resulting from changes in trade policy necessitates a level of worker protection somewhat beyond what is available through regular state unemployment insurance programs."

Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan told the Ways & Means panel that the solution to high costs of trade adjustment assistance is growth in the job market.

The program, he pointed out, is "compensation for injury" to workers whose jobs in effect have been sacrificed as part of overall trade policy.

Sheehan noted that the program is scheduled to come up for review and reauthorization next year, and questioned why Congress should be considering "a de facto termination of the program" at this time.

Leonard R. Page, associate general counsel of the Auto Workers, sharply protested the Administration assumption that laid off workers are "abusing" the program by collecting benefits instead of looking for new jobs. A survey by the Michigan Employment Security Commission last year showed 78 percent of eligible workers interested in training programs and more than one-third willing to relocate to take a job, he noted.

Cutting the adjustment program would breach the "covenant this country made with labor" in the 1962 Trade Act, Page charged.

"We have had over 19 years of steady decrease in tariffs and duties, matched by increases in imports," he said. Now the Administration is proposing "to withhold labor's payment on that contract."

Kirkland Scores Attempt to Block Cotton Dust Rule

the use of respirators and eventually through the installation of engineering controls.

The regulation limits worker exposure over an eight-hour workday to 200 micrograms of respirable cotton dust per cubic meter of air in yarn manufacturing, 500 micrograms in textile production and 750 micrograms in slashing and weaving.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley said he was saddened by the Labor Dept.'s "action to weaken the OSHA standard," terming it vital to the health of more than a half-million textile workers.

"OF ALL THE measures the new Administration could take to improve the economy," he observed, it has "sought one which will bring untold suffering to many."

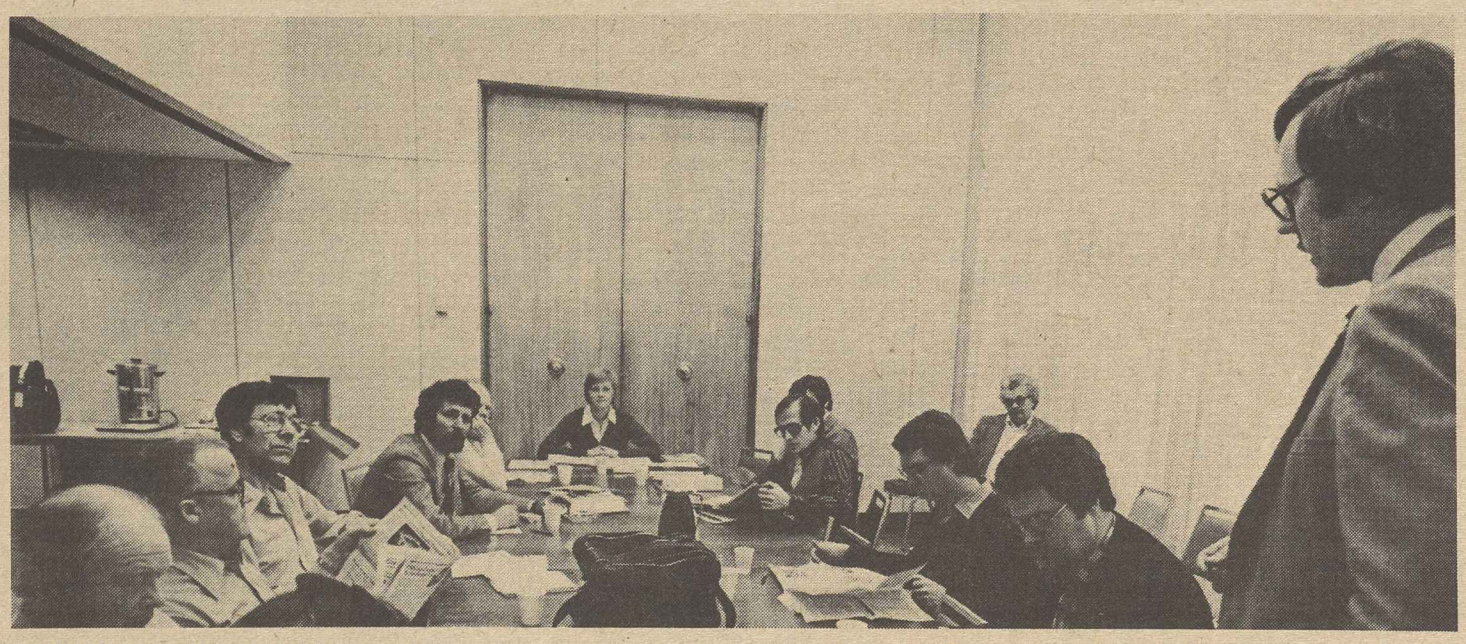
"The answer to our nation's problems is not to place a monetary value on human life, nor is it to keep hundreds of thousands of workers in daily risk of losing their health," Finley stressed.

He pointed that "even the textile industry admits that it can meet the standard in most affected areas."

According to an industry survey, about 75 percent of the spinning operations already are at or below the 200-microgram exposure limit and 88 percent of weaving operations are at or below the 750-microgram level.

EVEN SO, the American Textile Manufacturers Institute and the National Cotton Council continued to challenge the OSHA standard. After the industry's challenge was rejected by a federal appeals court last year, it appealled to the Supreme Court.

The AFL-CIO, IUD and ACTWU intervened on the side of OSHA before the Supreme Court. In delivering oral arguments for the labor groups, on Jan. 21, Atty. George H. Cohen stressed that the federal job safety law clearly specifies that OSHA is required to implement the most effective regulations. Cohen also maintained that in enacting the 1970 law, Congress did not intend to compromise the health protections of workers with cost-benefit assessments.



Industry contends that to fully meet the standards' provisions it will cost employers five times more than the $550 million estimate OSHA issued in an earlier economic impact study.

CONVENTIONS

The Iron Workers' 1981 convention in Miami will be held Aug. 10-14 rather than Aug. 24-28 as previously listed.

The Carpenters' 1981 convention in Chicago will open Sept. 4 rather than Aug. 10 as previously listed.

The Maryland-D.C. AFL-CIO will hold its 1981 convention Aug. 30-Sept. 4 at Baltimore.

ROLE OF THE LABOR PRESS in the American trade union movement is discussed by Jeffrey Miller, editor of the CWA News, with a delegation of eight Swedish labor editors at a Washington seminar arranged by the International Labor Press Association. The visiting editors, representing unions from Sweden's blue-collar and white-collar labor federations, examined policies and techniques with a cross section of U.S. labor editors.

At Legislative Conference

Building Trades Spur Grass-Roots Campaign

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. is counting on more than 4,000 local leaders who came to its legislative conference to build back-home support for labor's program and help persuade Congress that the election returns were not a mandate "to repeal economic justice."

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine stressed in his keynote speech that labor's willingness to cooperate wherever possible with a new Administration does not mean acquiescence in "right-wing dreams of dismantling all the progress of generations past."

MOST OF the Capitol Hill visits were cancelled by the termination of the conference after the shooting of President Reagan. The gunman fired at the President just outside the hotel where Reagan had addressed the building trades conference—his first speech to a union group since taking office.

But a key goal of this legislative conference was to involve local leaders even more than previously in an issue-oriented grass-roots program.

A booklet on grass-roots lobbying given to every delegate stressed the large number of recently elected representatives and senators from marginal districts, who are "especially attuned to constituency pressures that may affect their re-election."

THEY HAVE been hearing from business and conservative groups. They should also be hearing "directly from union members," the brochure suggested.

Other material given to the delegates dealt with issues of special concern to building trades unions—from attacks on the Davis-Bacon Act to the impact of budget slashes.

Georgine's keynote speech stressed the commitment of the building crafts to labor's broad concerns and identified the chief foes as "narrow idealogues" who make up "the anti-union chorus."

"WE REJECT their belief that productivity depends more on wealthy investors than on skillful laborers," he said.

The building trades will be "constructive" in their criticisms when they can't go along with the Administration, Georgine promised. But the unions will insist that sacrifices demanded of workers must also be required of "the owners of capital," he declared.

Georgine said a prosperous economy also needs a sound transportation system, clean cities and better neighborhoods. "We will oppose the gutting of programs that do the vital work of building the country and improving our society," he said.

LABOR WANTS President Reagan's programs to succeed, he declared, but "we will not rubber-stamp cuts in school lunches while tobacco subsidies go virtually untouched" or "cuts in unemployment compensation and trade adjustment assistance while corporations get tax breaks to export jobs overseas."

Further, he urged, "tax cutting, like budget cutting, has to be fair." The building trades will work with the rest of the AFL-CIO "for a better, more equitable tax cut" than the Administration has proposed, Georgine said.

"The New Right does not speak for our workers," he declared.

LABOR'S STRATEGIES to repel budgetary assaults on vital social and worker programs by the Administration and in Congress were the focus of attention at the Machinists' four-day legislative conference in Washington. In keynoting the conference that drew more than 500 delegates, IAM President William W. Winpisinger disclosed plans for several pilot projects aimed at spurring grass-roots political education and action programs.

Delegate's Tackle Aids In Capture of Gunman

A 68-year-old carpenter from Cleveland, Alfred Antonucci, was among the first witnesses to the shooting of President Reagan to tackle the suspected assailant.

Antonucci, president and business agent of Carpenters Local 1715, was in the crowd waiting to greet the President as he left the hotel where the building trades legislative conference was held.

The gunman was nearby and Antonucci joined Secret Service agents and police who leaped on him when the shots were heard. Friends in Cleveland recognized him in television pictures and the Cleveland Plain Dealer confirmed his role in helping to subdue the assailant. Also joining the pileup was Frank J. McNamara, 62, of Parma, Ohio, president of Millwrights Local 1871.

But the stress took its toll. A few hours later, Antonucci was hospitalized after suffering chest pains and several days after the episode was still under care in the coronary unit at Georgetown University Hospital.

Reagan's Budget Cutbacks Upheld in Key Senate Votes

mit states to raise the state trigger above present requirements.

Especially damaging to the concept of unemployment insurance is a related proposal to require workers jobless for 13 weeks to take any available job that pays an amount equal to unemployment benefits as long as it is not less than the minimum wage.

THE BUDGET reconciliation measure would not produce any "savings" until fiscal 1983 since states would have to be given time to change their laws to comply with the harsher federal standards. But a motion by Sen. Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.) to delete those instructions was quashed, 60-38.

The power of the conservative coalition was clearly demonstrated in the defeat of an effort by a group of moderate Republicans to mitigate some of the most severe cuts in social programs.

Sen. John Chafee (R-R.I.) carried with him 10 other Republican senators on an amendment to restore $973 million that had been cut from programs of education aid, fuel assistance for the poor, weatherization, urban development grants, mental health and mass transit, among others.

EVEN IF the amendment had been adopted, the budget cuts mandated by the Senate would have remained close to what the Administration proposed.

But 16 Democrats swung over to vote against the amendment, and it was defeated on a 59-40 vote.

The Senate action is the first big step in the complex budget-setting process, and many of the battles will be refought in the House and in subsequent Senate votes.

The vehicle for the Senate Republican strategy to win quick achievement of the Reagan Administration program was a bill designed to reconcile spending for the balance of this fiscal year with budget goals.

THE SENATE then included in the bill instructions to legislative committees to make changes designed to achieve specified savings in spending levels for both Fiscal 1982 and Fiscal 1983. The committees are directed to complete their assignments by May 31, and their actions will then be presented to the Senate as part of an omnibus "reconciliation bill."

The House, meanwhile, is moving on a somewhat slower schedule with its version of budget reconciliation, and eventually the two measures will have to be meshed in a House-Senate conference. But the Administration and its spokesmen in Congress are counting on the speedy and one-sided action by the Senate for the momentum to put the President's program through virtually intact.

FINAL PASSAGE by the Senate of the reconciliation instructions to committees was expected momentarily as the AFL-CIO News went to press. But other budget issues will continue to occupy the Senate in the next few weeks.

The Senate Budget Committee is still in the process of putting together a formal resolution setting government spending ceilings for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, 1981. That resolution will also include revenue estimates based in part on projected changes in tax laws.

Outrage Swells at Assassination Attempt

The President received respectful attention from an audience that had come to Washington to lobby against many of the policies and program cuts advocated by his Administration. And there was warm applause for his tribute to the courage of Poland's workers and his insistence that this country must be "strong enough to remain free."

BACKSTAGE, White House Press Sec. James S. Brady listened to the audience reaction and made notes on his copy of the President's text.

Reagan had just left the hotel and was entering his limousine when the shots rang out.

When the delegates convened the next morning, the president of the building trades department, Robert A. Georgine, somberly asked their attention.

He spoke of the horror they all felt—deeper and more painful, perhaps, because of their proximity to the event.

AFTER THE group had joined in the prayer offered by the Rev. Joseph Donahue, the department's long-time chaplain, Georgine relayed the decision that had been concurred in by the presidents of the 15 affiliated unions, to adjourn the formal proceedings of the conference. "It is simply not appropriate that we continue," he said.

The building trades leaders made it clear that they remained committed to a program that in some areas puts them firmly opposed to Administration policies, and to the protection of labor laws and standards that have been special targets of Reagan's right-wing supporters.

But they also made clear, before the President's speech as well as in its aftermath, their readiness to cooperate with the Administration in areas of common purpose.

AT THE OPENING session of the conference, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan spoke from the vantage point of a contractor who had negotiated with the building trades and knew their industry first hand.

Donovan stressed common goals, such as "full employment through economic growth," reiterated the Administration's insistence on reducing what he called "seemingly attractive programs that are not cost effective," and asked that he and the Administration be judged on "results" that are achieved.

Neither Donovan nor Reagan, however, sought to gloss over the policy differences between labor and the Administration.

Reagan insisted that the first priority is to curb government spending and that Congress must enact his entire economic program.

"If only part of the package is passed by the Congress, we will only ease some of our problems, and that is no solution at all," Reagan said.

THE NATION'S "economic mess" came about "because our leaders have forgotten that we built this great nation on rewarding the work ethic instead of punishing it," the President insisted.

The cancelled days of the conference were to have included workshops on political, legislative, organizing, energy, pension and legal issues as well as talks by congressional leaders of both parties and an address by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. Former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall was a schedulled participant in a panel on the Davis-Bacon Act.

Coyle Succeeds Poole at UFCW

Miami—Stephen Coyle was elected executive vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers at the union's executive board meeting here. Coyle, a UFCW vice president, has been director of the union's food processing division.

He succeeds Harry R. Poole who is retiring after 46 years of service to the labor movement during which he held a number of key offices. Poole became executive vice president of the UFCW in 1979 when the union was formed by the merger of the Meat Cutters and Retail Clerks. He had been president of the Meat Cutters since 1976.

Coyle, a vice president of the Meat Cutters before the merger, became active in the labor movement as a member of the Fur & Leather Workers. He held major local and national offices with the union prior to its merger with the Meat Cutters in the 1950s.

Also announcing their retirement at the meeting were UFCW Vice Presidents Fred Clavio, Sr., Ken Edwards and Rudy Krickan.

Ed T. Hardy resigned as a vice president to become collective bargaining representative for the union's northwest division.

With Fairness and Equity

THE AFL-CIO supports the proposition that inflation must be reduced; the number of jobs increased and the unemployed put back to work; that productivity must be improved, industrial strength restored, and federal programs made more effective and efficient.

America needs policies, including an industrial policy, that meet the nation's needs with fairness and equity.

During the Seventies, the American economy experienced extended periods of high unemployment, massive layoffs, and plant closings. The growth of the economy slowed, inflation increased, and our balance of payments worsened. These events would have been bad enough if they had been purely cyclical in nature, with the economy rebounding after a downturn.

Underlying these setbacks, however, was a much more serious and enduring problem: the industrial base of the American economy was in fact eroding.

The American share of the world market for manufactured goods declined 23 percent, and our share of our own domestic market also declined. As a result of this deindustrialization, at least 2 million industrial jobs have been lost. There has been no coherent national policy to reverse this ominous trend.

Now, in the Eighties, the need to reindustrialize the American economy has become widely acknowledged. There are, however, distinctly different concepts about how to do it.

ONE APPROACH that is receiving almost faddish attention emphasizes removing the allegedly excessive burden that government places on the private sector. Its adherents call for general business-tax cuts and a reduced role for government in the economy. In other words, we should return to a more laissez-faire environment for business.

Industries and regions that are experiencing economic difficulties would be left to sink or swim, their fate supposedly determined by the benign invisible hand of the competitive market.

This approach ignores the radical departure from the ideal competitive market that has taken place in the real world. Decisions of large firms to relocate abroad can have disastrous effects upon domestic industries and communities. Moreover, domestic firms increasingly face competition from foreign producers that are heavily subsidized by their governments.

WE JUST DON'T believe that you can write off major industries in this country without paying for it dearly in the future. Nor do we believe that whole cities and regions can be allowed to decay, without serious social and economic consequences.

It's the height of arrogance to talk in abstract, theoretical terms about letting certain industries disappear and then putting everyone else to work making micro-chips.

We feel it's important that America remain a diversified industrial nation, not one that just depends upon one or two industries or upon a so-called "service economy." I do not believe that our standard of living will be or can be improved if we allow basic industries to erode, nor would the world be better off if each country simply specialized in the production of one kind of product. No other country has accepted that idea.

Legislature Sticks Consumers

Delaware Law Writes Banks Blank Check on Interest Rates

By Gus Tyler

TWO PRESTIGIOUS New York banks—Chase Manhattan and J. P. Morgan & Co.—decided to cross to Delaware, not to liberate but to impose new burdens on the already overburdened American. The Delaware deal involved skillful planning.

Over a period of six months, the best brains that these banks could buy were at work devising a new law under which banks could operate their credit card schemes. Finally, they came up with a devilish device.

THE BANKS COULD charge without legal ceilings; they could jack up the rates retroactively; they could charge some folk one rate and other folk another; they could impose any fee they wished for the privilege of using credit cards; and they could foreclose on a house for failure to pay up when debts on cards fell due.

Dreaming up this banker's dream probably came easily. But how to get a state—any state—to write such usurious practices into law was probably more difficult, especially if the banks are located in a state like New York where the legislature is in nobody's back pocket and where the citizenry knows how to scream.

So the bankers crossed to Delaware, where Pierre S. duPont IV is the government and where E. I. duPont de Nemours & Co. is the economy. In a brief three hours, the necessary bill went scooting through the legislature, although the New York Times reports, "many legislators say they did not read the 61-page bill before agreeing to sponsor it and did not understand the complicated measure before voting on it."

WITH THIS LAW as a lure, Gov. duPont began a cross-country sales tour to induce banks to come to Delaware, a state with a "hospitable climate" for banks.

So far, not one bank has moved to Delaware. But many banks are telling their state governments that unless they are as generous to the banks as Delaware is, the banks will pack up and leave for a cozier clime. In other words, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and every other state that puts some restraints on banks issuing credit cards must do like the bankers want—or else.

If a state wants to impose restraints, wants to protect the consumer, it will have a hard time doing the right thing. It may lose big banks. In short, the meanest set the measure for proper conduct.

This little story is almost a classic model of what happens when we "leave it to the states." First, there are no federal standards, no floor to decency, no norm below which no one may sink. Second, each state is free to cut the throat of a neighboring state.

MORE IMPORTANT, business people with large operations can play one state off against another. They get Delaware to act, then they use Delaware as a club over the head of New York et al, then they finally get everything their own way.

Leaving it to the states means, too often, leaving it to the richest to run the whole country.

Budget Cuts No Cure For Trade Problems

The way to solve the budget problem is not to deny workers payments the law entitles them to receive.

Administration proposals that amount to a termination of trade adjustment assistance would deny to American workers hurt by imports the benefits to which the Trade Act of 1974 entitled them.

The Administration is not claiming that conditions have changed. It merely decided to cut the $1.5 billion estimated by the Carter Administration to $350 million, and then proposed radical legislative surgery to accomplish that objective.

The Administration proposals are not based on the assertion that fewer workers will be adversely affected by imports than estimated. It proposes only that fewer workers will be paid and the payments will be lower.

Imports are continuing to rise, particularly from low-wage countries. We believe that the program should be continued and that the Administration's proposals should be rejected because they effectively end the program.

Justice System on Trial

Legal Aid for Poor at Stake

By Norman Hill
President, A. Philip Randolph Institute

WHILE PRESIDENT REAGAN'S budget cuts will eliminate a number of vital programs, few of the cuts will have more far-reaching consequences than the proposed elimination of the Legal Service Corp.

Created in the 1960s in the context of the Great Society and the War on Poverty, the Legal Services Corp. has been the most significant instrument the poor possess to insure adequate representation before the courts. A number of Reagan's ultra-conservative advisers have suggested that the federally funded legal aid program is a hotbed of radicalism and leftist politics. In truth, the program's 6,000 lawyers who serve 330 communities throughout the United States are involved most often in such critical issues as landlord-tenant relations, welfare rights, and civil rights.

OVER THE YEARS millions of poor and working poor have benefited from this legal aid network. The poor have used the system to challenge improper dismissals from work, landlord harassment and building code violations, and discrimination in employment.

An important instrument by which millions of Americans have indirectly benefited is the class action suit. In such suits, often brought by legal aid lawyers, judges do not simply resolve a single dispute but impose remedial orders which have the effect of improving the lives of large numbers of Americans.

The elimination of the legal aid program will result in fewer such suits being brought to the courts and in fewer direct benefits to workers.

In the distant past, lawsuits were relatively straightforward matters and the legal system was turned to only as a matter of last resort. Today, with the increased complexity of government regulations and laws, access to informed legal advice and legal aid is an absolute necessity.

THE LEGAL AID program has intervened in behalf of unemployed workers denied welfare benefits, illegitimate children, and social security recipients who couldn't get cases reopened for government hearings. This list of issues hardly suggests that legal aid programs are being run by ultra-leftist extremists. Rather it suggests that the legal aid system is truly defending the interests of the poor.

Our system has prided itself on its basis in equal protection under the law. The unfortunate consequence of Reagan's proposed elimination of the Legal Services Corp. is that it will make the courts accessible only to those who are well off. Putting the poor outside the law will lead to greater bitterness and alienation.

Conservatives have claimed that well-intentioned programs designed to deal with poverty have often resulted in consequences more harmful than the benefits that have been provided.

What we will learn from the Reagan era is that the elimination of certain government programs may have consequences which are in the long-run more costly and damaging than the immediate budgetary savings that they bring.

Return to Welfare

Budgeted Shortcut to Poverty

SUPPOSE THE government cuts funds for day care programs. This is a reasonable supposition since many social programs of this kind, which provide help to the next-to-poor, or the poor-plus-one, are on the Administration's budget-cutting list. What will happen to the federal budget in consequence? Will it decrease by the amount of the program cut?

No—more likely, it will increase. This is because those women whose children were previously cared for by day care programs will give up their low-paying jobs and go back on welfare, rejoining the ranks of the "truly needy" whom the President has pledged to protect. This, in turn, will drive up costs not only for the basic welfare program—Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC)—but also for food stamps, Medicaid and low-income energy assistance.

THE POINT IS that it is remarkably and temptingly easy to fool yourself about budget savings. Some kinds of short-term savings quickly bound back as long-term costs in other parts of federal, state or local budgets. Job, training, compensatory education, family planning and child care programs have helped many people to get out or stay out of poverty. That's why they were set up in the first place.

But many of these immigrants from poverty remain precariously placed at the borderline of that subsistence level of living that officialdom has characterized as "truly poor." Cut child care and the working mother is likely to be pushed back onto welfare. Cut jobs and training and chances increase that not only adults but also their children, another generation of poor, will end up on the list of the chronically dependent.

REPATRIATING PEOPLE back into the land of officially designated poverty would be monstrous social and economic policy. Being officially poor means having income less than the government's "poverty line," a measure originally developed by multiplying the cost of a just-above-starvation diet by three.

No one thinks this definition is a model of conceptual perfection, but all you really need to know about it is that the level of living it provides is, by the standards of modern American life, wretched. And yet not a single state has a family welfare benefit that, combined with food stamps, reaches even this ungenerous standard. Some states have combined benefits less than half that amount.

So in your attempts to think rationally and fairly about the continuing budget cuts, tuck this away as another principle: cutting back on aid to the less needy may sound efficient and relatively costless and, in some cases, it might be. But it isn't necessarily the case. A small investment in the poor-plus-one population can help keep the ranks of the "truly needy"—and the taxpayer burden of supporting them and their children—from growing now and in the future.

30,000 Jobs Affected

Rail Service Under Budget Ax

PROPOSED transportation budget cuts would end railroad passenger and freight service in much of the country and substantially boost fares and rates where service continues, President Fred J. Kroll of the Railway & Airline Clerks warned.

Kroll said that Amtrak cutbacks "would virtually destroy the passenger system in the United States." He said as many as 30,000 railroad jobs would be wiped out if Congress approves the substantial reductions of Amtrak and Conrail appropriations urged by the Administration.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, the AFL-CIO vice president said the cutbacks of rail passenger service would hit low-income Americans particularly hard, pointing out that they are heavy users of the system.

Kroll said Conrail's report to Congress also urges wage restrictions and "government oversight" of collective bargaining that would cause severe harm to labor-management relations.

HE SAID THE proposal that Conrail employees "get no wage increases until lower-paid clerical people in geographical sectors catch up" could leave BRAC members "sitting for ten years without a raise."

Kroll predicted that negotiations for new contracts with Amtrak and Conrail, which started a few weeks ago, will be "the most difficult we've had in half a century."

LEGISLATION TO establish a subminimum wage for teenagers was given a public airing by the Senate Labor subcommittee chaired by Don Nickles, a newly elected Republican conservative.

Nickles, a businessman from Oklahoma, has introduced a bill which would altogether eliminate minimum wage protection for workers under 18.

Another bill introduced by Labor Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) would allow employers to pay workers under 20 years old 25 percent less than the minimum wage for up to six months. A third bill would cut the wage floor for teenagers by 15 percent.

Nickles and Hatch have labeled their proposals "Youth Opportunity" bills which, they contend, could alleviate the problem of youth unemployment, especially among minority teenagers.

Teenage unemployment, the Labor Dept. has reported, stood at 19.3 percent in February, with black teenage joblessness at 35.5 percent. Similarly high jobless rates have persisted among youth for several years.

AT THE HEARINGS in late March, Hatch called the teenage jobless situation "a cancer" and "a new form of slavery." He noted that jobless youth often turn to crime.

But despite the uncharacteristically strong language about the plight of jobless youth, Hatch and other subminimum wage proponents admit they don't know "whether it will work or not," as Hatch put it, to make a significant dent in the problem.

The subcommittee heard testimony from impartial experts that a youth wage differential would have only a marginal effect on teenage unemployment. Also, it was predicted that any jobs would more likely go to suburban white teenagers rather than to the hard-core unemployed youths in the inner city.

Moreover, labor officials testified that there would be displacement of adult workers by teenagers hired at the lower wage. It was pointed out that nearly 70 percent of those working at the minimum wage levels are adults, many with families to support. Of these adults, some 70 percent are women.

Thus, one group of workers would be pitted against another. Rather than creating employment, unemployment would be redistributed.

Rather than talking about a subminimum wage as a way to lessen youth unemployment, labor and civil rights representatives urged the Senate panel to focus on programs to train and employ jobless young people. The same Republican senators calling loudly for a youth wage are stalwarts for the Administration's budget-cutting drive, including cutbacks in youth jobs programs.

Government economic policies geared toward full employment would be the best overall approach to youth joblessness, which is especially sensitive to changes in the economy, the labor leaders told Congress.

SOME BUSINESS GROUPS which have lobbied in the past for a two-tier wage declined to testify at the hearings. It was said that the businessmen feared that legislation to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act will open up the question of raising the minimum wage.

Indeed, the labor officials told the Senators that Congress should consider raising the inflation-shrunken wage floor and indexing it to the cost of living.

It was noted that the minimum wage, to have maintained the same buying power of the $1.40 minimum in 1967, should now be $3.75 an hour. On Jan. 1, the floor went to $3.35 an hour and will remain there unless Congress acts.

Instead of going with the current game plan of placing the burden of a lagging economy on those who can least afford to bear it, Congress should provide for a living wage for millions of "working poor" Americans.

DEEP BUDGET CUTS proposed by the Reagan Administration threaten needed railroad services and 30,000 related jobs, President Fred J. Kroll, center, of the Railway & Airline Clerks warned. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Lee Coney, left, of the Daily Labor Report and Drew Von Bergen of United Press International. The program, produced by the AFL-CIO as a public service, is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Blaming the Victims

Food Stamp Cut Viewed As Rip in 'Safety Net'

Food stamps are a major line of defense against hunger for the jobless, the poor and the elderly living on welfare budgets, and gains made in the program should be preserved, the AFL-CIO told the Senate Agriculture Committee.

Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson tied the growth in the program to the lack of growth in the economy and to mounting state and local budget problems.

EVERY ONE PERCENT of unemployment increases food stamp participation by 1 to 1.2 million persons, Peterson said, pointing out that "more and more states are decreasing their welfare payments to the poor and forcing the food stamp program to take up the slack."

The AFL-CIO opposes cuts in the program sought by the Administration, Peterson said. He noted that the present Food Stamp Act is the result of "intensive efforts" over the past four years to make benefits more accessible to the needy and streamline administrative procedures.

Peterson questioned Administration claims that large cuts in aid, which provides about 44 cents a meal for food, would still provide a "safety net for the truly needy."

ALL RECIPIENTS of food stamps are poor, Peterson emphasized. Some 87 percent have gross incomes below the official poverty line, he said, adding that "those with incomes above the poverty line have numbers of dependents and excessive shelter and other expenses which bring their net incomes below the poverty level."

Peterson criticized the proposed "retrospective accounting" method of determining eligibility for food stamps, which would base eligibility for aid on a period of past income rather than current need.

It would penalize workers recently laid off or who have run out of unemployment benefits who would have to "suffer a period of several weeks with no income" before being eligible for food stamps to feed their families, Peterson pointed out.

MIGRANT WORKERS and others with low, fluctuating incomes would be hurt by this system, Peterson said, pointing out that it could be used to deny food stamps to strikers who, although they account for only two-tenths of 1 percent of food stamp recipients, are repeatedly singled out for attack.

Another proposal, which would force food stamp families to mail in monthly income statements or lose benefits, could create "serious hardship" for the elderly, the disabled and others, Peterson said. And he branded as unjust the Administration proposal to drop inflation-fueled shelter and energy adjustments from eligibility formulas.

The plan to reduce food stamp benefits for families with children enrolled in school lunch programs would cut benefits to about 43 percent of recipients, Peterson told the committee. He voiced labor's opposition at the same time to an Administration proposal to cut some $1 billion from the child nutrition and school lunch program itself.

STRESSING THAT the needy are victims of a poor economy, not the cause of it, he scored Administration plans to slash cost-of-living adjustments for food stamp benefits and pointed out that the proposal to cut off all households from food stamp programs whose incomes exceed $11,000 a year after July 1 would "hit hardest at those people who are trying to work their way out of dependency on public programs."

The AFL-CIO believes that energy directed at slashing the food stamp program would be better used for programs to reduce the number of poor who need them, Peterson said.

The needy "have the most to lose as they wait on the Administration's untested economic theory to provide jobs," he observed.

AIW Brewery Local Wins Role In Governing Pension Funds

Frankenmuth, Mich.—Members of Allied Industrial Workers Local 812 will have a voice in the investment of their pension funds as the local won agreement on joint administration of the plan at the G. Heileman Brewing Co. plant here.

While joint labor-management policy decisions on multi-employer plans are not uncommon, such a system is relatively rare in single-employer programs.

THE HEILEMAN plan provides for a joint administrative committee composed of members appointed separately by the union and the company, with each side casting one aggregate vote. In the case of a deadlock, a neutral third-party arbitration procedure may be invoked.

"The exciting part of this particular program is that we were able to negotiate a joint administrative committee with overall authority and responsibility for the operation of the plan," AIW President Dominic D'Ambrosio said. "This will include making the basic decisions with regards to the funding agent and the philosophy as to how the assets are to be invested. The committee will also hear and make all decisions on claim disputes."

While the pact provides for joint control of the basic investment and benefit decisions, the company retains the right to select and supervise the actuary, the master trustee, and the plan administrator who maintains the records. However, it is the joint administrative committee which will decide on the investment managers and give investment instructions to these managers.

"WHEN WE first put this proposal on the table, the company went into a whole song-and-dance about fiduciary responsibility like it was some sort of deadly disease," AIW Assistant Research Director Jeff MacDonald recalled.

"But our local bargaining committee understood that this is simply the kind of responsibility you'd want anyone to accept who has authority over someone else's money. It's very much of a common-sense thing, not something only experts and lawyers can comprehend," he said.

MacDonald indicated that the union would offer an education and training program for its new pension trustees.

ANOTHER AIW unit, Local 806 at the Caterpillar Tractor Co. in Milwaukee, recently negotiated a joint board for the administration of a newly created supplemental employment benefit program. Three union and three company representatives will make up the board, which will be responsible for determining the eligibility of workers for benefits and the level of benefits for which they qualify.

The Caterpillar board will not have any investment authority, although the negotiated agreement specifies the types of investments permissible. A third-party chairman may be appointed to resolve disputed issues.

Mine Workers Reject Pact by 2-to-1 Margin

Members of the unaffiliated Mine Workers voted down a tentative three-year agreement with the soft-coal industry, pushing their strike against the operators into its second week.

The union said that members voted against the pact's ratification by a margin of more than 2 to 1. While the contract won approval in some small UMW units, it was defeated in the larger membership districts of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia.

Reached on Mar. 23, the proposed contract with the Bituminous Coal Operators' Association would have replaced the miners' old pact that expired on Mar. 27.

Cleveland Adopts Strict Law Regulating Company Guards

Cleveland—Tough legislation to curb excesses of private plant security guards, prompted by labor's complaints about the killing of a union picket, has been passed by the Cleveland City Council.

Councilman Michael R. White, a Democrat, called the new ordinance one of the "most stringent laws regulating security guards on strike premises."

THE LEGISLATION, which has been amended four times since White, at the urging of the Cleveland AFL-CIO, introduced it about 27 months ago, requires armed security guards tto be licensed by the city and bonded to at least $5,000.

Private security firms must have comprehensive liability insurance and must purchase a $150 license from the city.

Labor and community pressure for the ordinance came after the shooting of Thomas Moss, Jr., a welder and member of Upholsterers Local 48, by a Chicago security guard. Moss was killed while on picket duty at the struck Bargar Metal Fabricating Co. in January 1978. Cleveland unions raised $20,000 for his survivors.

Local union officials had attended more than 10 hearings on the new city law offering testimony.

"It was a long hard struggle but justice prevailed," said Sebastian Lupica, executive secretary of the Cleveland AFL-CIO. "All of labor worked hard for passage and Councilman White never gave up."

"NOT ONLY should union members be safer during strikes from the actions of irresponsible security guards because the ordinance should help weed out most of the bad ones, but the general public will benefit," said Martin J. Hughes, president of the central labor body.

Hughes said another important provision is that security guards working labor disputes are prohibited from leaving their firms with a weapon.

The law also prohibits a security guard working a labor dispute from discharging a weapon except to protect his life or the life of another person.

In life-threatening situations, police must be called, the ordinance specifies. Violators will be subject to damages determined by a court.

All security guards will be required to carry city-issued identification cards with photographs and may not carry weapons more powerful than a .38-caliber pistol.

Unions Cover 61% of Federal Workforce

More than three out of five federal employees were represented by unions last year, excluding the solidly organized U.S. Postal Service which once represented the bulk of organized public sector workers.

The government's Office of Personnel Management reported that 1,250,000 non-postal federal employees are in bargaining units, and 1,167,265 of them are protected by negotiated agreements. The union-represented group is up 4,000 from the previous year and the number covered by contract is 18,443 higher.

ON A PERCENTAGE basis, 61 percent of the federal workforce is represented by unions.

There are also 586,100 postal workers represented by unions, 88 percent of total postal employment.

In all these percentage figures, supervisory and management-level employees are considered as part of the workforce. The percentage of the workforce represented by unions would be higher if persons not eligible for bargaining units were excluded.

While there are more white-collar salaried employees than hourly-paid blue-collar workers in federal bargaining units, 86 percent of the blue-collar workers are represented by unions compared with 54 percent of white-collar workers.

THE AMERICAN Federation of Government Employees, representing 509,500 salaried employees and 186,460 blue-collar employees, bargains for the largest group of federal workers. Others with substantial bargaining units are the Metal Trades Councils and the Machinists, among AFL-CIO affiliates, and the unaffiliated National Federation of Federal Employees, Treasury Employees Union and National Association of Government Employees.

There are no union security provisions in contracts covering federal workers so that, especially in the non-postal fields, large numbers of workers vote for union representation but do not belong to the unions that bargain for them.

While union representation figures were little changed over the year, OPM reported a decline in bargaining units as the result of major consolidations of units in the Veterans Administration and the General Services Administration. The average bargaining unit size, 474 last year, is 42 percent higher than five years ago.

Labor Press Wins Postal Discount Rate

The AFL-CIO International Labor Press Association won a major victory for all non-profit publications when the Postal Rate Commission agreed to provide the same special discounts available to regular rate publications.

The decision, upheld by the governors of the U.S. Postal Service, came after a four-year fight by ILPA to win discounts for pre-sorting mail to Postal Service specifications. The discounts reflect savings to USPS from having mailers perform these tasks in their own mailrooms.

ALTHOUGH THE rate commission had agreed with ILPA in two earlier rate cases that non-profit mailers should be entitled to the discounts for pre-sorting to various zip code and carrier route levels, the most recent case, decided Feb. 19, was the first time the commission actually set the discounts in the rate structure.

ILPA Sec.-Treas. Susan Dunlop, in a statement outlining the discounts, pointed out that while only larger publications would be in a position to take advantage of the more sophisticated carrier route sorting, labor papers that sort only to the zip code level will realize total savings of more than $1 million in 1981 compared with the previous rate structure. Most labor publications already sort at this level, Dunlop pointed out, and the cost factor of adjusting to the new sorting requirements is negligible.

By 1987, Dunlop noted the savings from zip code sorting could amount to nearly $2 million per year in postal costs for the labor press.

SHE WARNED, however, that the victory would be curtailed if the Administration's budget cut proposals for the Postal Service are adopted.

The cuts would eliminate almost immediately the phasing of a long-term series of rate increases for non-profit publications. Both second and third class non-profit postal rates would virtually double on Oct. 1, 1981, and the effect of the newly won discounts would be lessened, Dunlop said.

Economic Index In 3-Month Drop

for the country this year. A forecast last month anticipated that "real" gross national product — the inflation-adjusted value of all goods and services produced in the country — would rise only about 1.1 percent this year, following last year's decline of two-tenths of 1 percent.

Six of the 10 indicators available for the Commerce Dept. report on economic trends contributed to last month's decline in the index, with the sharpest drop coming in the length of the average factory workweek. This was estimated at 39.8 hours, down from 40.4 hours in January.

Other signs of economic weakness involved the layoff rate, contracts and orders for plant and equipment, building permits, stock prices, and money supply.

The four indicators reflecting strength were the percentage of companies reporting slower deliveries from suppliers, new orders for consumer and manufacturing goods, producer prices, and the change in liquid assets.

BUDGET ILLS should be cured by job-creating programs, not funding cuts that add to unemployment, Communication Workers President Glenn Watts told delegates to the union's legislative conference. Afternoons during the three-day meeting were spent in visits to legislators on Capitol Hill urging preservation of vital social and jobs programs.

N.Y. Sweatshops Targeted for Wage Abuses

The Labor Dept. has ordered a special strike force into New York City's garment district as part of a nationwide crackdown on violations of federal minimum wage, overtime, and child labor laws.

Citing increasing reports of an upsurge in violations of the wage laws and a return of "sweatshops" to the New York area, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan pledged "to use my full legal authority" to protect workers from exploitation and uphold the Fair Labor Standards Act. The act requires employers to pay a minimum of $3.35 an hour and also to pay overtime for work in excess of 40 hours a week.

THE LABOR DEPT. began using strike forces in February 1979 in New York's Chinatown district. The enforcement team's efforts there resulted in over 100 court injunctions against minimum wage and overtime violators.

The strike force concept involves focusing a team of experienced compliance officers in geographic areas or industries where workplace abuses are believed to be widespread.

In fiscal year 1980, the Wage & Hour Division of the Labor Dept.'s Employment Standards Administration, which administers the Fair Labor Standards Act, conducted more than 1,600 strike force investigations. About $4.7 million in wage underpayments was found owed to low-income workers. Over $2 million has already been refunded to workers, and the department is suing to recover the balance.

DONOVAN SAID that while reports of abuses are widespread, they are often difficult to document.

"Our compliance officers can and do find substandard working conditions. They also find undocumented workers who fear deportation, and therefore do not file complaints. Records are often not kept. Hours worked are falsified. Social security numbers are not listed. Home addresses are not maintained. Time cards are inaccurately punched. Workers are often paid 'off the books,'" he said.

CWA Legislative Sessions Score Budget-Cutting Fever

Job-creating programs would do more to balance the federal budget than slashing spending for social programs and thereby adding to the unemployment rolls, Communications Workers President Glenn Watts told the union's national legislative conference.

Emphasis at the Washington meeting was on political and legislative action to deal with the new political climate in Congress and the White House.

WATTS TOLD the 1,000 delegates that the Administration's budget-cutting economic package is "cold, insensitive and impersonal."

"It doesn't take an economist," he observed, "to conclude that the Reagan plan will require the greatest sacrifices from those least able to make them."

With each afternoon of the Washington conference set aside for personal calls on senators and representatives, Watts urged the delegates to make the budget issue the "top priority" on visits to Capitol Hill. He warned that congressional rubber-stamping of the Administration's proposals could result in "the worst assault on the nation's poor and needy, its minorities, and even its middle class," since the Depression.

Watts questioned whether budget cuts of "essential social programs that will weaken the economy, increase unemployment by up to a million jobs and cause individual hardships" could actually cure budget deficits. Eliminating job programs will increase unemployment, he pointed out, terming such proposals "a strange way to foster economic recovery."

He called for adoption of labor's alternative program stressing job creation and full employment as antidoes to the nation's economic ills.

KENNETH YOUNG, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, told the CWA delegates they were in the forefront of "people coming to the nation's capital to make it clear that American workers strongly oppose wiping out more than 40 years of social progress."

Labor rejects the view "that the new Administration came to this city with a mandate to take from the workers and give to the wealthy," Young said.

He called the Administration's endorsement of so-called supply-side economics a gamble with the economy which would "pour benefits on the wealthy" in the hope that "eventually some will spill over to those most in need."

Tax breaks for corporations, he said, should be targeted to the Administration's own definition of "the truly needy" to help damaged industries and areas of high unemployment rather than already thriving industries.

Donovan Pressed on Policy For Migrants, Job Programs

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called on Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan to clarify Administration policy on immigration and on funding of manpower programs.

In a letter to Donovan, Kirkland cited reports that the Administration's Interagency Task Force on Immigration Policy will shortly recommended the adoption of "some sort of 'bracero' or 'guestworker' programs."

ANY SUCH recommendation is "contrary to the interests of U.S. workers and will exacerbate unemployment and undermine the already low level of wages" in industries likely to employ imported workers, Kirkland said.

"We will oppose any program which would have such results, and I would ask that you exercise your full authority to prevent this injury to American workers," he added.

Uncertainty caused by the absence of firm Administration policy on the implementation of budget cuts affecting a number of national manpower programs is causing "difficulties and hardship" for hundreds of workers who conduct the programs and tens of thousands enroll in them, Kirkland said.

Although Labor Dept. contracts covering some 30 national contracting agencies, including the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, were to expire on Mar. 31, Kirkland said in his letter of Mar. 26, the situation is confused by conflicting "rumors of one-month extensions, phasing down, phasing out, etc."

THE AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions involved in these programs "feel a heavy responsibility" to all persons involved in them, Kirkland said.

"It is impossible to continue to hold these organizations together, to maintain trained staffs, to plan for the future or to reassure present enrollees, without clarification of future policy from the Labor Dept.," Kirkland concluded. "I urge you to consider this matter and to provide the clearest possible information about these programs, their contracts and their future as promptly as possible."

Three Summer Schools Set for Union Women

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and the Coalition of Labor Union Women will co-sponsor three regional schools for union women this summer in cooperation with the Task Force on Education for Union Women of the University & College Labor Education Association.

Each five-day school will include workshops on grievance handling, public speaking, newsletter publication, assertiveness training, organizing and legislative and political issues of importance to labor. The schools are open to all union women, and teaching staff will come from university labor education departments, the AFL-CIO and unions.

The Northeast and Mid-Atlantic school will be held July 19-24 at the University of Maine, Orono. The Midwest school will be held July 26-31 at Macalester College, St. Paul, Minn., and the Southern school will meet Aug. 9-14 at Unicoi Resort, Helen, Ga. Information on applications and tuition is available from state federation officers in each region or from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

As Conversions Surge

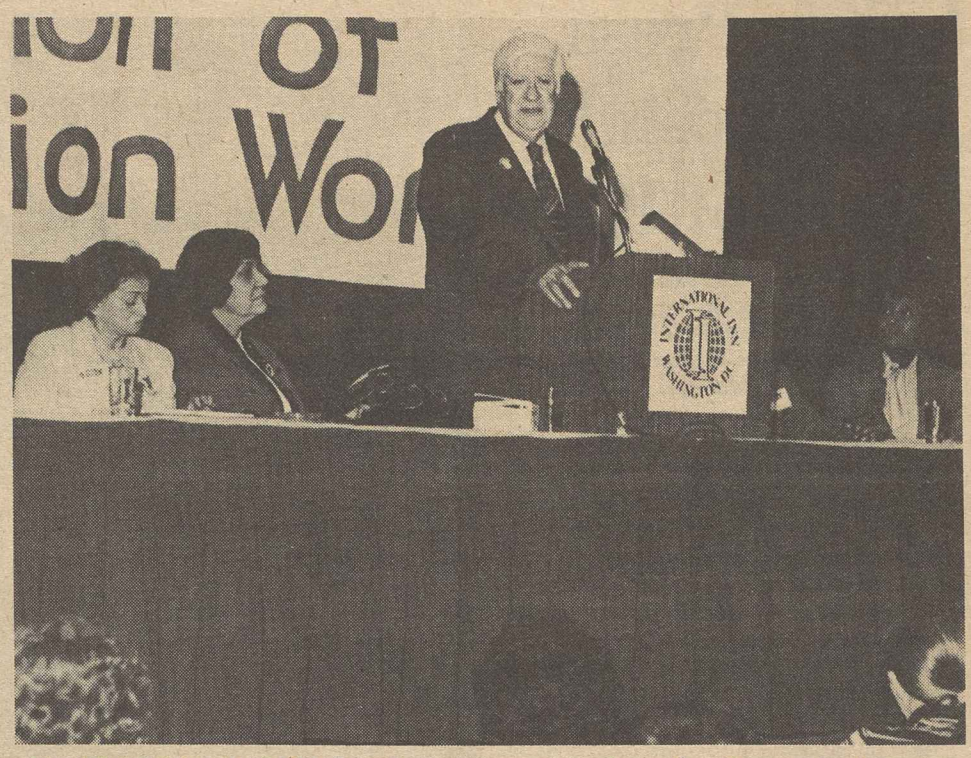
Curb on Abuses Urged In 'Condo' Takeovers

The increase in rental property conversion to high-priced condominium and cooperative apartments at a time when housing generally is in short supply is creating hardships for many Americans, the AFL-CIO warned Congress.

"Measures must be adopted to combat the inequity and social stress, as well as the inflationary impact, of unrestrained conversion of rental properties," Henry B. Schechter, director of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, said in testimony submitted to a House Government Operations subcommittee.

IN VIEW of tight rental markets and the accelerating trend toward conversions, he said Congress should consider several steps, including:

- Expanded authority for federally assisted, newly constructed rental housing to enlarge the available supply for low- and middle-income Americans, "rather than the drastic reductions being proposed by the Reagan Administration."
- The exercise of selective credit regulation under the 1968 Credit Control Act to halt the financing of condominium conversions until the housing supply has expanded to adequate levels so that conversions will not add to inflation.
- A study to determine whether more definite guidelines are needed on condominium conversions and whether to provide for federal intervention if appropriate state or local measures are not adopted.



A RECENT Housing & Urban Development Dept. study showed that by late 1979 and in the first half of 1980, between 20 and 30 percent of new apartment units being completed, or about 100,000 a year, were condominiums or cooperatives, Schechter observed. But the rate of condominium creation through conversion of existing rental apartment buildings has been overtaking new construction of such units, he added.

The highest incidence of conversions in the country has occurred in the metropolitan Washington, D.C., area, Schechter noted. A study by the area's Council of Governments showed that 15,102 condominiums were added there in the year ended last July 1. Of these, 79 percent, or 11,922, were rental units that had been converted.

THE CONVERSIONS work their greatest hardships on the previous tenants. On the average, about 60 percent of the pre-conversion tenants move rather than buy or remain as tenants, Schechter pointed out. A HUD survey showed that close to half of the former renters who did not purchase said they could not afford to do so.

A high proportion of the non-purchasing movers were in the low-income group, were elderly or were families with three or more persons that generally need three or more bedrooms.

For the owner of a rental housing property in a tight market, an opportunity to sell to a converter is often quite advantageous, especially if the property is at an age when major repairs or equipment replacements are needed, Schechter noted. For the converters, there is an opportunity to realize fat profits. The result is not only added inflation, but further housing shortages.

CONCERNED RESPONSE of workers opposed to the Reagan budget can shrink congressional support for the proposed cuts, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill tells the national legislative conference of the Coalition of Labor Union Women in Washington. With O'Neill are, from left, Evelyn Dubrow, vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers; CLUW President Joyce Miller, a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers and of the AFL-CIO, and Clara Day, Teamsters representative.

O'Neill Cites Impact of Mail In Shifting Mood of Congress

Americans who oppose the Reagan budget cuts should write their legislators now to ask their support in fighting the cuts, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill urged the national legislative conference of the Coalition of Labor Union Women.

The Massachusetts Democrat told the 500 CLUW delegates that "members of Congress tend to follow the mood of the public, and for the moment they think that mood is a mandate to cut, cut, cut."

LEGISLATORS will be responsive to a shift in perception about what their constituents actually want because "they are concerned about the economy at home, they are concerned about the people at home, and they are concerned about the next election," O'Neill said.

He pointed to his own experience with what he called "a coming change" in the public attitude in defense of health, education and jobs programs. O'Neill told the conference that his own mail started out 100-to-1 in favor of the Administration's program, then dropped to 10-to-1 and is now running about 3-to-2 in favor.

CLUW President Joyce Miller, an AFL-CIO vice president and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, said the conference theme, "Strategies for the '80s," was chosen to highlight the need for working women and other Americans "to join hands with those who share our concerns and prepare for positive action to counter the threats to workers, men and women alike" posed by the Reagan Administration's budget-cutting proposals.

THE NEED to preserve social programs in the budget is important to working women, Miller stressed, because they stand "to be hit the hardest and for the longest time if we fail to win this fight."

The national policies and programs of concern to working women and others took many years to win and must not be allowed to be washed away now, Miller told the delegates who spent one afternoon of the conference in visits to members of Congress to seek support of budget positions.

Miller agreed that all Americans must "pitch in" to fight economic problems, stressing that "the trade union women of this nation will work in our unions and with other groups to assure that the burden of sacrifice is borne equally. And that means not 'pitching out' equal employment opportunity laws, sabotaging the minimum wage or denying legal sanctions for health and safety on the job."

THE VALUE and technique of building coalitions to achieve legislative goals was also discussed by Rep. Margaret Heckler (R-Mass.), who heads the Congressional women's caucus; Rep. Robert Garcia (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Hispanic caucus; and Del. Walter Fauntroy (D-D.C.), chairman of the black caucus.

Other speakers included Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women; Dorothy Height, president of the National Council of Negro Women; Msgr. Francis J. Lally, secretary of the U.S. Catholic Conference's Dept. of Social Development and World Peace; Carl Green, networks director of the Congressional Black Caucus; Barbara Wertheimer, associate professor at the New York School of Industrial & Labor Relations; and Oscar Sanchez, secretary-treasurer of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

Budget Cuts Seen Destroying Incentives of Working Poor

The combined effect of Reagan Administration cutbacks in federal aid programs would reduce the income of the working poor and leave them little better off than those on welfare, thus destroying the incentive to work, according to the University of Chicago Center for the Study of Welfare Policy.

The center studied the impact of proposed reductions on working and non-working poor families in 10 states.

AFTER CONSIDERING the impact in Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), food stamps, Medicaid, public housing and emergency fuel assistance and job programs, the center concluded:

"Taken alone, each cut seems to be small enough to allow a recipient to absorb it with other income. Taken together, the effects of the cuts are great enough that many families will be unable to meet their monthly living expenses."

The Reagan Administration has held that the cuts will hurt low-income workers only modestly and, rather than reducing the incentive to work, will encourage the working poor to work harder to make up the difference. This is a departure from the policy of a previous Administrations and Congress to build work incentives into the welfare system by supplementing the income of low-paid, poverty-level workers in order to increase differences in disposable income between earners and non-earners.

THE CENTER'S comparisons between the monthly disposable incomes of low-paid working families and families who rely totally on public assistance were done using only the proposed changes in AFDC and food stamps.

Changes in these programs proposed by the Administration include: no longer allowing deductions for work-related expenses such as transportation, social security taxes and child care in calculating AFDC eligibility; counting the earned-income tax credit for workers earning less than $10,000 as part of income; and deducting free school lunches from food stamp allotments.

In some states, the proposed budget reductions would make the differences in disposable income between earners and non-earners almost negligible, according to the center's calculations. For example, based on average monthly income of a mother with two children, the difference between earners and non-earners would be reduced from $64 under the current system to no difference under the proposed changes. In Utah, the difference would be reduced from $116 to $8. In New York, the difference would drop from $162 to $15.

CONGRESS MUST find "less onerous ways of reducing federal spending," the study concluded, "without abandoning the commitments to economic and social justice which our nation has made."

The non-partisan center is directed by Thomas C. W. Joe, a former welfare official in the Nixon Administration. Joe was the principal author of the new study, which is intended to provide background material for considering the proposed changes in legislation made by the Reagan Administration.

Government Poverty Line Rises to $8,450 for Family

The federal government has boosted its official poverty-level guideline for family income by $1,000 to $8,450, the Labor Dept. reported.

The guideline, which is used by numerous federal agencies to determine income eligibility for programs that assist the poor, reflects increases in consumer prices over the past year. The change became effective on Mar. 11.

Under the new guideline, an urban family of four living in the continental United States is considered below the poverty level if its income totals $8,450 a year or less.

A "single-person" family would be considered poor under the revised guidelines if income were below $3,680. That ceiling is $430 higher than a year earlier.

The eligibility requirements for most programs under the Comprehensive Education & Training Act include the definition of "economically disadvantaged" person, which is based in part on the poverty-level guideline.

OSHA Retreat on Hazards Hit

Identification Of Chemicals Called Vital

The Reagan Administration showed pro-industry bias and a lack of concern for workers by scuttling an OSHA proposal to require identification of chemical hazards in workplaces, the AFL-CIO charged at House hearings.

Workers have a "right-to-know" about the health risks they may encounter on the job, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison insisted.

THE HEARINGS, by an Education & Labor subcommittee, concern withdrawal of a hazard identification regulation that had been proposed by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration last January and the cancellation of hearings at which interested parties were to have commented on the proposal.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan announced withdrawal of the OSHA proposal immediately after he took office, dismissing it as a "midnight regulation" of the outgoing Carter Administration.

Denison, joined by AFL-CIO Safety Director George H. R. Taylor and Margaret Seminario, industrial hygienist for the federation, sharply disputed that view.

Lack of knowledge about chemical ingredients and hazards has caused "disease, injury and death," he said.

The OSHA proposal, which was more limited than labor had urged, was the outgrowth of years of discussions and negotiations dating back to the Ford Administration, Denison noted.

IT WAS abruptly withdrawn, he stressed, "before hearing from the labor movement . . . before an Assistant Secretary of Labor for OSHA had been nominated, and with no review of the proposed regulation or consultation with OSHA staff familiar with the rule or its history."

The department's action was politically motivated, Denison charged.

Denison noted that less than a week before the withdrawal of the hazard identification proposal, the Chemical Manufacturers Association had written to top Administration officials, as well as to Donovan, to protest that the hazard disclosure requirement would be costly and burdensome.

The circumstances "suggest that political motivation was the sole basis for this

Oil Decontrol Fuels New Rise In Energy Costs

Prospects for any near-term improvement in wholesale prices remained clouded as the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported a 1.3 percent rise in its producer price index for March, about half of it due to surging energy costs following President Reagan's decontrol of domestic petroleum prices.

Food prices also rose, turning up by eight-tenths of 1 percent after several months of stable or slightly falling prices.

FRESH AND dried vegetable prices soared 19.4 percent, and fish prices were up 4 percent over the month. Pork rose 2.6 percent, although beef, veal, and processed poultry continued to decline.

On the other hand, sugar prices plunged 15.3 percent, and prices for Florida oranges declined 10.7 percent following a 57 percent surge in February.

The major factor in pushing producer

No All-Out Challenge

House Democrats Shape Milder Cuts in Budget

House Democrats prepared to challenge the details but not the thrust of the Reagan Administration's budget and tax proposals.

The showdowns will not come until early May, after Congress returns from a two-week Easter recess. But the Democratic alternatives are being put into final shape by the Budget Committee and the Ways & Means Committee, while the House Democratic Caucus has endeavored to build a party consensus around a statement of economic principles.

DEMOCRATS HOLD a 242-191 majority in the House. But the party leadership's strategy has been shaped with painful awareness that the 44-member Conservative Democratic Forum has already publicly embraced the President's program and may hold the balance of power in the House.

Budget Committee Chairman Jim Jones (D-Okla.) is hopeful of holding the bulk of Democratic conservatives for the package he has put together for a budget resolution setting both spending limits and revenue targets. Seventeen of the 18 committee Democrats agreed in caucus to support the proposal.

It would lessen the Administration's proposed cuts in a broad range of domestic programs—restoring about 25 percent of the Reagan reductions.

More than $1 billion would be added for Medicaid benefits through rejecting the Administration proposal to put a dollar ceiling on total outlays.

AN ADDITIONAL $2.8 billion would be allocated to a budget category that covers education, employment and social services.

Other additions to the Reagan budget would include funds for low-income fuel assistance, for aid to families with dependent children, and for legal aid to the poor. The minimum social security benefit would be gradually phased out, instead of abolished.

The military spending increase would be kept under the Administration budget through cutting back a military pay increase, but this aspect of the package was still being debated in committee.

DESPITE THE changes, the overall spending package was close enough to the President's proposals that Administration officials were relatively restrained in their criticism.

Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan termed the Democratic package "well-intentioned," but he nevertheless insisted that Congress shouldn't tamper with the President's programs because of the November election "mandate."

Further, any budget adopted by the House will eventually have to be compromised with the Senate version. And the Republican-controlled Senate up to now has given the President everything he has sought.

Budget, Tax Policies Seen Aggravating Economic Ills

The AFL-CIO accused the Reagan Administration of abusing the congressional budget process to force a rewriting of the nation's laws and protested that harsh spending cuts, inequitable tax policies and hasty deregulation will worsen problems they are supposed to solve.

Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor presented the AFL-CIO's alternative economic proposals to the Senate Budget Committee which is working on a resolution setting spending and revenue targets for the 1982 fiscal year, which starts next October.

THE SENATE has already approved, by a lopsided 88-10 vote, a resolution instructing its committees to revise laws within their jurisdiction in order to achieve the spending reductions that would be required by the Administration budget. On all key votes, the Senate's Republican majority had substantial support from conservative Democrats.

Taylor challenged the "simplistic notion that all of the nation's problems would go away if our government would simply spend less, tax less and protect less."

Federal budget deficits didn't create the problems, she said, and budget slashes won't solve them.

Budgets should be based on "the nation's needs and circumstances," Taylor stressed. But the Reagan budget rests instead "on economic theories that have no foundation in fact or logic," she said.

It represents "a corruption of the budgetary process" that usurps the normal legislative function, Taylor charged.

She said the Reagan budget would compel "revisions in laws without the benefit of careful, prudent considerations" and require "short-circuiting" of the legislative process.

TAYLOR reiterated the AFL-CIO's proposal for a more equitable and less

Tax-Free Bonds Termed Costly Treasury Drain

Tax-exempt industrial revenue bonds have been a windfall for companies that don't need a subsidy and a costly drain on federal revenues that can no longer be justified, the AFL-CIO testified.

A House Ways & Means subcommittee is looking into the program, and AFL-CIO Deputy Research Director Henry B. Schechter suggested that it be scrapped entirely.

INSTEAD, he urged, Congress should target business tax assistance "to the industries and areas where the needs are greatest" as part of an overall reindustrialization program.

Schechter noted that labor's criticisms of the "small-issue" industrial revenue bonds program has been documented in large part by a Congressional Budget Office study which pointed to windfalls from the program going "to firms that would have made the same investments without the tax benefits."

Enterprises financed through the tax-exempt bonds issued by state and local development agencies are supposed to serve a "public purpose." But Schechter

High Court Urged to Reject Delay on Cotton Dust Rule

The AFL-CIO has petitioned the Supreme Court to reject the Reagan Administration's request that the court shelve its review of the federal cotton dust standard.

The Clothing & Textile Workers and the Industrial Union Dept. joined in the petition opposing the government's attempt to short-circuit the high court's pending decision on the Occupational Safety & Health Administration regulation.

ASSISTANT LABOR Sec. Thorne G. Auchter, who heads OSHA, is seeking withdrawal of the 1978 cotton dust standard to conduct a so-called cost-benefit analysis in compliance with a Feb. 19 presidential directive.

In filing a memorandum with the court for the Labor Dept., the Solicitor General asked the justices to "refrain from further consideration of issues" involving the cotton dust standard which a federal appeals court upheld against an industry challenge last year.

The government also asked the justices to "vacate the judgment of the court of appeals" and remand the case back to the Labor Dept. "for further consideration and development."

WHEN THE case came before the Supreme Court, both the government's lawyers and union lawyers argued against the industry's contention that the standard should undergo a cost-benefit study. They pointed out that the very principle of cost-benefit analysis was inconsistent with the intent of the 1970 OSHA law to provide workers the safest possible workplace.

The part of the standard under challenge provides for installation of engineering controls to cut down excessive levels of dust that cotton and textile workers are exposed to on the job. Exposure to high levels of cotton dust can lead to brown lung, a disabling respiratory disease that can be fatal.

By filing the "supplemental memorandum" with the court, the Labor Dept. has walked away from the position it took earlier in its arguments before the justices.

THE QUESTION of law, the federation petition notes, is not one that depends on the view of any particular Administration.

"Rather, the question turns solely on the meaning of the Act and intent of the Congress that passed the Act," the petition states.

It points out that remanding the issue back to the Labor Dept. would not advance the resolution of the case and "could well lead to wasted administrative resources and . . . lengthy delays without serving the interests of any party."

Graphics, Historical Texts Salute Labor's Centennial

The AFL-CIO has produced a series of printed materials supporting activities related to the federation's centennial observance this year.

Prepared for use by affiliates, central bodies, local unions and individual union members, as well as by the news media, educators, and the interested public, the materials are now available in quantity, at reasonable prices, at AFL-CIO headquarters. They include:

A Short History of American Labor—A 36-page, full-color, strikingly illustrated booklet telling modern labor's story from the founding of the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions in 1881 (from which the AFL emerged) through years of struggle and strife, setbacks and achievements, up to the point where organized labor today enters its second century as a central part of American democratic society.

A Short History of American Labor—The shorter, 16-page version condensing the materials in the full-color booklet, using many of the historic illustrations. Reprinted from the March 1981 issue of the American Federationist.

Centennial Poster—Four-color art combined with the famous words of Samuel Gompers on the question "What Does Labor Want?" this 17-by-28-inch poster also carries the centennial theme and the identifying logo created especially for labor's 100th birthday.

Bumper Sticker—The centennial bumper sticker—printed in red, white and blue—carries the logo and theme, "A Century of Achievement, A Challenge for the Future." Stickers are 4-by-15 inches and printed on pressure-sensitive stock that removes without tearing or splitting.

Other Federationist Reprints:

Samuel Gompers vs. Horatio Alger—Contrasting views by two famous Americans, who were contemporaries. The world of work and hardship in a hostile environment (as perceived through the eyes of labor's founder) and the pipe-dreams of penniless youths yearning to be millionaires with the aid of a little pluck and luck (as disseminated to millions by the popular writer) are outlined with scholarship and wit by labor historian Stuart B. Kaufman. From a paper delivered at an AFL-CIO centennial seminar at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Labor's Centennial—1881-1981—An editorial by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland on the meaning and inspiration of the 100th anniversary of the founding of modern American labor.

William Green: Guardian of the Middle Years—One of a series of features on labor's leaders running in the American Federationist, this reprint brings back from labor's archives a famous speech delivered by Green at the 1943 AFL convention, in defense of the contributions and sacrifices of American workers to the war effort.

Order blanks and copies of all centennial material may be obtained from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 - 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Quantity rates are available on all items. The last three items listed are free in reasonable quantity.

'Guest Worker' Scheme Called Disaster

A task force of the labor-supported National Committee for Full Employment warned President Reagan that a new "guest worker" program between the United States and Mexico would be a "disaster" for both American and foreign workers.

"It makes no sense to bring additional workers to the United States at a time when there are 8 million unemployed U.S. residents" the NCFE's task force on immigration pointed out.

It also cited the defunct "bracero" program as an example of how foreign workers could be severely exploited by U.S. employers.

THE STATEMENT was released by the task force of labor, civil rights, Hispanic and religious representatives following a comment by President Reagan, made during an interview with CBS News, that he was "intrigued" by a foreign worker program proposed by several border state governors.

Reagan told television commentator Walter Cronkite that he intended to discuss a temporary worker visa program with Mexico's President Jose Lopez Portillo at meetings scheduled for late April.

"Let's not make the same mistake twice," the task force urged the President, pointing out that previous temporary worker programs have been "disasters."

THE GROUP, chaired by former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Wilbur Cohen, pointed to the abuses of the bracero program which brought low-wage agricultural workers from Mexico into the United States from 1942 until its was scrubbed in 1965.

While the bracero program provided "a windfall in the form of cheap, docile labor to a tiny minority of the nation's farmers," the statement said, "it depressed wages and working conditions for competing U.S. workers, postponed the rationalization of the agricultural labor market, exploited the Mexican farmworkers and caused endless, needless grief in U.S.-Mexico relations."

THE TASK FORCE was formed by NCFF in December 1980 to develop a common immigration policy among the traditional coalition of labor, religious and civil rights groups.

Among its labor members are Howard Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Railway Clerks Vice President Jack Otero; Henry L. Lacayo, community action program director of the Auto Workers and national chairman of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement; and Alfredo Montoya, LCLAA executive director. Former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall also serves on the board.

The task force statement chided the President for ignoring the recommendations of the final report released by the congressionally-mandated Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy which opposed any increases in temporary worker programs.

Otero has served as a member of the commission, appointed by former President Jimmy Carter.

CITING THE problems experienced by European countries that have tried guest-worker programs, the task force emphasized that even if the new Administration devised "less exploitative programs than the old bracero operation," the evidence is that guest-worker programs "provide for less than equal rights" for the worker involved.

The Administration's recommendations on immigration policy are being prepared by its own task force headed by Atty. Gen. William French Smith with a report expected in early May.

Mexico has also voiced concern in international forums about exploitation of migrant workers.

The NCFE group also pointed out that it is unclear whether Mexico itself wants a temporary worker system which could lead to the migration of its own badly-needed skilled workers.

The NCFE, a coalition of labor, civil rights and religious organizations formed to promote full employment policies and opportunities, is co-chaired by Coretta Scott King and Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley. Howard

Gen. Bradley Hailed as Humanitarian

General of the Army Omar Bradley, who died Apr. 8 at the age of 88, was "a great leader who earned the gratitude of his country," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

Kirkland noted that Bradley "was the first person chosen to receive labor's highest humanitarian honor, the Murray-Green Award for community service."

After World War II, Bradley was named by President Truman to head the vastly-enlarged Veterans Administration, and labor honored him for his outstanding services to veterans.

Bradley's "quiet but brilliant leadership in World War II" marked him as one of the finest soldiers in American history, Kirkland said.

The general's military skill, Kirkland noted, "was matched by his innate hatred of the inhumanity of war and his personal concern for those who are sent to fight and die. Those who served under him and with him sensed those feelings and knew that he wore his nickname, 'the GI's General,' as proudly as he wore his five stars," Kirkland said.

Flight Crew Union Pushes Safety Issue

The Association of Flight Attendants is generating a strong campaign for support in its battle against a proposed Federal Aviation Administration rule change that would reduce the number of attendants required on commercial flights.

Under the proposal, published just before President Carter left office, only one flight attendant would be required for every 50 ticketed passengers. Current regulations require one attendant for every 50 seats on the aircraft. The rule change was originally suggested by the Air Transport Association, made up of the major commercial carriers.

AFA PRESIDENT Linda A. Puchala said in a statement that the proposal "is both dangerous and foolish," pointing out that flight attendants do more than serve drinks and meals.

"We are trained safety professionals who, in the event of an air crash, must be relied upon to evacuate an aircraft in a matter of seconds," Puchala said. "In order to accomplish this, we need an adequate, well-trained crew of professionals. Most people do not realize that we must deal with at least one emergency situation a month — emergencies that demand trained safety personnel.

"Because of our deep concern for the safety of the traveling public, we call upon the FAA to withdraw this proposed rule."

TO RALLY support among the flying public, the union conducted informational picketing at 20 major airports across the country on Apr. 4.

Two days later, at a hearing of a House Government Operations subcommittee chaired by Rep. John Burton (D-Calif.), a panel of flight attendants and Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon warned that the FAA plan risks passengers' lives.

In their testimony, the flight attendants cautioned that passengers need crew assistance in locating exits and safely evacuating a crashed aircraft. They stressed that the idea that flight attendants are merely ornamental must be dispelled.

Burton, whose subcommittee is examining the FAA proposal, said the agency should not move ahead with the idea until it has proof that passenger safety will not be adversely affected—sentiments shared by Chairman James King of the National Transportation Safety Board.

"THE BOARD is extremely concerned that passenger safety may be further compromised during emergency evacuation should large aircraft be permitted to operate with a reduced number of flight attendants when carrying a partial passenger load, even if the ratio of flight attendants to passengers is retained," King testified at the hearing.

Puchala urged the traveling public to protest the rule change proposal to their congressional representatives and the FAA. Comments on the proposal will be accepted by the FAA until Apr. 20.

DRIVE TO ORGANIZE California state university educators has the full support of the AFL-CIO, President Lane Kirkland declares at a press conference in San Francisco. The campaign has been launched by the 4,100-member United Professors of California, affiliated with the Teachers, which is seeking representation of more than 20,000 professors, lecturers, administrative and technical workers in the 19-campus state university and college system. With Kirkland and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue are California AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning; UPC President Warren Kessler; Anne Peters, UPC vice president; and Jose Cuervo, UPC affirmative action chairman.

prices to their highest level since last July, however, was jump in energy prices. BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the Congressional Joint Economic Committee that the energy price climb "reflected the impact of price deregulation of domestic crude oil as well as increases in the prices of petroleum."

The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries announced in December that it was raising its crude oil prices, and the latest round of passthrough prices continued into March.

ENERGY PRICES were up 6.1 percent over the month, with gasoline rising 7.5 percent, home heating oil 9 percent, and natural gas 1.3 percent higher than the previous month. The huge increases marked the fifth consecutive large monthly advance in finished energy prices.

The total March rise of 1.3 percent in the wholesale price index translates to 15.6-percent annual increases before compounding.

On a year-to-year basis, the producer price index was 10.5 percent above the March 1980 level. Last month's increases compared with rises of eight-tenths of 1 percent in February and nine-tenths of 1 percent in January.

BESIDES measuring the price of finished goods, BLS also measures the price of intermediate goods, such as sheet metal and fabrics used in the factory production of finished goods, and also the price of crude materials, such as iron scrap and raw cotton. Prices for intermediate goods rose 1.1 percent in March, while prices of crude goods fell by 1.3 percent.

Within the finished goods index, capital equipment prices went upon seven -tenths of 1 percent, slower than in recent months. Consumer durable goods such as cars increased by only one-tenth of 1 percent. Non-durables—luggage and small leather goods, for example—were up by 2.4 percent.

Kirkland Cites Budget Threat To College Education Hopes

San Francisco—The chances for children from middle- and low-income families to go to college will be blighted if the Administration's proposed budget cuts for higher education programs are adopted, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned.

Kirkland criticized the proposed cuts during a press conference here to declare the AFL-CIO's "full support" for the campaign of the United Professors of California to win the right to bargain for professionals in the state's 19-campus university and college system.

THE UPC, a coalition of local unions of the American Federation of Teachers on each campus, represents some 4,100 professors, lecturers and administrative and technical workers. A mail-ballot election expected sometime in 1981 under the supervision of the state's Public Employee Relations Board will determine representation for all 20,000 professional employees of the state's 300,000-student higher education system. The UPC is opposed by the Congress of Faculty Organizations, an affiliate of the National Education Association.

Kirkland stressed that the AFT unit, as part of the mainstream of the labor movement, would have the strength of organized labor behind it in the "hard times" that will result from the budget cuts as well as in their own efforts to restore the "purchasing power and status" of professors.

As many as 750,000 students could be pushed out of college and into a "forbidding" labor market, Kirkland warned, if the proposed reductions in direct and indirect aid to higher education go through.

KIRKLAND POINTED out that the plan to make students pay interest on government-guaranteed loans while they are still in school and to let rates on these loans float to market levels would "shut down" the system that now helps some two million students.

The President's call for a so-called 'self-help' contribution of $750 from the three million students receiving Basic Educational Opportunity Grants will hurt low-income households, Kirkland said. He noted, too, that many of the 800,000 students receiving social security benefits because their parents are dead, retired or disabled will have to quit school if that aid is cut off.

"The AFL-CIO is convinced," Kirkland stressed, that "the benefits of public higher education are a precious natural resource, and that education is an investment, not a drain, on our economy."

Rail Unions Prod Conrail On Faults of Management

Railway labor leaders called on officials of the Consolidated Rail Corp. to "look inward" to see what management can do to improve the railroad's efficiency before asking employees to eliminate work rules and freeze or cut their wages.

"While we repeatedly hear how much the employees must be prepared to sacrifice," President Fred J. Kroll of the Railway Labor Executives' Association told a House Energy & Commerce subcommittee, "not one word has been forthcoming from Conrail, the Dept. of Transportation, or the Interstate Commerce Commission . . . as to what Conrail management might do to improve its productivity in terms of service, supervision, employment of consultants, or anything else."

KROLL NOTED productivity expert Edward Deming's observation that management is usually 80 percent responsible for a bad productivity record, and added:

"Employees, of course, are the easy, available target, but management controls when, how, and under what circumstances the work gets done."

The Administration, which proposes to sell the government-sponsored railroads, needs to weigh the full cost of permitting Conrail's demise, Kroll said.

"Removal of Conrail would not only cause unemployment for tens of thousands of Conrail employees and additional tens of thousands of wage earners who depend upon the existence of Conrail for their livelihoods, but it would steepen and hasten the overall economic decline of the entire northeastern United States with all the adverse tax and welfare consequences such a decline would effect," he said.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S plan calls for splitting up the railroad and selling its lines to other carriers. To make the sell-off more attractive to prospective buyers, it is seeking legislation to end a program—Title V of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973—under which Conrail must compensate workers who lose their jobs because of the sale.

President Fred A. Hardin of the United Transportation Union told the House panel, chaired by Rep. James J. Florio (D-N.J.), that UTU "does not see how cutting employees' benefits will solve Conrail's underlying problem of inefficient operations." He, too, asked what Conrail management was prepared to sacrifice while it asked workers to sacrifice their jobs.

THE UTU AND other rail unions have submitted to Congress a plan to make recommendations for quality control and efficiency improvements in Conrail's structure and services. Kroll and Hardin told the Florio subcommittee that railroad workers have better protection guarantees on most other railroads, and that those lines manage to run with a profit.

The unions are organizing a Washington rally Apr. 29 at which thousands of railroad workers will march to the Capitol to make their views known to legislators.

R-T-W Bills Slapped Down In Two New England States

Two New England states have handed rock-ribbed rebuffs to so-called right-to-work bills introduced in their state legislatures. The anti-union proposal went down to a nearly two-to-one defeat in Vermont, and a series of open-shop bills was rejected in rapid succession by Maine's legislators.

A Mar. 31 vote in the Vermont house scuttled a "right-to-work" measure by a vote of 92 to 51 with 7 absentees, state AFL-CIO President Robert E. Clark reported. The rejection should bury the issue until at least 1983, Clark said. He credited the victory to effective lobbying by local union officers and to the efforts of State COPE Director Tom Belville.

Maine AFL-CIO President Charles O'Leary had similar praise for his state's labor movement, which had urged the legislature to reject four compulsory open-shop bills in a flurry of activity in early April.

A "right-to work" law for private industry was routed 92 to 53 in the house, which also stopped a similar bill aimed at public employees by an 82 to 61 vote. A separate bill to eliminate exclusive representation rights for public employee unions was defeated 89 to 55. The state's senate rejected all three measures by voice vote.

An attempt to force a compulsory open shop on the University of Maine faculty was narrowly defeated 17 to 16 in the senate and 76 to 68 in the house.

A New Danger Signal

THE 6-0 VOTE by a House Ways & Means subcommittee to support legislation that would raise the basic social security retirement age from 65 to 68 raises a danger signal that should not be ignored.

If enacted, it would be the equivalent of a pay cut for older workers. If they wanted to collect the full social security benefits to which they are now entitled at age 65, they would have to work three additional years.

Under current law, a retired worker can draw reduced social security benefits at age 62. Under the proposed change, a person choosing to retire at age 65 would have to accept reduced benefits.

EVEN IF WORKERS now within a few years of retirement are exempt from the change, the proposal is wrong on a number of counts and should be firmly rejected.

It is wrong because it would be a breach of contract with the bulk of people already in the workforce—the men and women who have had the social security tax deducted from their paychecks each week, as required by law, and who should be entitled to the protections promised by law.

It is wrong because it seeks to keep people in the workforce longer through financial pressure and not out of free choice.

Nothing in the social security law compels a worker to retire at a set age, but inadequacy of benefits should not force postponement of retirement. Not everyone approaching retirement is in a sedentary job with minimal physical demands.

And it is wrong because it represents a panicky response to a scenario in which the next century will find a smaller number of people in the prime working ages obligated to support a larger number of retired senior citizens.

IN FACT, the problems the social security system faces come more from unemployment and inflation than from changes in the birth rate.

These funding problems are temporary and solvable with the modest infusion of general revenue funds that the AFL-CIO has long urged.

They do not justify a retirement age increase that the AFL-CIO Executive Council termed "tantamount to an across-the-board benefit reduction for millions of workers, particularly those who are forced into early retirement for reasons of poor health or unemployment."

The council called on the government to "keep its word" and warned that changing the terms of social security benefits "would constitute a breach of faith that would undermine public confidence in social security."

SURVEYS HAVE found that about two-thirds of workers retire either because of poor health or because their jobs have been eliminated.

These problems, certainly, will not go away if Congress chooses to punish those who retire before the edge of 68. Americans may live longer than their parents because of modern medicines and better hospital facilities. But longer life does not necessarily mean improved health.

The House Ways & Means subcommittee is off on the wrong tack.

'Fill 'er Up?'

Trickle-Down Myth Runs Dry

Oil Firms Spurn Output Boost To Expand Profit Margins

By Gus Tyler

THE STORY on how the oil companies have been buying up the mineral industry came at a bad time for those people who have been talking about how the enrichment of the rich will provide the necessary "capital" to expand output in America, especially output in such vital fields as oil.

The oil story tells us that the folk who have the capital, oodles of capital, will not necessarily invest in expanding production at all; they will simply use the surplus wealth to buy up other existing companies.

OIL COMPANIES do have much capital. They account for one-third of all the profits of corporate America.

If that is not enough evidence, then just take a look at all the expensive items they have been buying recently: copper companies, coal companies, metal and ore companies, rare earth companies, letter houses, newspapers, hotels, etc.—just to name a few. All that buying takes a big bankroll.

Indeed, it was a sudden spate of just such buying that spurred the stories on the takeovers of the biggies by the biggers. In one week, Standard Oil of California paid out $4 billion for Amax, Standard of Ohio paid out $1.77 billion for Kennecott, and Joseph E. Seagram & Sons made a bid for St. Joe Minerals by using $2 billion realized from the sale of Seagram's oil assets.

The reaction to these takeovers stirred moral indignation in some quarters. An "energy expert in Congress" is quoted as saying, "These things don't add a nickel's worth of oil to our reserves."

He might also have added that these acquisitions do not create a single added job in the country, except perhaps for those lawyers who maneuver the mergers.

BUT MORAL outrage directed against the oil companies is not only a useless exercise, it actually pushes us into a wrong conclusion. We are too apt to decide that oil companies are run by evil people and that such sinful souls ought to be punished either here or in the hereafter.

The truth of the matter is that oil companies are doing what everybody else does and what every corporation must do if it wishes to stay competitive. For all of them, there is only one bottom line: return on investment.

That's their bottom line not because they are more materialistic than the rest of us but because that's the way the system runs. "They say," reports the New York Times, "that buying copper and other mineral companies affords their shareholders the best return on their investment. And that, they add, is why they are in business."

THEY ARE NOT in business to produce oil, copper, autos, liquor, medicine, or baby diapers to "serve" society; all that jazz is just incidental to the main theme: making money. And if they forget that cold cash calculation, investors will forget them.

If that firm fact is remembered then all the talk about how the enrichment of the rich will expand our economy suddenly sounds silly. The name of the game is return on investment and as we now know there is often more to be gained by playing speculative sports than by producing more products—especially when the "speculation" can create monopolies to charge more for less.

Higher Education A Natural Resource

The Administration's proposed reductions in direct and indirect federal aid to higher education could push as many as 750,000 students out of college and into a forbidding labor market.

The AFL-CIO is convinced that the benefits of public higher education are a precious natural resource and that education is an investment, not a drain on our economy.

Several cutbacks in government support for education will represent a failure to renew our human capital that threatens our prosperity at least as much as the failure to revitalize the economy through the modernization of physical plant and equipment.

World Community Overlooks Suffering of Somali Refugees

By Bayard Rustin

SOMALIA, located in the strategically vital Horn of Africa, is one of the world's poorest countries. Since October 1979 an average of 1,000 refugees per day have been crossing that country's borders, fleeing the disputed Ogaden region of Ethiopia. The overwhelming majority of these refugees are women and young children.

In scale, the tragedy of Somalia rivals that of Indochina and its boat people. And yet the world community largely has been indifferent to the suffering of the unfortunate Somali victims of Ethiopian brutality. Horeover, little attention has been paid to this problem by the black community in the United States.

Recently, I returned from Somalia, where, as part of an International Rescue Committee study group, I observed first-hand the dimensions of the refugee problem.

IN ONE ARID refugee camp into which approximately 65,000 Somali women and children have been crammed I observed a thin, sickly young mother taking her child to a nearly dried up river to feed her baby what she knew was poisonous water. Her desperate act was intended to provide temporary comfort for a child which she knew would ultimately die whether of dehydration or the muddied water's poisons.

In another instance, our small group was able to save the life of one child by transporting it by jeep to a make-shift hospital where an understaffed medical team was able to help salvage an innocent life even as others were foredoomed to death.

The unrelenting flood of refugees is taxing the resources of a drought-stricken, underdeveloped country with one of the world's lowest standards of living. Yet Somalia's indigent population has had to absorb close to 1.5 million refugees into a country whose native population numbers 3.5 million. When proportionally adjusted to America's population, this is as if our country had to absorb 70 million helpless and starving poor.

THE SOMALI REFUGEES now live in make-shift encampments on barren territories carved out of the desert. Most of them live in ramshackle huts or worse. Many of the children are deformed by the bloated stomachs which indicate starvation.

Death is all pervasive in Somalia. The monstrous brutality of the pro-Soviet Ethiopian regime, coupled with a drought which is affecting all of East Africa, has resulted in widespread death and misery.

While famine and drought are crucial contributing factors to the steady stream of refugees, it does not help explain the reason why these refugees are streaming only in one direction: toward Somalia and away from Marxist-Leninist Ethiopia.

The roots of the Somalian tragedy derive in part from the historical decision to retain Africa's colonial borders. As a consequence, many African ethnic groups have been divided between several countries and are not allowed to live together in states which correspond territorially to historical and cultural traditions.

THIS PAN-AFRICAN problem will result in continued upheaval in the decades ahead. And yet those who argue that ethnic peoples such as the Somalis should remain a divided nation, ignore the fact that national identity remains a principal source of upheaval and discontent in Africa and throughout the world.

Clearly, what is needed is a far-reaching negotiated solution to the struggle for control of the Ogaden. Yet such a solution appears to be very far off. What is needed immediately, however, is massive international humanitarian aid in the neighborhood of $500 million. Our International Rescue Committee mission has recommended that the United States commit itself to $150 million of such aid.

Currently, the United States contributes one-third that amount through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Unless additional support is forthcoming from the United States and the world community, hundreds of thousands of innocent Somalis will die. Blacks, and indeed all Americans, cannot remain indifferent to the plight of the starving and drought-stricken Somalis.

THE WORLD COMMUNITY responded with amazing generosity to the plight of Indochinese refugees. The world must respond with similar compassion to the horrors which plague Somalia.

If we do not have the compassion to help the dying mothers and children from the Ogaden, then most certainly we will not have the compassion to solve the severe problems which affect minority and other poor Americans at home.

SEIU in Joint Effort

New Coalition Focuses Drive On Non-Union Women Workers

A COALITION formed by the Service Employees and Working Women provides a new and unique formula for winning collective bargaining rights for the nation's 20 million largely non-union secretarial and clerical workers, SEIU President John J. Sweeney said.

Working Women is an association of office workers formed in 1977 which has a membership of 10,000 in 40 states. It is not a union and has no collective bargaining agreements.

Sweeney said on Labor News Conference that the combination of special techniques developed by both organizations shapes an effective approach through the machinery of a union contract.

Noting that the clerical and secretarial workforce is about 90 percent female, he said the coalition will "spotlight the need for day-care centers and greater upgrading opportunities and on-the-job dignity," as well as the traditional workplace issues of wages, hours and working conditions.

Prime targets of the new organizing effort will be in the insurance, banking and financial industries, he said, where there are now few union contracts. There will also be a concentration on the clerical and secretarial areas of public employment, health institutions and universities, where the SEIU already represents a large number of administrative staff employees.

SWEENEY REPORTED "a tremendous expression of interest" since announcement of the coalition and the formation of SEIU District 925, which will be the nucleus of the union's stepped-up effort among women workers.

"Inquiries have come from all over the country, not only regarding organizing opportunities, but also from volunteers who are interested in organizing unions in their areas," he said.

Reporters questioning Sweeney on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Martha Hamilton of the Washington Post and Philip Shabecoff of the New York Times. Labor News Conference is broadcast weekly on Mutual radio.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN ASSERTING the right to organize and bargain collectively, the American labor movement throughout its history has encountered stiff and sometimes brutal opposition from employers.

Following the epic labor victories of the 1930s and the codification of workers' rights in the National Labor Relations Act, employer use of physical intimidation and violence subsided.

Union-busting, however, has been undergoing a major resurgence in recent years. But instead of goon squads, nightsticks and jailings, there is the well-manicured "labor relations consultant," armed with a briefcase rather than brass knuckles.

A recent report by a congressional labor-management relations subcommittee observed that the labor relations law's "growing inability to protect in any meaningful way the right of employees to organize corresponds closely with the growth and spread of the consultant industry."

One consulting firm, Modern Management Methods, Inc., told the subcommittee that, during the years 1977-79, it assisted employers in 696 union organizing drives and defeated the union in 647 instances, or 93 percent of the time.

IT WAS ESTIMATED that management spends at least $500 million a year on these outside specialists—putting union-busting among the nation's biggest growth industries.

These are some of the ways the subcommittee found that consultants operate. They:

- Advise employers to screen job applicants to weed out certain individuals, and even ethnic and age groups, who might favor a union. The polygraph, or lie detector, is sometimes used.
- Force supervisors to produce a personal profile on each worker and his or her attitude toward the union. Supervisors are carefully instructed on ways to pressure workers to vote against the union.
- Recommend that union supporters be isolated from other workers, such as by transfer to remote work areas, to minimize their ability to present the union's position.
- Arrange captive audience meetings of employees where threats may be made to close the plant, or perhaps to thwart collective bargaining, if the union is voted in.
- Orchestrate a constant drumbeat of anti-union propaganda, which might include a "Vote No" message on vending machines, coffee cups, napkins and matchbooks.

The subcommittee was told that in one hospital organizing campaign, supervisors stopped nurses on their way to emergency calls. "They invade patients' privacy by interrupting their baths to hand literature to the nurses. They tell you to read it right there," a nurse testified.

THE CONSULTANTS' operations are usually clandestine and thus all the more difficult to combat. Despite the existence of the labor-management reporting disclosure section of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act, the subcommittee found that the law's "employer and consulting reporting provisions have for the past 14 years been a virtual 'dead letter,' ignored by employers and consultants and unenforced by the Dept. of Labor" as well as by the NLRB and Justice Dept.

The subcommittee recommended that these three agencies coordinate enforcement of the laws relating to consultants and also that Congress strengthen labor statutes to better protect workers seeking to organize.

A hopeful action occurred recently when the NLRB brought unfair labor practice complaints against three consulting firms involved in organizing drives.

It's a beginning. But working people—organized and unorganized—need to turn up the heat against today's union-busting experts and keep the fires lit under the government agencies responsible for protecting the right to organize and bargain collectively.

NEW FORMULA for winning bargaining rights for the nation's 20 million secretarial and clerical workers is seen in the newly formed coalition of the Service Employees and Working Women, a national office workers association, SEIU President John J. Sweeney, center, said on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO vice president was questioned by Martha Hamilton of the Washington Post and Philip Shabecoff of the New York Times.

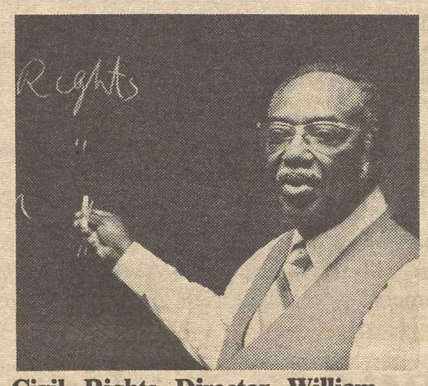
Regional Sessions Explore Vital Issues

COPE Director Al Barkan and delegates hold an impromptu conference.

Alan Kistler talked organizing six times a day in each city.

Intensive discussions that touched all of American labor's concerns marked the six AFL-CIO regional conferences held between Mar. 5 and Apr. 4. Labor representatives, primarily from state and local central bodies, gathered for the conferences in Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Denver and Atlanta.

Each conference had an attendance above 300 and some swelled to more than 400. Each had the same format—an opening night dinner and address by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a full day of workshops in which each state delegation was visited by Kirkland, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and the federation's directors of organizing, COPE and legislation.



The closing half-day session offered two workshops by other department directors, with delegates pre-registering for any two, followed by a "summing up" session by Kirkland and Donahue.

Thus, the only time all delegates were together in plenary session was for the opening and closing, with the emphasis on discussion and two-way communication in the 14 intervening workshops. Various state delegations ranged from as few as six to more than 100, with the large delegations split into two groups to facilitate discussion.

The seventh and final conference will be held June 4-5-6 in New Orleans for the states of Louisiana, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas, Kansas, Missouri and Mississippi.

Budget, Tax Plans Scored As 'Simplistic'

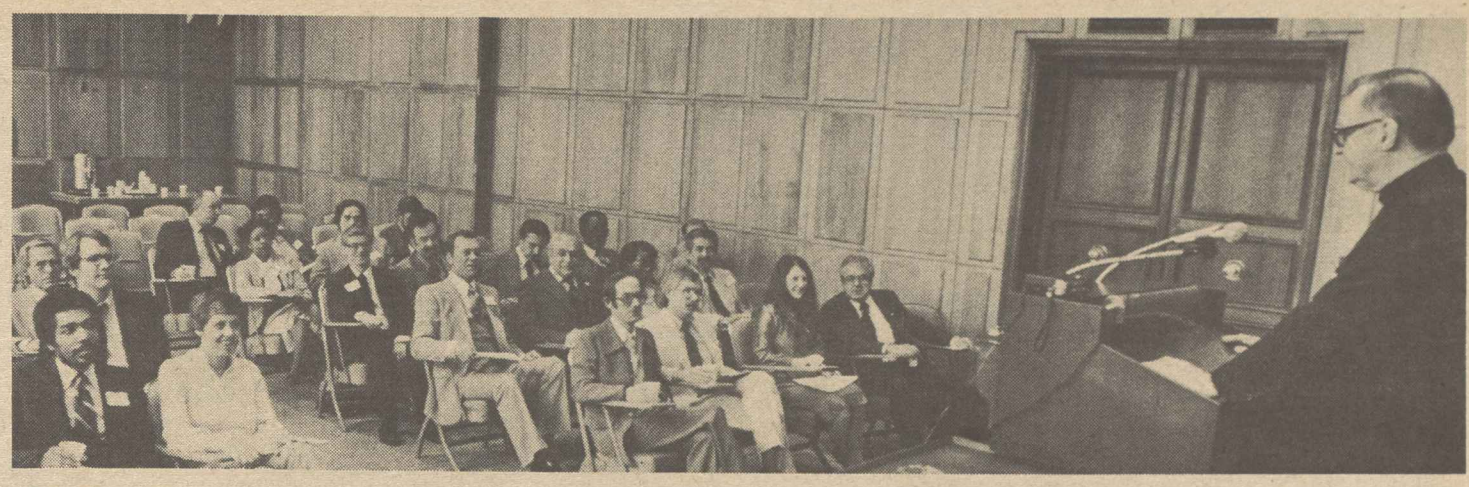
costly social security tax credit as an alternative to the Administration plan to give the biggest benefits to those with the least need.

When fully effective, the Administration plan would increase by 1.2 percent the after-tax income of a family dependent on $5-an-hour earnings, Taylor noted. But the value of the tax cut would be 9.2 percent at an income level of $50 an hour, she pointed out.



No union would ever negotiate and seek ratification of such an inequitable division, she protested.

Taylor also renewed the AFL-CIO's call for selective credit controls and other targeted methods of bringing down inflation. But she stressed repeatedly that budget deficits in recent years have been a symptom and not a cause of the nation's economic problems.

"WE DO NOT believe the nation has been too generous in helping the poor, the disadvantaged or the unemployed," she testified. Yet "the Reagan budget calls for huge reductions in a wide array of programs that are essential to the health and welfare of the nation's needs and provide a critical underpinning for the entire economy," she observed.

Wiping out job and job training programs will push more people on welfare, she said, and "cuts in the energy program are in direct conflict with the need to break OPEC's stranglehold."

Especially at a time of budget slashing and austerity, Taylor said, the AFL-CIO sees "no justification" for huge tax windfalls to corporations in the hope "that this largess will trickle down to workers and consumers."

CONTINUING EFFORTS to establish a formal national coalition were explored by the Religion & Labor Conference at the AFL-CIO headquarters. The conference, comprising representatives from the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish faiths, has been meeting on an ad hoc basis for the past three years. Addressing the session is Msgr. George G. Higgins of Catholic University, who is co-chairman of the conference along with Alan Kistler, the federation's organizing and field services director. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue also addressed the session.

Union-Industry Effort Spurs Gains in Men's Wear Field

Philadelphia—The nation's men's wear industry is becoming more efficient and more competitive thanks to a three-year-old labor-management project that develops advanced technology for the industry and helps recruit and train new workers.

The accomplishments of the program, known as Joint Job Training & Research Inc. (JTR), were outlined at a seminar held here by the project's sponsors, the Clothing & Textile Workers and the Clothing Manufacturers Association.

JTR WAS established in 1978 by the union and the industry group as a nonprofit organization to coordinate research and development programs that would introduce advanced manufacturing techniques to men's and boys' clothing plants. Also, the project works to recruit and train new workers in the industry. It is funded by government grants.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley is chairman of JTR's executive board, which includes the union's Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, Vice President Harry Lautman and three industry representatives.

Sheinkman, in a speech opening the progress seminar, called the joint effort "the product of close cooperation between the union, the industry and the government" and called its successes "concrete evidence" that such joint efforts can work on "solid and real issues." The program deserves continued government assistance, he emphasized.

JTR is a successful result of the 1977 negotiations between the union and the industry, CMA President Lawrence Ward told the meeting. Ward, who is head of Haspel Bros., pointed to the program as an example of how cooperation between labor and management can develop technology to aid American industry.

Tax-Free Bonds Called Costly Treasury Drain

noted that state authorization laws only vaguely define the terms, and the result is that "almost any type of business" can qualify.

LARGE RETAIL chain stores and units of big corporations have been among the beneficiaries. Many of them, the CBO report noted, would have been built in the same locations even if the tax-free bonds had not been available.

Schechter stressed that the revenue the government loses has the same budget impact as money spent to fund government programs.

He termed it "unconscionable that such tax expenditures be allowed to continue while cuts are made in programs such as food stamps, unemployment compensation, Medicare, school lunches and low-income housing."

Surely, he suggested, the corporate borrowers are not among the "truly needy" who are supposed to be spared from the hardships of budget cuts.

AN ATTACHMENT to the AFL-CIO testimony listed large corporations that have benefited from financing by the so-called "small issue" industrial revenue bonds. These corporations, Schechter said, have earnings running to hundreds of millions of dollars annually, and most have had significant year-to-year increases in earnings and dividends paid.

The effect of the revenue bonds, he suggested, has been to reallocate income "from the U.S. Treasury to large corporations and their stockholders."

Senate Rollcalls on Key Budget Cutbacks

The budget reconciliation bill that the Senate passed on Apr. 2 would compel drastic cutbacks in many labor-supported programs, including trade adjustment assistance and unemployment compensation.

Vote No. 1 shows the 69-29 defeat of a labor-endorsed amendment by Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) to restore $400 million of cuts to be made in trade adjustment assistance for workers whose jobs are wiped out by imports.

Vote No. 2 is the 60-38 defeat of a labor-supported amendment by Sen. Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.) that sought to drop a requirement that states make their unemployment compensation eligibility standards tougher. The projected budget "savings" would come through requiring skilled workers unemployed more than 13 weeks to take any job that pays as much as the unemployment benefit as long as it is not less than the minimum wage.

Vote No. 3 is the 88-10 vote to pass the labor-opposed legislation.

On all three votes, R shows "right" votes for labor's position, W indicates "wrong" votes and absentees are marked A.

Transit Workers Voting on New Philadelphia Pact

Philadelphia—Some 5,000 striking bus, trolley, and subway workers returned to their jobs after negotiators for Transport Workers Local 234 won agreement on a new contract with the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority.

A membership vote on whether to accept the tentative two-year settlement was set for Apr. 10. The accord was reached Apr. 2 on the 19th day of the walkout.

THE MAIN stumbling block had been management's demand for authority to hire part-time workers, an action prohibited under the old contract. Fred Allen, business agent for Local 234, said the ban on part-time hiring, as well as a no-layoff clause, will remain in force under the new agreement.

Highlights of the agreement include a 12.5 percent wage increase in the first year plus cost-of-living adjustments on Dec. 15 of this year and next. The COL clause calls for a 1-cent hourly increase for each rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in the federal consumer price index, up to a ceiling of 12 cents per year. The pact also improves pension and insurance benefits.

OSHA Hit For Retreat On Chemicals

arbitrary decision," Denison said. The Labor Dept., he suggested, was responding to signals from the chemical industry "and orders by the Office of Management & Budget."

THE AFL-CIO witnesses stressed that the effect of the Administration action was to stifle public discussion and consideration of all aspects of the issue. After the hearings, the new OSHA assistant secretary would have been free to modify or rewrite the regulation.

Denison told the House panel that federal inaction "will not stop the working people of this country from seeking other means of gaining right-to-know protections."

Five states—Maine, Michigan, Connecticut, California and New York—have already enacted legislation to achieve this, he said. While the state laws vary in the scope of chemicals covered and the information required, Denison said, "they are based upon the same principle, the worker's right-to-know."

The AFL-CIO favors federal action over state requirements to assure uniform coverage and adequate enforcement of worker health and safety, Denison said.

"BUT GIVEN the realities of the present federal regulatory environment," he testified, "we have urged our members to use every means available—state legislation, regulations and contract language—to gain information on workplace chemicals."

Until all workers have the information they need about the hazards of chemical substances, he warned, there will continue to be "unnecessary illness and death."

The hearings will resume after the Easter recess of Congress and other union representatives will be among those testifying.

INDUSTRY PRESSURE led to withdrawal of OSHA's proposal to require disclosure of chemical hazards in workplaces, the AFL-CIO charged at House hearings. At the witness table, from left, Safety Director George H. R. Taylor, Legislative Director Ray Denison and Margaret Seminario, industrial hygienist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health.

New FTC Rule Gives Unions Voice in Antitrust Hearings

Labor unions now have an automatic right to intervene in Federal Trade Commission antitrust cases where divestiture may be ordered with a resulting effect on employees' jobs, the FTC announced.

The commission voted 3 to 2 to change its rule of practice (Rule 3.14), which had been published for comment on Mar. 14, 1980. While the agency always had a practice of entertaining requests for permission to intervene from interested parties, including labor organizations, the rule change makes automatic the right of unions to intervene.

THE DECISION emanates from a lengthy struggle of the Grain Millers and other unions, assisted by the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept., to protect the rights of their members in the FTC's pending divestiture case against the ready-to-eat cereal industry.

Since 1972, the agency has sought to break up the industry, which it argues is noncompetitive because of the concentration of four big firms—Kellogg Co., General Mills, Inc., Quaker Oats Co., and General Foods Corp.

When the Grain Millers attempted to intervene in August 1978 as a party in the FTC proceedings, it was turned down on the ground that its concern in the case was "wholly irrelevant" to the issues involved. The union sought to be heard because the proposed divestiture would have ousted 2,650 of its members from their jobs and destroyed its contracts.

"Why then should we not have a voice in the case to protect the interests and contractual rights of these employees," the union said in August 1979, as it pressed for the right to be heard.

THE FTC HAD proposed spinning off five new cereal companies from the four major firms where the Grain Millers was the recognized bargaining agent under the National Labor Relations Act. If the FTC plan went into effect, the union contended, the new companies would be under no obligation to continue the master contracts already in place, "and it is quite conceivable that some or all of these new companies might decide to try to get by without a union."

Commenting in favor of the change permitting automatic union intervention, AFL-CIO affiliates argued that divestiture often has a serious impact on unions and their members as in the Grain Millers case. The FTC's staff said the agency would review the decision on intervention in a year.

Kirkland Asks Swift Probe Of Grain Elevator Explosions

The AFL-CIO has called for an immediate investigation of the grain elevator explosions in Corpus Christi, Tex., and Bellwood, Neb., that left at least seven dead and 36 injured.

Federation President Lane Kirkland urged the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and the Agriculture Dept. to examine both incidents "swiftly and thoroughly" and to "accelerate the pace" of developing safety and health standards and enforcement procedures "to prevent the occurence of these needless tragedies in the future."

A SERIES of flaming explosions ripped through the 14-story waterfront elevator in Corpus Christi on Apr. 7, damaging 54 of 153 silos in the city-owned facility.

The explosions, which occured just before a shift change with some 50 workers in the area, killed at least four workers, injured at least 33, including seven federal grain inspectors in the area on routine business. Two more workers are missing and listed as dead.

Only a few hours later, at least one other worker was killed and two injured in the Nebraska incident which demolished a farmers' cooperative elevator.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES worked through the night to drain thousands of gallons of propane gas from two nearby storage tanks threatened by the tilting remains of the elevator.

Kirkland called the two accidents "a reminder of the needless destruction of life and property that has characterized this industry for years." The explosions were the fifth and sixth since January.

At least 99 workers have died and 187 have been injured in grain elevator explosions since 1976, Kirkland said, pointing out that many more have been killed or seriously hurt by thousands of elevator fires during the same period.

"The knowledge to prevent such tragedies has existed for years," Kirkland said, "and the time to use it is now." Currently, no OSHA standard exists for controlling the amount of grain dust in and around elevators and mills.

ROBERT F. HARBRANT, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept., pointed to grain dust as "the fuel that powers these explosions." Grain dust is nine times more explosive than coal dust, he said, stressing that although the United States has had the knowledge and many techniques for preventing dust explosions for at least 60 years, the methods have not been adequately implemented.

In 1977 alone, Harbrant said, two major dust explosions destroyed more than 2.5 percent of the nation's grain export capacity for that period.

Jobless Rate Holds at 7.3% During March

The nation's unemployment rate stuck for the second consecutive month at a seasonally adjusted 7.3 percent in March as new workers coninued to enter the labor force at the same pace that new jobs opened up.

Both total employment and the labor force increased by about half a million last month, advancing to 98.4 million and 106.2 million, respectively, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Adult men accounted for over 70 percent of the over-the-month increase in each of the two categories.

THE TOTAL NUMBER of unemployed workers in the country last month was 7,764,000, marginally above the 7,754,000 of the previous month. The jobless level has been essentially unchanged since last summer.

The unemployment rate for adult men last month dropped slightly to 5.9 percent from 6 percent in February. The rate for women rose to 6.6 percent from 6.5 percent. For whites, the rate declined to 6.5 percent from 6.6 percent the month before. The rate for blacks rose to 13.7 percent from 13.1 percent, and the rate for Hispanics fell to 10.7 percent from 12 percent. Teenage unemployment fell to 19.1 percent from 19.3 percent.

THE NUMBER of "discouraged" workers—those who want jobs but do not look for work because they think none is available—showed an increase of 60,000 in the first three months of 1981, BLS said. The 1.1 million level was 165,000 higher than a year earlier.

At an even 40 hours, the average factory work week was at about the same level as the end of 1980. Manufacturing overtime, at 2.9 hours, was unchanged over the month.

A survey of industry payroll employment showed that manufacturing employment remained at about 20.4 million in March. Factory jobs were still three-quarters of a million below the June 1979 pre-recession high.

EMPLOYMENT in construction and mining was unchanged over the month at 4.5 and 1.1 million, respectively. The number of construction jobs was about 230,000 below the January 1980 peak. By contrast, employment in mining, which had increased fairly steadily during 1980, was about 85,000 above the year-earlier level.

In the service sector of the economy, only state and local government—down by 55,000—showed any substantial movement during March. This was largely offset by small gains in trade and services.

House Democratic Proposal Would Soften Budget Slash

The House appeared more likely to make substantive changes in the Administration's tax proposals—an area where Republicans have been much more divided.

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski has outlined what is generally considered a politically attractive policy—angled more to middle-income taxpayers than to the very rich who would profit most by the Administration bill. But it would give wealthy investors a benefit not proposed by the Administration—a ceiling of 50 percent tax on unearned income.

WHILE THE budget battle will be largely along party lines, with the possibility of liberal amendments to try to improve the Budget Committee proposal, the lines may be more blurred on a tax bill. Rostenkowski has said his hope is to fashion a bipartisan measure.

The statement adopted by the House Democratic Caucus—by voice vote on Apr. 8—mingled liberal and conservative rhetoric in its search for a consensus.

It sought to spell out basic differences between the two major parties, rejecting President Reagan's contention that government is "the problem." The Democratic view is that government is "a necessary instrument for achieving vital public goals."

The caucus termed it "foolhardy to try to combat inflation with a massive across-the-board tax cut whose immediate effect would be to make it worse."

BUT IT EMBRACED "a national consensus" for "reducing the size of government" and said regulations must be made more "cost-effective."

It said recipients of government assistance should be encouraged to work but promised to resist cuts "that would throw people out of work and onto welfare."

The caucus statement endorsed an "incomes policy" based on "cooperation of government, labor and business."

The caucus promised "a lean federal budget, which puts us on the path to balancing the budget and provides for the human needs of our people."

New Tax Bill Offers Aid to Workers, Business

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, April 18, 1981 No. 16

A tax bill that meets the AFL-CIO's test of fairness to workers while targeting aid to advance reindustrialization goals has been introduced by Rep. Frank J. Guarini (D-N.J.).

Guarini is a member of the House Ways & Means Committee, which has jurisdiction over tax legislation and later this month will start voting on the ingredients of a committee bill.

THE MEASURE introduced by Guarini (H.R. 3218) includes the social security payroll tax credit the AFL-CIO had proposed as a more equitable and less costly alternative to the Reagan Administration's percentage cut in federal income taxes.

Under the Guarini bill, workers would have 20 percent of their social security tax refunded to them through tax credit, and employers would receive back 5 percent of their share of the payroll tax.

The tax credit would be worth more to the majority of wage earners than the Reagan proposal, but the revenue drain would be less because the tax credit would top off at $395 for an individual worker while the Administration income tax would give substantially bigger payments to the very affluent.

All employers would profit from their share of the social security tax credit, but those employing the largest number of workers would benefit most.

The targeted business tax cut urged by the AFL-CIO and spelled out in H.R. 3218 contrasts dramatically with the Administration proposal, which would give accelerated depreciation allowances and the full 10 percent investment tax credits to all business enterprises, regardless of need or economic benefit to the nation.

The revenue loss to the government of the Reagan proposal, just from the faster depreciation, would rise from $9.7 billion in the next fiscal year to $60 billion when fully effective.

AS PROPOSED by Guarini and urged by the AFL-CIO, aid to business apart from the 5 percent social security credit

Budget Battle Hits Grass Roots

BUDGET COALITION representatives are welcomed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue to a meeting on plans to coordinate back-home opposition to federal budget cuts affecting all of the nation's congressional districts.

Labor, Allies Mount Drive In Districts

By David L. Perlman

The trade union movement and its allies in the Budget Coalition activated affiliates in all congressional districts to demonstrate back-home support for needed federal programs threatened by drastic budget slashes.

The grass-roots lobbying was timed for the Easter recess, when nearly all members of Congress are in their home districts and available for meetings with constituents.

ITS IMMEDIATE goal is vote commitments for liberal alternatives to the sorely inadequate budget ceilings proposed by the House Budget Committee—and the even more drastic funding slashes that House Republicans will propose as a substitute. The budget debate is expected to start Apr. 30, a few days after Congress reconvenes.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told representatives of more than 150 cooperating organizations at a Budget Coalition meeting that the social gains of an entire generation could be wiped out in a few weeks through budget actions.

He urged the participating groups to relate the budget cuts to the concerns of their members—"to translate these issues into the language of your own constituency."

AFL-CIO central bodies will be available as coordinating centers for arranging meetings with congressmen and for joint actions, Donahue said.

The alliance of labor, social service, civil rights and public interest groups will be competing with home-state pressure on representatives and senators from business associations and conservative groups de-

Labor Applauds Arrest In El Salvador Slayings

By James M. Shevis

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland commended the El Salvador government of Jose Napoleon Duarte and the FBI for the thoroughness of their investigation which led to the arrest of an El Salvador citizen in connection with the January murders of two American union advisers in San Salvador, the capital of the Latin American republic.

The arrest of Hans Christ, about 30 years old, followed intensive investigation and collaboration by U.S. and El Salvador authorities.

THE SUSPECT, who has long been identified with extreme right factions in El Salvador opposed to the ruling junta and the land reform program it began in March 1980, was taken into custody in Miami Beach on Apr. 15. A bond hearing was scheduled the following day.

Christ has been accused of involvement in the shooting deaths of Michael P. Hammer, 42, of Potomac, Md., and Mark Pearlman, 36, of Seattle, both representatives of the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), an international auxiliary of the AFL-CIO.

The two were killed—along with Jose Rodolfo Viera, 43, head of the El Salvador government's land-reform agency, the Instituto Salvadoreno de Transformacion Agraria (ISTA)—in a hail of bullets as they sat in the coffee shop of a San Salvador hotel on Jan. 3. Witnesses said two men entered the room and sprayed the three with automatic pistol fire.

PRESIDENT DUARTE said shortly after the killing of Hammer and Pearlman that, "in my opinion, it was almost certainly an action by the extreme right."

The far-right forces have bitterly opposed El Salvador's agrarian reform program, which broke up many of the large estates and distributed the land to the peasants who actually worked it. Many landowners have sought to topple the Duarte government to regain the estates.

Kirkland urged the El Salvador government to continue its investigation of other possible suspects in the January killings, and to bring Christ and any other persons implicated in the murders to trial as promptly as possible. Similarly, he urged continuation of the investigation into the murders of other U.S. citizens in violence-plagued El Salvador and the speedy prosecution of those who are responsible.

HAMMER, WHO had been with AIFLD for 17 years until the day of his death, had arrived in San Salvador the Right to Bargain Over Shutdown Before Court

The Supreme Court was urged to uphold the right of a union to bargain with an employer in an effort to avoid a shutdown and thus save the jobs of workers it represents.

A joint brief submitted by the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers contends that an employer's action that will result in abolition of jobs clearly affects "conditions of employment" and thus is subject to the collective bargaining process under the National Labor Relations Act.

THAT'S THE case whether or not the employer argues that the portion of his business being closed is a money-loser or

Cotton Dust Retreat Sets High Price

By John R. Oravec

The Reagan Administration attempt to dismantle the federal cotton dust standard would exact a heavy human toll as well as stiff economic costs of $5 billion, the Clothing & Textile Workers told a House Labor subcommittee.

ACTWU's warning came in testimony protesting the Labor Dept.'s directive ordering a cost-benefit review of the three-year-old OSHA standard, which requires the industry to install engineering controls to reduce cotton dust levels in textile mills.

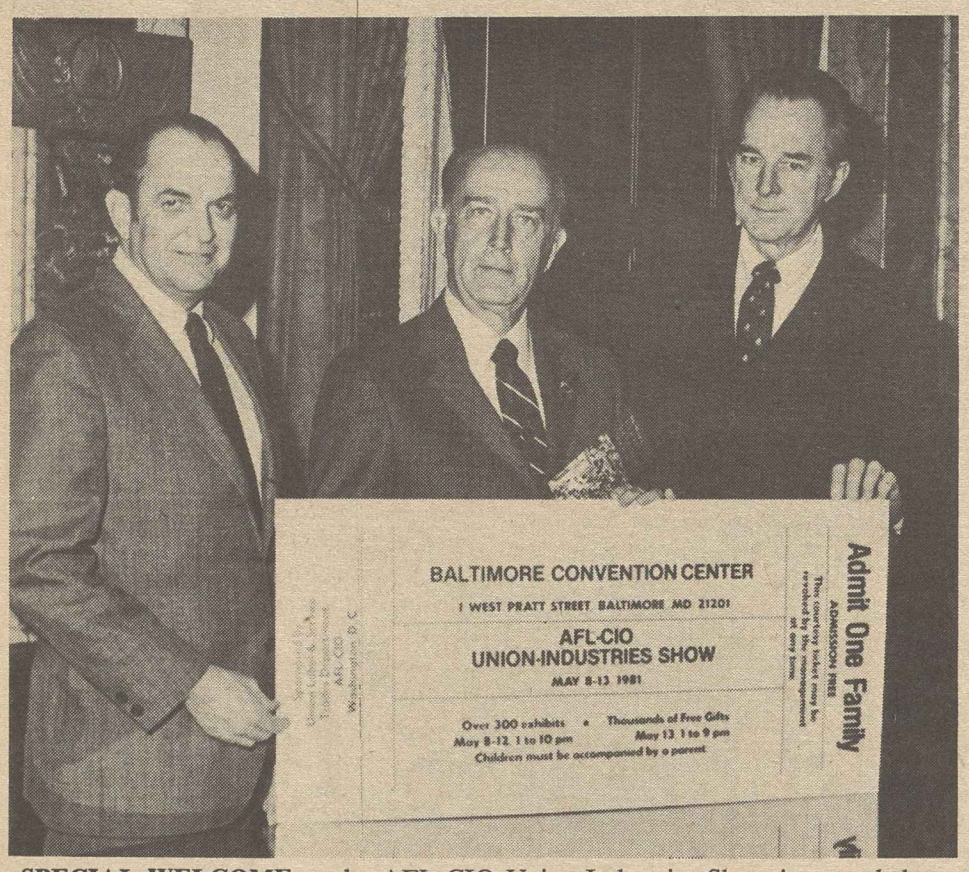
SCOTT HOYMAN, ACTWU executive vice president, charged that Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan's action is a "callous political ploy" to appease the "selfish interests of textile mill owners."

Hoyman said the attempt "to dismantle the standard constitutes a potential tragedy of immense proportions for the over half-million textile workers exposed to cotton dust on their jobs every day."

Prolonged exposure to high levels of cotton dust can cause brown lung, a debilitating respiratory disease that can be fatal.

The scrapping of engineering controls, ACTWU warned, would greatly increase the risks of contracting brown lung disease for some 50,000 textile workers.

AS ABHORRENT as the translating of the human toll to economic terms is, Hoyman said, he estimated that it would require $100,000 per victim in income support, medical expenses and administrative costs.



On that basis, he observed, "the price tag for the proposed change in the standard is $5 billion. This cost would have to be borne in large part by the federal Treasury, and does not even include the additional $382 million in workers' compensation costs imposed on employers."

George Perkel, occupational health consultant who accompanied Hoyman at the hearings, noted that an Administration regulatory reform task force official had suggested that performance standards might be more cost effective than provisions requiring engineering controls.

"THIS IS precisely what the textile industry has been saying ever since the cotton dust standard was proposed," Perkel pointed out.

Hoyman questioned the timing of the Labor Secretary's action against the regulation since the Supreme Court has a decision pending on the standard. ACTWU, the AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept. have asked the justices to reject the Labor Dept.'s request that the court shelve that he was motivated solely by business considerations, the brief insisted.

Plant-Closing Test

Federal appellate courts have divided on the issue. But in the case being reviewed by the Supreme Court, both the National Labor Relations Board and the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed that the First National Maintenance Corp. violated federal labor law by its actions.

The firm abruptly ended its maintenance service arrangement with a Brooklyn nursing home, gave a three-day notice of dismissal to its 35 employees who worked full time at the institution, and refused to meet with representatives of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, which had recently been chosen as bargaining representative of the workers in an NLRB election.

THE MAINTENANCE firm told the union the arrangement with the nursing home was being discontinued "because of financial reasons." And an officer of the firm rejected a request for a meeting to discuss the situation with a brusque rejoinder, "We have nothing to discuss."

The AFL-CIO and the UAW maintain in their brief that the employer, indeed, has an obligation to join with the union in a good-faith effort to reach an agreement that would avoid the job loss.

If an agreement is not possible, the employer is then free to act unilaterally and the union has the right to take any legal "self-help" action that may be available to it, the brief noted.

IT CITED the experience of the UAW and Chrysler as well as cases involving other unions in which various concessions agreed to by workers resulted in reducing costs to a company, thus enabling an operation that had been losing money to continue.

"Experience demonstrates that labor and management can and do engage in productive negotiations over potential decisions to close plants and find ways to avert these closings, in a manner beneficial to the interests of each," the brief stressed.

"Frequently, ways to solve problems leading to closings are reached, but even if they are not, mutual understanding and trust are engendered."

The brief concluded that "free collective bargaining in the plant closing context works, just as Congress judged it would. Or, at the very least, the chances that it will work are good enough to make bargaining worthwhile."

ON THE legal precedents, the union brief noted that a comparable Supreme Court decision under the Railway Labor Act, whose pertinent language is identical to that of the NLRA, upheld the right of the Railroad Telegraphers to bargain over the issue of stations and discontinuance of jobs.

It would be a "cruel irony," the brief suggested, if in this case the Supreme Court were to hold that workers who had voted for union representation were entitled to negotiate with their employer over virtually all conditions of employment except for job security, which is often "their most pressing need."

OSHA Places Hold On Hearing Program

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has delayed until June 1 a hearing conservation program that was scheduled to go into effect Apr. 15 for workers subjected to high levels of noise on the job.

Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter said the 47-day delay is needed to study numerous requests OSHA has received for interpretation, reconsideration and stay of the program.

The program was promulgated Jan. 16 by the outgoing Carter Administration as an amendment to the agency's 90-decibel noise limit standard which is seldom enforced.

Under the new program, employers would be required to provide hearing protectors, audiometric testing, training and monitoring for workers exposed to 85 decibels of noise.

Printers, Newspaper Guild Discontinue Merger Talks

The Newspaper Guild and the Typographical Union announced jointly that "after exploring every avenue that might lead to permanent and effective organic merger," the two unions have ended merger talks "without concluding a merger agreement."

At the same time, the unions pledged to "preserve and strengthen" their "good" relationships, to keep the "hot line" between their respective headquarters "unobstructed and responsive," and to continue and extend operations of longstanding task forces that have worked to encourage joint, coordinated and cooperative bargaining by locals of the two unions. The no-raiding agreement between the unions also remains in place, they said.

THE UNIONS made the joint announcement at the conclusion of a four-day meeting between their respective merger negotiation committees here.

Formal merger talks between the unions began in November 1977 after conventions of both unions authorized them. Each subsequent annual convention of each union renewed the charge to the committees to continue to seek to work out a proposal for merger.

"Despite these efforts, hard work and the best will in the world," the unions' joint statement said, "it has not been possible to resolve all the differences we have found in the existing structures, policies and practices of the two unions.

"Thus, we reluctantly conclude that these discussions should cease until new and fresh looks and approaches can be brought to bear on our unresolved problems."

AT THE SAME time, the unions declared that this conclusion does not lessen their belief "that unity of purpose and goals in the graphic arts and newspaper industries is vitally necessary—as is, one day," merger of the unions that represent the industries' employees.

Pledging continued pursuit of those goals, the statement said the "failure to reach a merger agreement denigrates neither the efforts invested by both parties nor the way in which our respective unions conduct their business."

"The disappointment over this result is unlimited, but so is our determination to strengthen the bonds between our two unions," the statement concluded.

R. W. Macfarlane Dies, Headed Idaho AFL-CIO

Boise, Idaho—Robert W. Macfarlane, president emeritus of the Idaho AFL-CIO, died Apr. 11 at his home here after a heart attack.

Macfarlane, who was 70, had been president of the state labor federation from 1967 until his retirement in 1979. He was a longtime member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and worked throughout the United States and Canada as a cable splicer. Macfarlane was serving as president of IBEW Local 449 in Pocatello when he was first elected to head the State AFL-CIO.

During his tenure, Macfarlane led the labor federation's 1971 fight for major improvements in Idaho's workers' compensation benefits and coverage and in defeating a 1977 campaign by anti-union forces for a "right-to-work" law.

After retiring from active office, Macfarlane continued to assist the State AFL-CIO in defeating another R-T-W drive and lobbied for senior citizens' programs in the legislature for the past two years.

Survivors include his wife, Hon, two children, five grandchildren and one great-grandchild. Services were held Apr. 14 in Boise.

day he was shot to consult with Viera on technical aspects of the land-redistribution program. Pearlman, who joined AIFLD only last May, was the resident American adviser to peasant unions involved in the agrarian reform.

William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of the Washington-based AIFLD, which sponsored the American rural labor advisory program, said that despite the deaths of the three men "the land reform process is continuing at an ever increasing rate."

ISTA, the El Salvadoran government agency in charge of administering the reform program, is now issuing titles to sharecroppers transferring the expropriated land to them, he said.

DOHERTY NOTED that just last week, on Apr. 9 at a congress commemorating Viera, the Union Communal Salvadorena (UCS), the largest peasant union in El Salvador, ratified its support of the land-redistribution program, and pressed the Duarte government to accelerate the reform process. Viera headed UCS as well as ISTA at the time of his death.

Doherty said that he was elated by news of Christ's arrest, and gratified by the El Salvadoran government's persistence in pursuing the case.

"This is not a matter of revenge," he said. "It is a matter of defending the agrarian reform against the right-wing extremists who oppose a better deal for the peasants." He said that the investigation was continuing, but could not provide further details at this time. "We don't want to jeopardize the case," he added.

At the time of their deaths, Doherty said he believed that Hammer and Pearlman were the first American trade unionists killed in Latin America—possibly in the world—while carrying out their official duties abroad.

Labor Fights Move to Apply Extortion Law to Picketing

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to rebuff attempts by anti-union groups to nullify a 1973 Supreme Court decision and make picket-line scuffles subject to the heavy criminal penalties of a federal anti-racketeering law.

In a letter to representatives and senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said state and local laws are adequate to deal with flareups of violence or harassment that might occur during the course of a strike.

THE HOBBS ACT, dating to the 1950s, defined the circumstances when extortion or threats would be considered federal crimes. But Denison reminded the legislators that the Supreme Court made clear that the law did not "put the federal government in the business of policing the orderly conduct of strikes." It ruled that the Hobbs Act does not apply to actions that might occur during legitimate strikes for legal goals such as higher wages or pension benefits.

Denison protested that if the law is changed to apply the Hobbs Act to legitimate strikes, "almost any incident that occurs along a picket line" could subject strikers or union officials to penalties of up to 20 years in prison and $10,000 fines.

"The worker who threw a punch on the picket line or the striker who deflated the tires of his employer's truck would be subject to federal prosecution," he said.

FURTHER, Denison noted, a strikebreaker who threw the first punch could only be prosecuted under state law, but a striker in similar circumstances could be charged under the anti-extortion law.

Such a distinction is contrary to the basic labor law policy of "government neutrality and even-handedness" in enforcement, Denison protested.

Budget Coalition Drive Keyed to Grass Roots

manding undeviating support of President Reagan's program.

With blunt frankness, the Conservative Political Action Committee explained why it was lavishly funding a series of television commercials attacking liberal Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.) as a big spender.

NCPAC CHAIRMAN John T. Donlan stressed at a news conference that the anti-Sarbanes commercials would be shown over Washington-area television stations. His organization expected they would be seen by other members of Congress who could "substitute their own names" for Sarbanes and perhaps have second throughts about voting against budget cuts.

At the Budget Coalition meeting, the discussion focused on the human impact of the proposed funding slashes and the work the various groups have been doing —simultaneous press conferences in key cities by women's groups, coordinated lobbying by Urban League affiliates, targeting of key congressional districts by Hispanic organizations, issue-oriented television commercials prepared by the State, County & Municipal Employees, research undertaken by Americans for Democratic Action, activities by the Catholic Charities, the National Council of Churches and Jewish groups, anti-hunger rallies and legislative conferences in Washington timed to have maximum impact on the budget votes.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE Director Ray Denison, in a letter to state and local central bodies, stressed that only "a mass outpouring of anger and opposition at the grassroots level in every congressional district" can turn the tide away from "economic disaster."

The Budget Coalition lobbying effort will stress that the Administration's proposals "will accelerate inflation, destroy jobs, hurt the poor, the aged, children, the jobless and disadvantaged and preclude essential public investments and services that are needed to revitalize urban and rural areas as well as to create new jobs."

It will urge members of Congress to support amendments to restore funds for vital social and economic programs "so long as that amendment does not take funds from another program."

THE EXTENT to which amendments can be proposed to the budget resolution will be determined by the House Rules Committee at its Apr. 28 meeting.

The Senate, which got off to a fast start in budget-slashing by directing its legislative committees to rewrite existing laws to eliminate some $37 billion in spending authority, got temporarily sidetracked by a Republican ideological split.

The Senate Budget Committee had been expected to adopt a comprehensive budget resolution, based on Administration projections of outlays and revenues, including the impact of the three-stage tax cut the President proposed.

THREE OF THE most conservative Republican senators joined committee Democrats in voting against the budget because, they said, the President promised a balanced budget by 1984.

White House emissaries have been trying to persuade the GOP strays to change their votes and have promised that the Administration will at a later date propose further spending cuts that will achieve the balanced budget.

Despite the intra-party squabble, the coalition of nearly all Republicans and a large bloc of conservative Democrats in the Senate has given the Reagan Administration virtually everything it has asked for.

Kirkland Calls Budget Fight Civil Rights Issue of 1980s

America's painfully achieved progress towards social justice and equal opportunity is threatened by the Administration's "new economics," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned.

Kirkland challenged the rush to dismantle laws and programs without regard for the consequences in his keynote speech to a five-day AFL-CIO Civil Rights Conference held at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

"IF YOU want to know what the civil rights issues of the 1980s are, look at the President's budget proposals," Kirkland suggested. "They add up to an attempt to reverse the social progress that has been won by legislative and economic action over the last 50 years."

Kirkland said the budget-dictated dismantling is being done "in the name of economic theories that defy experience and common sense, without any semblance of compassion or regard for the common welfare."

The Administration would sacrifice half a million public service jobs, Kirkland noted, along with "job training programs administered by the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute and the employment and training arms of the Urban League and the NAACP."

He warned that "at a time when the Administration seeks to strengthen the role of America in the world, it risks dividing Americans at home."

Kirkland noted that the breakthrough civil rights laws of the 1960s were achieved largely through the coalition efforts of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

Those groups are the heart of the Budget Coalition of 186 national organizations, Kirkland noted. "We have been joined by an extraordinary range of other voluntary organizations." And the cooperation must be duplicated at the local level, he urged.

"We need our local unions and central labor councils to take the lead in building the same coalition in their own communities," Kirkland said, "and to agitate, educate and organize until every union member, every member of the civil rights organizations, women's organizations, every organization we can reach, is contributing to the struggle."

THE LABOR movement won't be deterred from a maximum effort by those who "tell us the odds are against us, that it's a losing battle," Kirkland stressed. "Since when do we consult the bookmakers on what is right and what is wrong, what serves the interests of American workers and what hurts them?"

Unions, he urged, must "educate our members and their families to the issues that are at stake" and "enlist them as grassroots lobbyists."

It's the labor movement's "plain duty," he said, "to do our best to head off the disasters we see in the making."

Prevailing Wage Repealer Killed In New Mexico

Albuquerque, N.M.—Anti-worker forces lost another round when Gov. Bruce King (D) vetoed a bill calling for repeal of the state prevailing wage law. The veto cannot be overridden because it was handed down 11 days after the final legislative session had ended.

The measure to call back the state's Public Workers Minimum Wage Law had been sent to Gov. King in mid-March but did not reach his desk within 72 hours of the Mar. 20 adjournment of the regular session. Although a special legislative session was called through Mar. 29, King by law had until mid-April to act.

IN HIS VETO message, King, who had earlier rejected a "right-to-work" bill, said he killed the prevailing wage repealer "because I do not believe it would help the people of New Mexico, particularly our working men and women."

Also in March, a strong lobbying effort by Arkansas labor helped persuade the state house to bury a prevailing wage repeal bill in committee, but in Utah non-union contractors were able to rally the overwhelmingly Republican legislature to override Gov. Scott Matheson's veto of a repeal bill.

Measures to weaken state prevailing wage laws have apparently failed in Idaho, Montana and Indiana, according to the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

MISSOURI'S law withstood a constitutional challenge earlier this year, but prevailing wage repealers or weakening amendments have been introduced in Illinois, Kansas, Nevada, Oklahoma, Texas and Colorado, the BCTD said.

Improvements in prevailing wage laws are being considered in Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York and Oregon.

its review of the standard as well as vacate an appeals court ruling that upheld the regulation.

Hoyman said that Donovan's action also "raises fundamental and disturbing questions about the ability of the Executive Branch of government to usurp congressional authority."

By ordering a review of the engineering control provisions, Hoyman charged, Donovan "is determined to find a basis for tearing out the very heart of the standard."

THE CLEAR intent of the federal job safety law was to eliminate toxic substances in the workplace, he stressed.

"Never did Congress seek to create a workforce encased in respirators and gas masks. Nowhere did it ask the Secretary of Labor to try to put a price tag on human life. The Secretary's efforts in that direction are a gross subversion of the legislative process," he told the panel.

The standard provides for the use of respirators until engineering controls are fully in place by Mar. 27, 1984.

Safety vs. Profits

THE RECENT ACTIONS of the Labor Dept. to abrogate its responsibilities under the Occupational Safety & Health Act raise serious questions about the Reagan Administration's understanding of the functions of the Executive Branch of the government.

Within the last month, the Secretary of Labor has withdrawn OSHA's proposed requirements for identification of hazardous chemicals used in the workplace and cancelled public hearings on the proposal. Ten years of painstaking study went into the development of the proposal which he dismissed, inaccurately, as a "midnight regulation."

The Secretary has turned back the clock on textile workers threatened by exposure to cotton dust by calling for new rule-making for a cotton dust standard to include "cost-benefit analysis," abandoning a pending Supreme Court test of the issue.

THE NEW ADMINISTRATOR of OSHA has issued an order withdrawing the agency's pamphlets and films on brown lung disease, which he admitted he has not personally reviewed, on the curious ground that the materials "favor workers."

Each of these moves reflects industry objections to the law and to its enforcement.

They show a fundamental misunderstanding of how our three-branch, representative system of government operates.

Our elected Congress has asserted every worker's right to a safe and healthful workplace. The law has been tested and upheld by the Judicial Branch.

The Reagan Administration, as the Executive Branch, is directed by the Constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." It cannot evade that responsibility because a business complains of the cost.

THE OCCUPATIONAL Safety & Health Act was enacted to protect workers from avoidable job-related hazards. It is clearly within the law's intent that workers be made aware of the potential risks of the substances they handle or breathe.

The achievements and the goals of this excellent law should not be negated under the guise of business-school jargon such as cost-benefit analysis, a thinly disguised ploy to cripple the effect of the law and the agency that administers it.

The responsible elements of the American business community surely cannot agree that it is an acceptable practice to trade off specified amounts of human suffering in exchange for maximizing profits.

THE AFL-CIO is committed to the effort to achieve strong federal standards that require industry to provide clear identification of hazardous substances, to provide textile workers with a clean, safe environment, and in general to provide for all working people the safe workplace that the law requires.

Given the realities of the blatant bias with which worker safety and health are apparently going to be treated, however, we will urge our members to use every means available—state legislation, legal proceedings, and contract language—to assure that no American worker must be forced to decide between a life and a paycheck.

New Political Concept to End 'Discrimination' Against Rich

By Gus Tyler

WILSON HAD his New Freedom; Roosevelt had his New Deal; it may now be proper to propose a New Equality.

The New Equality would deny favors to all, regardless of how rich or poor. It would wipe out discrimination between old and young, men and women. It would treat all alike.

As yet, this concept has not been spelled out. But if some of the new egalitarians have their way in Washington, we may soon expect legislation embodying a few of these leveling proposals:

Both rich and poor shall be denied food stamps.

No one is entitled to welfare, regardless of income.

Both men and women shall be denied sick leave when they are pregnant.

NO ONE SHALL be entitled to free legal services, no matter how affluent or non-affluent.

No student in America shall be given financial aid for college, even if his or her parents are millionaires.

Medicaid will be extended to all those who are prepared to pay 50 percent of the bill out of their own pocket or out of private insurance policies.

All families will be taxed alike, a flat 30 percent of their income. But no one will be taxed at all—rich or poor—if he or she in any one year invests $1 million.

THE SOCIAL security system shall be abolished since it gives one section of the population, those over 65, favored treatment over those who are younger. Age—like sex, race, religion, or income—should not be the basis of special benefits.

Likewise, the unemployed should not receive jobless pay, since to do so would once more favor a few who are indulging their indolence.

No one may join a union since to do so would allow one group in society to win benefits that are denied to those who prefer not to join a union.

No one is entitled to rent supplements even if he or she pays $2,000 a month in rent.

There shall be no minimum wage since it forces people to work at higher wages than they desire. To insist that a person earn at least $3.35 an hour when he or she prefers to work for 50 cents an hour is tyranny.

THE BLIND, the handicapped, the disabled should not get special treatment since to do so is to discriminate against those who are not fortunate enough to possess these traits.

The government will supply no free lunch to any student, including those at Groton or Princeton.

No one may beg or sleep in the city streets.

I am deeply honored by this award. Yet, in all honesty, I must question my right to it.

To have run the gauntlet of the two major tyrannies of our time is not in itself an achievement. To be a victim is not to be a hero.

I plead guilty to that for which I was condemned by one regime: the offense of being Jewish. I was and am certainly guilty of that for which I was denounced and arrested by another: the offense of holding and expressing opinions of my own.

I am luckier than most such offenders of my time in finding a life where neither offense is a mortal crime, within reach of an all-powerful state.

Who knows how many real or potential heroes there were among the 6 million Jews destroyed in Europe? Who knows how many real heroes have sunk to the bottom of the China Sea . . . perished in the African bush . . . been lost in the Caribbean . . . vanished into the Gulag?

It is for them that I accept this award. And for those who survived only to find themselves rejected by the family of man.

Indifference is the silent crime of the civilized, the refusal to recognize the human bond, the denial that another's agony is our own.

Kirkland Stresses Link

Freedom of Association Basic To Survival of Human Rights

Excerpts from an address by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to the International Rescue Committee's awards dinner, New York, Apr. 9, 1981.

LABOR HAS NOT been content to give refuge to those escaping from jailer and killer states. We are engaged as well in refugee-prevention work. Wherever in the world we are asked or allowed to do so, we are trying to humanize societies by helping free and democratic trade unions to organize and develop their strength as shields against the abuse of public or private power.

We are helping to create instruments through which workers can free themselves through the conquest of fear; through which they can effectively choose to stand their ground rather than take to flight. Without such a force, there is no choice but to fall or fly.

AFTER THE Second World War, we helped to rebuild the shattered free labor movements of Western Europe, and to keep them out of the control of foreign totalitarian power. We aided the development of trade unions in the liberated former colonies, and from that base national leadership often emerged. In Latin America and Asia, we have helped workers' movements hang on for the future, through all the cycles of assorted autocratic political or military regimes.

We have been criticized on many shifting grounds from many quarters. We have been chided for inciting simple workers to take risks, where an element of risk, knowingly faced, is their only chance for human dignity and a decent life. Where fear is the master, to give in or pander to fear is to conspire in the death of hope.

Why, after all, should the Communist Party, for use where it suits its purposes, have exclusive title to that grand old slogan: "It is better to die on your feet than to live on your knees"?

When the workers of Poland appealed publicly for essential material aid in the organization of an independent labor movement, our response was a natural one. Those workers do not seek to supplant the ruling party of that state, nor would we urge or encourage them to do so. They simply want their own independent trade union organization, of, by and for the workers.

THEY ARE PURSUING their version of an old biblical instruction: "Render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's, and unto labor that which is labor's."

That demand, to which the government of Poland committed itself as an obligation subject to international scrutiny when it ratified ILO Convention No. 87, and affirmed by written agreement with Solidarity last August, is the ultimate test of whether it is or ever will be possible to humanize a communist state.

We acknowledge and recognize the odds and risks confronting Solidarity; but if the workers of Poland seek of their own volition to challenge those odds and accept those risks, we would be the last to dissuade them. We shall certainly not compound their risks or raise the odds by any failure on our part to meet their stated needs.

The object is surely worthy of the odds, for if Solidarity endures and thrives the world will never be the same again, and that will be for the good of all. The abstract delusive question of the ownership of the tools of production will be disengaged, as it should be, from the over-riding issue of human freedom. All the channels of amity and commerce should be open to any regime where people who work can live in dignity and, in the words of George Meany, the "little guy can't be pushed around."

THE ELEMENTS of a decent human life that flow with logical force from free trade union organization in such a setting emerged quite clearly in the first meeting between Solidarity and the Polish government during the Gdnask strike last summer.

The government said, in effect: "Let's talk about wages and working conditions." Solidarity replied: "No, let's talk about freedom of association, freedom of worship, a measure of press freedom, and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention."

Any American can, of course, recognize in those demands the basic principles of our Bill of Rights. Any American trade unionist will sense the common strain with Samuel Gompers's evocation of the goals of labor, when he said:

"What does labor want? It wants the earth and the fulness thereof. There is nothing too precious, there is nothing too beautiful, too lofty, too ennobling, unless it is within the scope and comprehension of labor's aspirations and wants. . . . We want more constant work and less crime; more leisure and less greed; more justice and less revenge. . . ."

Recently when a journalist asked Lech Walesa whether Solidarity was not over-reaching so as to threaten international stability by going beyond pure "bread and butter" issues, he replied: "Life has forced us to become involved in these matters, because somebody has to be."

TODAY IN AMERICA there is a debate as to the role of government in the assertion abroad of policies in support of human rights—whether such a course should be pursued at all, or more consistently and forcefully, or simply abandoned. In all frankness, I cannot say that either the past or present government posture has properly addressed the issue.

I would strongly urge that the universal principle of freedom of independent association be made the cornerstone of a human rights policy. The presence, absence or degree of that quality in a society should override considerations of whether one scoundrel or clique in control of the reins of state ought to be replaced by another scoundrel or clique.

300,000 Face Layoff

Proposed Cut in Jobs Program Threatens Key Public Services

ADMINISTRATION PLANS to drop 300,000 CETA-program workers pose a severe threat to the quality and level of state and local public services, and add new pressures to the nation's already hard-pressed welfare and unemployment compensation systems, AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten warned.

Pointing out that large numbers of the workers targeted for layoff are working in child care and community development programs, as well as support services for fire and police protection, McGlotten said that many cities now face a hard choice between reducing needed public services or increase taxes. This is a grave problem for the cities, particularly the major cities of the Northeast and Midwest, he declared.

Questioned on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, McGlotten said the Administration's plan to slash CETA jobs is "inconsistent with its call to cut back federal involvement in a number of social programs." He said a recent University of Chicago analysis of the proposed CETA job cuts showed that at least "one-third of the people in public service jobs had previously been receiving other forms of public assistance," and that when the layoffs come, "practically all of them will have to go back on welfare."

McGLOTTEN DISAGREED sharply with the contention of some Administration officials that the laid-off CETA workers will "move into other jobs quickly." He stressed that with 7.8 million workers already on the jobless rolls, and with the nation's industrial capacity operating at only 80 percent of its potential, it is unlikely that private sector employers are going to expand payrolls.

THE LEGISLATIVE GEARS of the 97th Congress should mesh very smoothly because they are very well oiled.

According to an analysis by the National Committee for an Effective Congress, 190 oil and gas company political action committees (PACs) poured $6 million into House and Senate races in the 1980 elections.

In the view of NCEC Director Russell D. Hemenway, "This type of massive expenditure by a selfish special interest poses a real threat to our political process and the well-being of every American."

The fact is, he added, the oil and gas PACs outspent the national Democratic Party committee.

THE OIL COMPANIES may compete for the consumer's dollar in their advertising, but they apparently worked in unison in channeling their political money.

"Not only did the oil and gas crowd try to buy the influence and support of key committee members. They spent huge sums to defeat key progressive senators and congressmen who tried to protect the consumer and consistently voted in the best interest of all Americans," Hemenway said.

The NCEC analysis showed that 23 Republicans and five Democrats in Senate races received more than $20,000 each from oil and gas PACs. Standing alone in the six-digit class were four hardline Republican conservatives who knocked off four liberal Democratic senators.

James Abdnor received $152,509 in defeating Sen. George McGovern in South Dakota. Charles Grassley got $177,880 to help him beat Sen. John Culver in Iowa. Dan Quayle received $134,534 and ousted Sen. Birch Bayh in Indiana. Steven Symms got $167,700 and beat four-term Sen. Frank Church in Idaho.

The oil/gas PACs directed money into a large number of marginal House seats and in key House races in which one member above all that they marked for extinction. That was Rep. Bob Eckhardt of Texas, a fighter for consumer interests. The oil/gas PACs poured $102,911 into the coffers of challenger Jack Fields, by far the largest amount given to a House candidate and Eckhardt went down to defeat.

THE NCEC STUDY showed that, of the House incumbents who received more than $5,000 from oil/gas PACs, 40 percent had committee or subcommittee assignments of major importance to the industry. That is, they were on Commerce and Energy, Interior or Ways & Means. Another 20 percent were on panels of secondary importance, such as Science and Technology, Merchant Marine or Public Works.

In the 96th Congress, NCEC noted, these committees considered such legislation as the windfall profits tax, the Alaskan Lands Act, the toxic waste superfund and the transport of natural gas.

The Democratic Study Group, which includes most liberal and moderate Democrats in the House, recently issued a report on oil company profits which is mind boggling.

THE DSG REPORT noted that, while the national economy showed no growth last year, the 20 biggest oil companies had a total net profit of more than $29 billion, a 30 percent jump over their record profits of 1979.

The DSG quoted a Business Week magazine analysis which said the oil companies are on the verge of overwhelming the industrial economy. In 1972, oil firm profits made up only 15 percent of the profits of some 9,000 manufacturing corporations surveyed by the Federal Trade Commission. In 1978, this edged up to 18 percent. But by mid-1980, the oil company share of profits jumped to 40 percent and was rising in a generally stagnant economy.

The DSG report said an analysis showed the top 20 oil companies spent only 38 percent of their "cash-flow" on exploration and production in 1979. The rest was spent on chemical production, marketing and buying up other companies.

HARD CHOICE between reducing vital public services or boosting taxes faces many American cities if the Reagan Administration's plan to drop 300,000 CETA jobs gets congressional approval, AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Doug Harbrecht of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

The Reagan Budget

Impact on Public Employees

DEMONSTRATING POSTAL WORKERS display the frustrations felt by million of government employees at all levels from cutbacks in funds for public services. The Reagan Administration's "economic recovery" program would severely curtail the quality and amount of public services and increase the tax burden on middle-income and lower-income working Americans, the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. charges.

Government Workers Used As Scapegoats for Cutbacks

Although the poor and the elderly will suffer from President Reagan's proposed budget cuts, millions of working Americans also will pay higher costs for public services they have come to expect and take for granted.

Translating the impact of reduced or lost government services on the wallets of union members, in fact, is the biggest challenge union officials face.

THE ADMINISTRATION and its supporters in Congress, unfortunately, are selling the notion that government and public employees are responsible for the sagging economy and runaway inflation.

Federal and postal workers are singled-out in particular by the conservative budget-cutters. About 15 percent of the cost of the President's program will fall directly on them.

More than 100,000 federal jobs will be cut in every non-defense agency by reductions-in-force over the next two years. What do these job cuts mean to industrial, service or construction workers?

THE OCCUPATIONAL Safety & Health Administration is just one example. The $15 million proposed reduction in OSHA's budget will result in 9,000 fewer on-the-job inspections. Similar cuts are projected in federal monitoring programs for such industries as food, and drugs, mine and grain inspections, and so on.

In addition, Alfred M. Zuck, assistant secretary of labor for administration and management, has announced that there will be "some reductions" in inspections to enforce the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law. Add to that list child labor, wage and hour, age and sex discrimination and a host of other federal protective labor laws.

The U.S. Postal Service is widely recognized as one of the most productive federal activities. But nearly $600 million in public service subsidies are slated to be eliminated.

PRESIDENT MORRIS Biller of the Postal Workers warns that 40,000 postal jobs will be lost. The continued existence of small and rural post offices is threatened.

The end of six-day delivery, increased costs for charitable and labor publications and slower mail processing are harmful effects cited by Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto. Mail Handlers President Lonnie Johnson shares similar concerns.

The list of other service reductions and examples of indirect costs to taxpayers of the Reagan program are numerous. But past experience has shown that personnel ceilings and federal job cuts have never really saved money for the government.

MANY MEMBERS of the American Federation of Government Employees, for instance, employed in small social security district offices regularly work nine, ten or 11-hour days to meet processing demands. They report that most of the errors that create public dissatisfaction are caused by poorly trained part-time workers.

Postal union leaders cite the same problems of increased payroll costs resulting from overtime and unsatisfactory performance by part-time workers.

The ultimate in senseless contracting-out was reached recently when Education Sec. Terrel H. Bell announced that 565 federal loan collectors will be laid off. Their record of collecting defaulted student loans is better than 90 percent. But their jobs will be contracted to the private sector, which normally charges 50 cents for every dollar collected. Federal workers returned $3 for every $1 in cost to tax payers.

The material on this page analyzing the impact of the Reagan Administration's economic program on public services and government workers was prepared by the officers of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. It is one of a series planned by the AFL-CIO News.

THE REAGAN Administration seems to have embarked on an all-out attack on the pay and fringe benefits of federal and postal workers. These plans include:

- Slashing federal white-collor raises to about 4 percent.
- Radically changing the retirement system, including a reduction in cost-of-living adjustments.
- Wiping-out the current white-collar and blue-collar pay systems.
- Drastically weakening the federal and postal employees injury compensation program.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. is warning that President Reagan is offering the American people nothing more than the classic right-wing "Business Deal." The fine print spells out the price the disadvantaged will pay, which means that an even greater financial burden will fall on millions of middle-income wage earners.

Cost-Benefit Approach Aims To Wipe Out Public Services

A significant aspect of President Reagan's economic theories is the application of cost-benefit analysis to government regulations, which ultimately will only benefit business and cost American consumers plenty.

Like many other "Reaganomic" theories, cost-benefit analysis is simple to understand: just measure the cost to industry of complying with federal rules against the benefits received by the people. If the costs outweigh the benefits, the regulations must be inflationary, right?

BUT NO ECONOMIST has yet developed cost figures for the human savings resulting from federal regulations applied to air and water, job safety and health or private sector pensions.

Only after a disaster has occurred—one that might have been prevented by stronger federal action—can the human suffering be counted. Examples are legendary: deaths from asbestos; injuries because of unsafe automobiles, deformed babies caused by dangerous drugs, and so on.

Yet, a Presidential Task Force on Regulatory Relief—consisting of the Vice President and high-ranking cabinet officials—is now using cost-benefit analysis to review the entire government's regulatory policies. So far, the benefits to industry, and the cost to workers, include:

- Suspension of Occupational Safety & Health Administration rules that chemicals in the workplace be labeled and cotton dust standards be enforced.
- Elimination of national energy efficiency standards for major household appliances.
- Revocation of an extension of Davis-Bacon "prevailing wage" principles to timber sales, automatic data processing, and research and development firms under contract to the federal government.

A comprehensive review is underway of the regulations of 14 "key" Executive Branch agencies, including the Departments of Labor, Health & Human Services, Justice, Treasury and Agriculture.

These departments administer laws ranging from mine, wage-hour, meat and food inspections, to consumer product, drug, job safety and civil rights protections. Their effectiveness will be challenged by the budget-cutters.

PRESIDENT REAGAN also promises that "during the coming weeks and months agencies will be conducting intensive reviews of many existing and proposed regulations—at their own initiative, and in response to requests from the Task Force on Regulatory Relief."

The President's support of the business-led attack on OSHA is an example of the regulatory review American workers can expect from the task force.

The right-wing myth that government —and government workers—are the causes of all our domestic and international problems is thus perpetuated. But American demand that public services be performed in response to needs that the private sector is either unwilling or unable to provide.

ENERGY CONSERVATION, inflation and unemployment are a few of the national problems requiring a response from the federal government. Mass transit aid, subsidies to the postal service and technological research spending are examples of federal programs that do not cause inflation.

Attacking public employees may sound heroic, but government is not the enemy of the people. The Reagan program promises to get the government off the back of the corporations and the rich, while leaving working Americans to foot the bill.

President's Plan Burdens Cities, Schools

President Reagan's so-called economic recovery program will result in a drastic shift of the tax burden on already hard-pressed middle-income and lower-income Americans for essential state and local government services.

An analysis of the proposed federal budget cuts reveals that more than $35 billion, about 65 percent, will fall on programs that serve millions of working men and women through state or local governments.

But President Reagan's program poses a particularly damaging threat to the quality of education in this country. He is proposing to reduce aid to elementary and secondary schools by $2.2 billion out of the $7.2 billion now in the budget.

FEDERAL GRANTS that go to local school districts and states to help the disadvantaged, the handicapped and others will be cut $1.5 billion. Impact Aid operating funds that now go to 4,500 school districts will be cut $474 million and will be available to only 300 districts.

These cuts will mean a loss of $22 million to New York City alone, $4 million to Chicago, $3.5 million to Philadelphia, $5 million to Los Angeles, $1 million to Boston.

Also recommended is a 25-percent cut, about $220 million, in funds for vocational education programs to train students for career jobs.

The numbers represented by these budget cuts translate into larger classes, less help for poor learners and less attention to the gifted. There will be fewer teachers, counselors, paraprofessionals and other school workers.

IN ADDITION, President Reagan is planning to provide remaining federal, state and local aid through state "block" grants, with no restrictions or requirements in their use.

But wide-ranging reductions are planned in federal aid to cities:

- A severe cutback in housing and federal mortgage loan programs.
- Elimination of the Economic Development Administration, which funds many public sector construction projects.
- Elimination of more than 300,000 public services jobs under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act.
- A $1-billion cut in highway programs and larger cuts for Conrail and Amtrak.
- Phaseout of mass transit operating subsidies, with a cut of $103 million in fiscal 1982 and a reduction of $950 million for bus purchases and other capital improvements.
- A reduction of $1 billion in FY 1981 and $3.6 billion the next fiscal year for water and sewer improvement projects funded by the Environmental Protection Agency.
- Elimination of the Solar & Energy Conservation Bank, with a $1 billion cut in the programs it finances.
- Elimination of the Urban Parks program.

These are just a few of the programs that benefit working Americans and their children. Added to the list are the social programs for the unemployed, the poor, the elderly and disabled, and other politically weak groups in society.

As a consequence, Americans can expect to pay more to commute to work, higher property taxes, user fees for services that were once free, increased costs for government inspection fees and so on.

The ultimate effect of the Reagan program is that, one way or another, working people will end up paying the bill.

High Jobless States Grow From 5 to 18

The number of states with unemployment rates of at least 8.5 percent more than tripled between February 1980 and February 1981, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Jobless rates were 8.5 percent or higher in 18 states last February, compared with five states a year earlier. The data are not adjusted for seasonal fluctuations. The unadjusted national jobless rate for February 1981 was 8 percent, or 1.2 percentage points above the year-earlier level.

BLS also reported that there were 83 metropolitan areas with jobless rates of 8.5 percent or higher in February 1981.

Of the 18 states with jobless rates above 8.5 percent, seven had rates higher than 10 percent: Delaware, Michigan, Ohio, Oregon, West Virginia, Alaska, and Kentucky. Michigan posted the highest rate, 14.2 percent, followed by West Virginia, 11.9 percent, and Delaware, 11.1 percent.

SEVEN STATES had jobless increases of at least 2 percentage points over the year—Delaware, Michigan, Ohio, Oregon, West Virginia, South Carolina, and Wisconsin.

"Employment declines in construction and durable and nondurable goods manufacturing affected almost all of the seven states with large over-the-year unemployment rate increases," BLS said. "Smaller declines in transportation and public utilities and wholesale and retail trade also affected most of these states, especially Michigan and Ohio."

Jobless rates rose by 1 percentage point or more over the year in 117 of the 220 metropolitan areas for which data were reported for both years, BLS said. Jobless rate increases of at least 2 percentage points occurred in 45 of those areas.

The unemployment rate rose by more than 5 percentage points during the year in Kenosha and Racine, Wis.; Muskegon, Mich., and Youngstown-Warren, Ohio, as employment in durable goods industries continued to decline. Jobless rate decreases of 1 percentage point or more over the year were reported in five areas.

New Tax Bill Meets Labor's Fairness Test

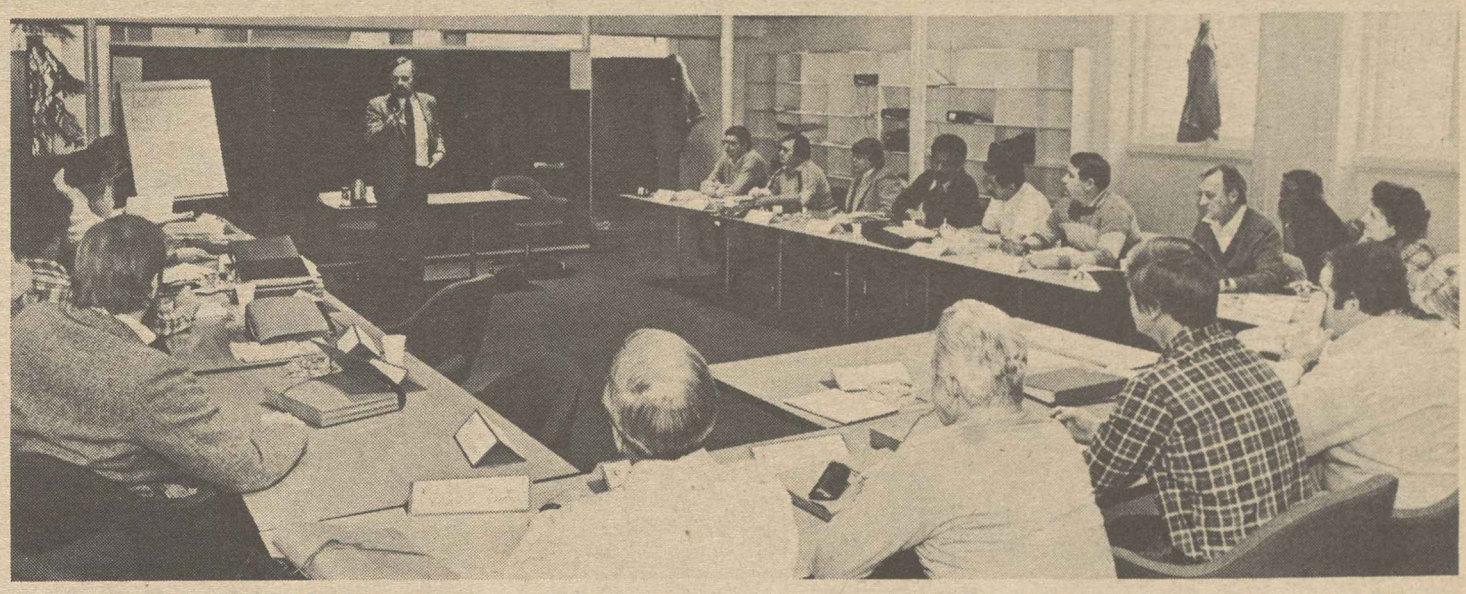
would be channeled through a reconstituted Reconstruction Finance Corp. which would invest both public and private funds and guarantee loans to help strengthen the nation's industrial base.



Funds to help modernization or expansion would be provided when this would expand employment opportunities and productivity, strengthen the ability of domestic industries to compete with imports, or assist U.S. firms that have problems meeting government-imposed costs.

The Guarini bill would authorize $5 billion to the RFC for non-tax assistance, such as loans and interest subsidies, and provide another $5 billion in tax subsidies such as refundable investment tax credits and various depreciation allowances—but only to further the reindustrialization goal.

IT WOULD include an "anti-pirating" safeguard so that federal aid would not be misused to subsidize the moving of production and jobs from one part of the country to another, plus Davis-Bacon Act safeguards.

At House Ways & Means Committee hearings last month, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland protested that the Administration plan would feed inflation and reduce the nation's public resources by giving "huge benefits" to already prosperous firms without any assurance added revenues will go to productive investment.

The added cash flow to business, he said, could just as easily be used "to buy up other companies" or to finance "relocations that destroy jobs and blight local communities."

UNION ORGANIZERS sharpened their skills during a three-week session at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies conducted in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services. Leading the group discussions in this class is Dick Wilson of the federation's organizing staff. Twelve unions sent organizers.

Organizers Hone Techniques at Studies Center

Organizers from 11 AFL-CIO affiliates and the Auto Workers have completed three weeks of advanced training at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The institute sought to develop new, more effective methods of educating unorganized workers and helping them form unions and win recognition in the face of strong opposition from employers and the growing use of union-busting consultants.

The class in advanced organizing techniques drew 25 experienced organizers assigned to participate by their international unions and two AFL-CIO staff organizers.

CO-SPONSORED by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services and the studies center, the class used as a learning device a detailed case history of an actual organizing campaign that took three years. Participants then wrote case histories based on their own experiences and detailed crucial events in the campaigns.

The class heard presentations on successful organizing techniques for organizing developed by the Mike Lucas of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Jack Howar of the Steelworkers, Richard Rothstein of the Clothing & Textile Workers, Michael Wood of the Boilermakers, Jeff Fiedler of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. and Robert Muehlenkamp of the National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees, Local 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

KATHY KRIEGER, assistant general counsel for the Carpenters, discussed National Labor Relations Board procedures and approaches in dealing with the board.

Instructors included William Roehl and Dick Wilson of the AFL-CIO organizing staff, and Russell Allen, Harry Millstone, Marjorie Rachlin and Gordon Cole of the Meany Center.

Randolph Memorial Fund Launched to Sustain Institute

New York—Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, has announced the establishment of an A. Philip Randolph Memorial Fund. Hill said the fund will serve to "keep alive the legacy of Mr. Randolph and to ensure that the organization which bears his name is able to successfully sustain and expand its work in the struggle for social justice."

The Randolph Memorial Fund will seek support for Randolph Institute activities in the areas of black voter participation, community affairs, and trade union involvement. It will solicit both individual and organizational support from sponsors who will be awarded certificates of participation in return for their financial contributions, Hill said.

FUND-RAISING activity will focus initially on generating support from the thousands of union locals whose members actively participate in the Randolph Institute.

Establishment of the memorial fund was announced Apr. 15 on what would have been Randolph's 92nd birthday. He helped to create the institute while serving as president of the Sleeping Car Porters and as an AFL-CIO vice president.

"We can think of no more appropriate commemoration of Mr. Randolph's birthday than the establishment of a fund which will continue to promote increased black participation in the labor movement," Hill stated.

The A. Philip Randolph Institute is composed of some 18,000 trade unionists organized in more than 150 affiliates in 36 states and the District of Columbia. The institute carries on a trade union intern program which trains blacks to assume leadership positions in the labor movement, publishes a bimonthly newsletter, sponsors an occupational safety and health program and conducts voter participation campaigns in electon years.

Contributions to the fund may be sent to the A. Philip Randolph Memorial Fund, 260 Park Avenue South, New York, N.Y. 10010.

Congress Urged to Reverse Cuts in Low-Income Housing

Low-income housing programs should be expanded, not cut back, the AFL-CIO urged at hearings held by a subcommittee of the House Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs Committee.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, was sharply critical of Administration proposals to reduce already inadequate program levels.

THE ADMINISTRATION has asked Congress to rescind existing budget authority so as to reduce the number of low-income rental units that could be supported in the present fiscal year from 255,000 to 210,000, and to cut the fiscal 1982 funding level from 260,000 to 175,000 units.

Schechter urged the panel to reject any cut in current budget authority. A bill by Subcommittee Chairman Henry Gonzalez (D-Tex.) to support 250,000 units in fiscal 1982 is "a welcome step forward" from the Administration position, he said, but a 300,000 figure would be more adequate.

The housing shortage has inflated home prices and rents, Schechter said, causing "hardship to families of limited income" who can't afford high-priced homes and see rental units converted to expensive condominiums. About 1.5 million families are living doubled up with other households, he noted.

The AFL-CIO statement welcomed a section of the Gonzalez bill dealing with rural housing programs as "a substantial improvement over the Administration proposals."

Schechter also applauded Gonzalez for not going along with the Administration's budget proposal that would require tenants of subsidized housing to pay 30 percent of their income instead of the current 25 percent.

"THIS WOULD directly affect the poor who are least able to cope with today's high prices," he said. "It would also create more rent collection and management problems in subsidized housing projects."

Schechter welcomed support in the Gonzalez bill for the Community Development Block Grant and Urban Development Action Grant programs. They are essential to improvements in public facilities that are needed to support private economic development in areas suffering from high unemployment, he testified.

Right-Wing TV Blitz Aims At Foes of Budget Slashes

The National Conservative Political Action Committee, which pumped huge sums into "negative campaigns" against liberal Democratic senators in the last election, has announced a new "hit list."

The right-wing group says it has budgeted $1 million for television commercials against Democratic critics of President Reagan's economic programs.

Its two chief targets are House Majority Leader Jim Wright of Texas, who will face a $450,000 media attack, and Sen. Paul Sarbanes of Maryland, the target of a $400,000 negative advertising budget.

Sarbanes, who will be up for re-election next year, voted against the budget reconciliation bill that included the Reagan Administration program cuts, and one of the television commercials scheduled to be shown features the disapproving reaction of a professional actor outfitted as a construction worker.

Also targeted are House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenknowski of Illinois, whose tax cut proposal differs somewhat from that of the Administration, and House Budget Committee Chairman Jim Jones of Oklahoma who, ironically, has generally voted with the conservative wing of the party. But he, too, declined to rubber stamp Reagan's proposals.

Kirkland Urges Policy

Free Association Seen As Test of Human Rights

New York—The right to freedom of association should be made the cornerstone of America's human-rights policy abroad, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared in a speech here.

"Freedom of association should be openly and forcefully promoted through appropriate instruments and avenues," said Kirkland, "and that should constitute the essential vehicle of social progress and the vital shielding and humanizing force between men and master.

"INDEPENDENT association is the means by which plain people gain and assert their rights as against the state and other strongholds of raw power in human society."

Kirkland's remarks followed the International Rescue Committee's 1981 Freedom Award presentation by IRC Chairman Leo Cherne to the AFL-CIO president and his wife, Irena, for their contributions toward relieving the plight of the world's refugees and to the cause of human freedom.

The award cited Kirkland's leadership and achievements over many years in behalf of refugees escaping from political, religious, and racial oppression. Mrs. Kirkland, herself a refugee from Czechoslovakia, has had a significant role in support of the refugee cause. Past Freedom Award recipients include Winston Churchhill, Gen. Lucius Clay, David Dubinsky, Hubert H. Humphrey, Gen. William B. Donovan, Jacob K. Javits, and Kirkland's predecessor as AFL-CIO president, George Meany.

KIRKLAND NOTED that there is a debate in America today as to the role of government in the assertion abroad of policies in support of human rights—whether such a course should be pursued at all, or more consistently and forcefully, or simply abandoned. Neither the past nor present government posture has properly addressed the issue, he said.

"The presence, absence or degree of freedom of association in a particular society should override considerations of whether one scoundrel or clique in control of the reins of state ought to be replaced by another scoundrel or clique," Kirkland declared.

He noted that there is a more than ample legal basis for the aggressive pursuit of such a policy and practice, and "ILO Convention No. 87 on freedom of association provides its most concrete and detailed expression."

THE WORKERS in Poland who struck last summer over rising meat prices sought to associate freely in trade unions that were genuinely responsive to their needs and grievances, Kirkland pointed out.

"They are pursuing their version of an old biblical instruction: 'Render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's, and unto labor that which is labor's,' " he said.

"That demand, to which the government of Poland committed itself as an obligation subject to international scrutiny when it ratified ILO Convention No. 87, and affirmed by written agreement with Solidarity last August, is the ultimate test of whether it is or ever will be possible to humanize a communist state."

ACKNOWLEDGING the odds and risks facing Solidarity, the new Polish independent labor federation, Kirkland said the American labor movement would "certainly not compound their risks or raise the odds by any failure on our part to meet their stated needs."

"For if Solidarity endures and thrives the world will never be the same again, and that will be for the good of all. The abstract delusive question of the ownership of the tools of production will be disengaged, as it should be, from the overriding issue of human freedom."

Kirkland rejected any suggestion that the AFL-CIO's open assistance to Solidarity, in the form of its Polish Workers Aid Fund, has been "provocative"—a term used in the recent past both in the United States and widely repeated by communist news organs.

As for communist charges that the AFL-CIO's support of Solidarity constitutes "outside interference," Kirkland said that "it comes with a singular lack of grace or proportion for a regime that has placed its people in thrall, not just to Eastern power, but to Western capital, for the sake of over $25 billion in bank loans, to denounce as 'interference' a relative pittance of aid, with no strings attached, by Western labor to our Polish brothers and sisters."

IN HER REMARKS, Mrs. Kirkland said that she accepted the award in behalf of the "nameless millions" who have died as a result of tyranny. Imprisoned during both Nazi and Soviet occupation of her native Czechoslovakia, Mrs. Kirkland told of those experiences.

"I plead guilty to that for which I was condemned by one regime: the offense of being Jewish. I was, and am, certainly guilty of that for which I was denounced and arrested by another: the offense of holding and expressing opinions of my own.

"One offense is an accident of birth; the other is simply human. Neither is in itself worthy of exceptional note. I am merely luckier than most such offenders of my time in finding a life where neither offense is a mortal crime, within reach of an all-powerful state."

Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol Chaikin, who co-chaired the award presentation with Ralph A. Pfeiffer, Jr., chairman of IBM World Trade Americas/Far East Corp., spoke of the American labor movement's dedication and devotion to the drive for the full fruition of human rights.

Postal Unions Blast Move To Stall New Contract Talks

The Letter Carriers and the Postal Workers charged Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger with "contempt for the collective bargaining process" in his 11th hour petition to the National Labor Relations Board for a new bargaining unit determination before contract negotiations begin.

Formal talks between the U.S. Postal Service and the unions representing its workers were scheduled to start Apr. 22, and Postal Workers President Moe Biller and NALC President Vincent Sombrotto said they will show up at the designated time in any event.

AT A JOINT news conference, Biller and Sombrotto said that the management action "is designed to delay bargaining for months, if not years" and represents "a breach of faith" with union members who have been anticipating wage increases and other improvements in a contract that would have been effective on July 21.

They also protested the Postmaster General's action in sending letters to some 600,000 postal employees telling them of his decision to seek a bargaining unit determination and delay contract negotiations before even notifying the unions directly involved.

The NALC and the Letter Carriers, which together represent the large majority of postal employees, had served notice of their intention to engage in joint bargaining. The two other unions with bargaining rights in the postal service, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, had agreed to coordinate their bargaining.

BOLGER INSISTED in his letter that such a bargaining structure is unworkable and said "animosities" between the two bargaining groups "reduce the possibility of reaching sound agreements."

Sombrotto and Biller retorted that the Rural Letter Carriers had bargained separately during the last contract negotiations, three years ago, and that both public and private employers have regularly bargained with a number of unions representing different groups of employers.

They charged that the postmaster general's action had "severely damaged labor-management relations" and termed it "the most deceitful act in the 10-year history of postal collective bargaining."

GE Slapped for Subtle Anti-Union Tactics

The National Labor Relations Board upheld the findings of an NLRB administrative law judge that General Electric Co. unlawfully used subtle questioning of employees, surveying of worker attitudes, and other computer-age tactics to defeat the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in a Winchester, Va., organizing campaign.

The board declared the results of a 1979 representation election at the GE plant in Winchester invalid, and ordered that a second election be held.

IUE SEC.-TREAS. William H. Bywater, who also serves as the union's organization director, called the NLRB decision "an important victory, the significance of which goes beyond IUE and the particular plant involved."

"The NLRB set a significant precedent for attacking the kind of sophisticated psychological tactics which are being used increasingly by GE and other corporations in antiunion campaigns," Bywater said. "This decision takes away one of the tools promoted by slick union-busting consultants."

In upholding the decision of its administrative law judge, Marvin Roth, the three-member NLRB panel headed by Chairman John H. Fanning said GE committed unfair labor practices through: conducting an employee attitude survey and establishing an employee-management "sounding board" to deal with "problems" identified in the survey; urging employees to report on the union activities of others; surveillance of a union meeting; coercive interrogation of employees; disciplining an employee for "talking union" on the job to a fellow worker, and repeatedly threatening to take away a so-called open-door policy and other access to management if the union won the election.

THE BOARD agreed with Roth that the company supervisors were "well trained in the uses of industrial psychology" and that, because of their training, they were unlikely to violate the law by asking employees "point blank" about their union sympathies and activities. Instead, they "systematically talked to employees" in ways "carefully calculated to draw out a spontaneous response" showing sentiment for or against the union. Roth and the board agreed that this devious computer-age approach was also illegal.

The attitude survey and sounding board idea were part of GE's unlawful strategy "to discourage support for the union," Roth found.

After the IUE filed for an election, the company said it would have to "discontinue plans of implementing the employee sounding board." The company blamed the union for causing it to take this action to avoid "possible legal implications."

The board agreed with Roth that not only was establishment of the sounding board plan illegal, but discontinuance of it also was an unfair labor practice designed to discourage union support.

HOWEVER, the NLRB panel overruled Roth's order that the sounding board be reinstated, calling it "in large part responsible for destroying the laboratory conditions" at the time of the election.

The election, held Nov. 16, 1979, resulted in a vote of 96 for IUE to 138 for "no union" among 239 workers eligible to cast ballots.

Vol. XXVI — Saturday, April 25, 1981 — 3 — No. 17

Inflation Rate Slows but Pay Lag Persists

The pace of inflation eased somewhat in March, temporarily stemming the erosion of worker paychecks. But despite a one-month improvement, the "real earnings" of America's workers continued to lag substantially below the same period a year ago.

Energy prices continue to be a pacesetter in the key inflation index for urban wage earners and clerical workers.

THE 2.3 PERCENT March increase in gasoline prices and a 2.7 percent rise in fuel oil prices followed the even bigger price jumps of January and February, when the impact of President Reagan's oil decontrol actions hit the marketplace.

Rebates given by auto manufacturers cut new car prices and helped hold the March price rise to six-tenths of 1 percent, a compounded annual rate of 7.5 percent. The March index was 10.5 percent higher than a year ago.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said the month-to-month fluctuation in the cost-of-living index "clearly belies the notion that the inflation rate is related to changes in the federal budget deficit."

THE "PRIME MOVERS of the inflation index," Oswald stressed, are specific non-budget factors affecting energy, food and housing.

Real spendable earnings—the after-inflation buying power of average weekly pay after social security and federal income taxes have been deducted—moved up three-tenths of 1 percent in March, ending three months of sharp declines.

But over the year—the 12 months since March 1980—the buying power of take-home pay was down 3.1 percent.

THE ONE-MONTH improvement in real spendable earnings was helped by an increase of three-tenths of 1 percent in average weekly hours. There was no change in hours worked from a year ago.

On an hourly basis, in constant dollars, purchasing power moved up two-tenths of 1 percent from February to March, but lagged 1 percent below a year ago.

In the price index, food and beverages were up a relatively modest four-tenths of 1 percent, after having risen only two-tenths of 1 percent in February and having gone down two-tenths of 1 percent in January.

Oswald said it is likely that both food and housing costs will move up at a faster rate in the months ahead.

Increases in women's and girls' clothing were largely responsible for a rise of seven-tenths of 1 percent in apparel costs.

MEDICAL CARE took a 1-percent jump, continuing in the double-digit inflation pace.

For the first three months of this year, the seasonally adjusted annual inflation

Budget for City Family Soars 12.8% Over Year

POSTAL UNION NEGOTIATORS face empty chairs at the bargaining table as the Postal Service management representatives boycotted the opening session of contract talks with the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers. $23,134 Cost Of Moderate Living Level

By James M. Shevis

The government's hypothetical budget for a typical American family last year soared to $23,134, a 12.8 percent increase in 12 months, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The figure represents the before-tax income that an urban family of four needed last autumn just to maintain a middle-level standard of living. A similar family living at a lower, more austere level would have required $14,044, and a family on a higher budget affording a few luxuries would have needed $34,409. The amounts are nationwide averages, and were higher or lower depending on geography.

THE LOW BUDGET was 11.6 percent higher than a year earlier, while the higher budget was 13.5 percent above the comparable 1979 figure. The percentage jumps for all three budget levels were the largest increases since 1974, BLS said.

BLS prepares the budgets by updating changes in prices of various goods and services for a precisely defined urban family in each of the three budget categories. The budget levels reflect item costs as of last October.

If brought up to the present time, by allowing for inflation since last fall, the budget totals would be even higher. AFL-CIO Economist Anne Draper calculates that consumer price increases from last October through March of this year, plus higher social security taxes since Jan. 1 and more federal income taxes that would result from a higher gross pay, would mean that the middle-level living standard for families would require $24,461 today. Those on the lower budget would now need $14,831, while families at the upper level would require $36,760 today.

OSHA Backs Down

Administration Assailed On Lead Safety Retreat

By John R. Oravec

The Reagan Administration has widened its campaign to hold up worker protections under the federal job safety law by attempting to persuade the Supreme Court to vacate an appeals court decision upholding the lead standard.

Pursuing the same approach the Occupational Safety & Health Administration took on the cotton dust standard late last month, the government has now asked the high court to put off consideration of an appeal on the lead exposure regulation and to remand the rulemaking record to OSHA so that the standard can be amended.

Like the cotton dust standard, the 1978 lead exposure standard has been the target of employer groups challenging provisions for engineering controls and work practices that would sharply reduce worker exposure to hazardous substances.

IN ANNOUNCING the OSHA action, Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter said he wants to submit the lead standard to a cost-benefit analysis and re-examine virtually all provisions of the regulation.

George H. R. Taylor, the federation's job safety director, said that "organized labor will oppose those and all other efforts to emasculate the requirement of the OSHA act that standards dealing with toxic substances be such that no employee suffer impairment of health or capacity to function during the entire period of his working life."

Medical studies show that lead poisoning, resulting from high levels of exposure to the metal, can result in anemia, kidney failure, nervous system disorders, brain damage and death. More than 800,000 U.S. workers in some 40 industries are exposed to lead on the job.

Auchter acknowledged in announcing the recall of the standard that "lead is

Budget Slashers Recruit Conservative Democrats

By David L. Perlman

The Reagan Administration is looking to conservative Democrats for the votes it needs to get its drastic budget slashes approved by the House.

Its new strategy is to pin a bipartisan label on a slightly reshuffled version of the President's program that has been cosponsored by Rep. Delbert L. Latta (Ohio), the ranking Republican on the House Budget Committee, and Democrat Phil Gramm (Tex.), who has voted against labor's position on 85 percent of COPE-rated issues during his tenure in Congress.

THE WHITE HOUSE refers to the Latta-Gramm measure as "the Reagan bipartisan budget bill." Office of Management & Budget Director David A. Stockman described it as "the Administration's program with a few wrinkles." And a White House press official told reporters it will "give us well over 100 percent of what we asked for" in spending cuts.

The Administration wants to get its bill passed as a substitute for the less extreme measure drawn up by the House Budget Committee.

The committee bill would give the President about 75 percent of the cutbacks he has sought, which labor and its allies insist would badly shortchange the nation's needs.

A labor-led Budget Coalition has been using the Easter recess for home-district meetings with House members to urge higher funding levels than the Budget Committee proposed.

ON APR. 28, after Congress reconvenes, the Rules Committee is expected to specify the amendments that can be considered when the bill comes to the House floor later that week.

Before voting on the committee bill,

Reagan Program To Lower Income For 20 Million

The Reagan Administration's proposed budget would compel more than half of the nation's low-income households to reduce their living standards, according to a Congressional Budget Office study.

A "partial estimate" of the budget's impact on the poor and the near-poor was made by the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office at the request of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and House Budget Committee Chairman James R. Jones (D-Okla.).

THE STUDY FOUND that about 51 percent of all low-income households, comprising an estimated 20 million to 25 million people including children and the elderly, would have less to live on as a result of cuts in 10 major assistance and employment programs.

But the CBO said its analysis dealt

Cement Union Sees New Pact Fixing Pattern

St. Louis—The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers won wage increases totaling 32 percent over three years and major pension improvements in a tentative contract renewal agreement with Lone Star Industries Inc., that is expected to set a pattern for some 17,000 American cement workers in the next few weeks.

The settlement with Lone Star, the nation's largest producer of portland cement, ready-mixed concrete, sand and gravel, covers some 1,300 workers represented by the CLGW at the firm's 12 U.S. facilities. The company, based in Greenwich, Conn., produces about 9 percent of the country's cement.

Worked out in weeklong talks here, the Lone Star agreement would increase wages by 65 cents an hour across the board on May 1. The hourly rate will go up by 20 cents more on Nov. 1, by 55 cents on May 1, 1982, and another 50 cents on May 1, 1983.

In addition, the pact provides for a cost-of-living adjustment up to 12 percent as measured by the consumer price index and for increases in the CPI exceeding 14 percent. Increases between the 12 and 14 percent "corridor" are not covered.

Among other benefits, the pension factor that determines monthly benefits will rise $1 a year during the contract, reaching $20.50 for each year of credited service for normal retirement as of May 1, 1983, and $21.50 for disability retirement on that date. This will mean a monthly pension of $717.50 for a 35-year retiree, CLGW President Thomas F. Miechur pointed out.

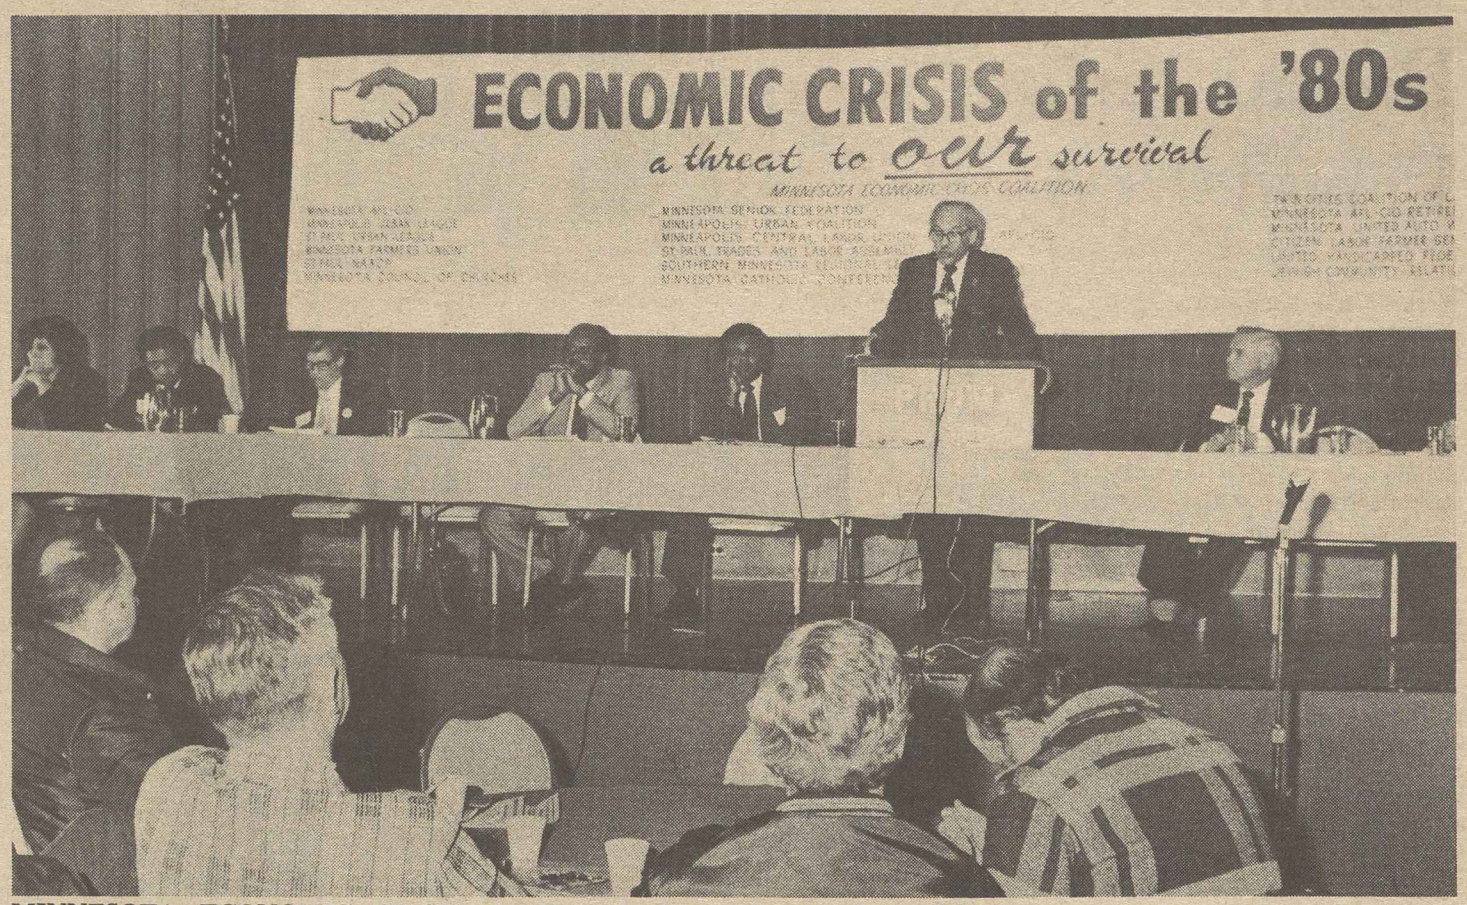
Other contract provisions include insurance and medical-benefit improvements such as an annual dental-coverage maximum of $1,500 in 1983, replacement of artificial limbs under major-medical coverage, and increased major-medical benefits for future retirees up to $7,500.

The agreement, which must be ratified by the workers involved, will replace a contract due to expire at the end of April.

Collins Succeeds Hilbert as Head Of Dispatchers

Berwyn, Ill.—Dan E. Collins, secretary-treasurer of the Train Dispatchers since 1971, has been elected by the union's joint board to succeed B. C. (Barney) Hilbert as president.

Collins, 53, will assume his new post on May 1. Hilbert, 60, has headed the ADTA since 1976.



Hilbert, in a retirement message to the board, said that he and his wife plan to return to the Pacific Northwest area. His railroad career has spanned 35 years, nearly evenly divided between active railroad service and full-time union work.

Collins began his railroad career in 1943 as a telegraph operator on the Louisville & Nashville. In 1945, he switched to the St. Louis Terminal Railroad. After two years of service in the Navy, he returned to St. Louis, where he worked as a train dispatcher.

In 1963, Collins organized the dispatchers on the Terminal. He subsequently became a member of the ADTA board of trustees, assistant treasurer and general chairman, before becoming secretary-treasurer.

Other new officers chosen by the union's nine-member joint board were J. P. Erickson, ADTA vice president who will succeed Collins as secretary-treasurer; M. H. Kassera, senior trustee, who will become a vice president succeeding Erickson, and T. H. Eshelman, vice general chairman on the Santa Fe Railway who will become the new trustee.

All will serve from May 1 through October 1983, when the union will elect officers at its convention.

MINNESOTA ECONOMIC CRISIS Coalition attacked Reagan cutbacks in social programs at an all-day conference in St. Paul. Above, Alexander Allen, director of programs for the National Urban League, charges that budget cuts such as gutting of CETA job programs are actually a noose-tightening around the necks of the poor.

Minnesota Coalition Warns Needy Will Bear Brunt of Program Cuts

St. Paul, Minn.—A statewide coalition of civic, labor, consumer and other groups warned that reductions in essential social services proposed by the Reagan Administration and by Minnesota Gov. Albert H. Quie will only serve to wear the social fabric thinner for the poor, the jobless, and the elderly.

David Roe, co-chairman of the Minnesota Economic Crisis Coalition, charged that the "divide and conquer strategy" that lies behind the cuts will pit one group against another for scarce funds.

ROE, WHO is president of the Minnesota AFL-CIO, said the nation is sliding back to the discredited economic theory where "you take care of the rich and large corporations and think that prosperity will somehow trickle down to the people."

But it doesn't work that way; the people only get shortchanged, he observed.

Roe said he fears that the combined effect of reductions in state social services proposed by Quie and federal cutbacks in funding will force cities in Minnesota to drop some essential services and fund others by raising property taxes as much as 100 percent in the next few years.

THE DAY-LONG conference was addressed by more than a dozen speakers from state, local, and national organizations. The Minnesota coalition is a state counterpart of the national Budget Coalition formed earlier this year under the leadership of the AFL-CIO. It is seeking to mobilize public opinion against harsh federal and state budget cuts.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, in addressing the conference, accused federal budget director David Stockman of shortcircuiting the budget process. Oswald stressed that balancing the federal budget would reduce the nation's inflation rate by less than half of one percent. Furthermore, he said, the federal budget deficit is a symptom of economic adversity, not the cause.

Oswald emphasized that the AFL-CIO is not against a balanced budget as such, but he said expansion of the economy is the more desirable route to follow, not reductions in social programs. Each one-percentage point reduction in the jobless rate would cut the federal deficit by $30 billion, he pointed out.

THE FEDERATION estimates that the Reagan budget cuts would cause the loss of more than 1.25 million jobs in the 1982 fiscal year, while the President's tax plan would give $12 in tax cuts to wealthy individuals for every dollar the average wage earner receives.

Alexander Allen, director of programs for the National Urban League, vowed that the battle over the budget is far from over. He called for the rejuvenation of the New Deal coalition of Franklin Roosevelt's day.

Besides the National Urban League's St. Paul and Minnesota chapters and the Minnesota AFL-CIO, the coalition includes branches of the Farmers Union, Council of Churches, Catholic Conference, United Handicapped Federation, Jewish Community Relations Council, Southern Minnesota Regional Legal Services, the UAW, Minnesota AFL-CIO Retirees Chapters, Coalition of Labor Union Women, St. Paul and Minneapolis AFL-CIO central bodies, NAACP, Urban Coalition, and the Citizen/Labor/Farmer/Senior Energy Coalition.

ALAN KISTLER, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, said that the proven job programs being eliminated by the Reagan Administration provide increased tax revenues that more than compensate for federal funding of the programs. He said that the Human Resources Development Institute—the federation's manpower arm—has found work in each of the last 10 years for 12,000 disadvantaged persons and has developed 20,000 jobs.

Kistler said he wondered about the reaction to the budget cuts by the 340,000 public service workers whose jobs would be eliminated, the 200,000 young people who would not get jobs, and the disabled persons who would not be helped by a scaled-back vocational rehabilitation program.

"During the last major recession in 1975, those public service employment programs helped cushion the effect of the economic downturn," he said. "It just seems shortsighted now to give them the ax when the economy is in such an uncertain condition and unemployment is still above 7 percent."

ELECTED OFFICIALS in the Twin Cities metropolitan area also lambasted proposed reductions in government programs. St. Paul Mayor George Latimer attacked Reagan's lack of interest in energy conservation as reflected by the President's decision to shrink funding for weatherization of homes and district heating projects.

Minneapolis Mayor Don Fraser pointed out that while aid to cities contained in various federal programs amounted to 14 percent of the present budget, two-thirds of Reagan's budget cuts would be concentrated in those programs. Fraser said that more meetings like the one sponsored by the Minnesota Economic Crisis Coalition are needed to see that government "functions with compassion."

Continued Start-Up Funding Urged for Group Health Units

Health maintenance organizations (HMOs) should continue to receive federal encouragement and start-up aid, the AFL-CIO urged in a statement submitted to the subcommittee on health of the House Energy & Commerce Committee.

The Health Maintenance Act expires this year and the subcommittee is considering bills to continue the program for three more years with various changes.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE Director Ray Denison said non-profit HMOs that are in the process of being formed should continue to be eligible for federal planning and development grants, and for loans to cover operational deficits in early stages.

In this respect, he said, the AFL-CIO prefers the bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) to a measure by Rep. Edward R. Madigan (R-Ill.) that would end the grant program immediately. But some other features of the Madigan bill are desirable and should be incorporated into the final measure, Denison said. The bills were analyzed by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

The AFL-CIO statement opposed a provision in both bills that would eliminate the present requirement that at least one-third of the members of the governing boards must be subscribers to the plan—the consumers of the health services.

Denison urged continuation of the present requirement for HMOs to use community rating systems to set charges. He also asked continuation of the present preference in federal assistance to HMOs that operate in "medically underserved areas."

The AFL-CIO statement strongly supported the existing procedure for federal certification of HMOs as a prerequisite to being offered to workers by employers as one of the health insurance options.

Management Missing

Postal Union Negotiators Faced by Empty Chairs

Joint bargaining efforts of the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers for a new contract with the Postal Service broke off before talks got started when management representatives failed to show up for the scheduled opening session.

After facing empty chairs at the bargaining table for nearly a half-hour, Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto and Postal Workers President Moe Biller issued a joint statement:

"IT HAS NOW become clear that the U.S. Postal Service will not be in attendance at this collective bargaining session."

They said management's failure to appear at the previously agreed upon Apr. 22 meeting "is a violation of the Postal Service's legal duty to bargain collectively with duly authorized representatives of its employees."

The APWU and NALC represent about 500,000 of the nation's 600,000 postal workers whose current three-year contracts expire July 20. Separate talks also had been scheduled by the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, which represent some 100,000 Postal Service employees.

SOMBROTTO AND Biller charged that Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger was torpedoing the negotiations by his announcement a week earlier that he would not bargain until the National Labor Relations Board acts on his petition to determine a new bargaining unit in the Postal Service.

"We have already notified the Postmaster General and the board that we consider this petition to be without legal foundation," Sombrotto and Biller said.

"We have asked the board to dismiss the petition immediately to prevent the service from further interrupting the collective bargaining process."

A COUNTER-PETITION filed by the two unions with the NLRB states that Bolger's petition did not meet the board's time limitation for filing and that its intent was "in bad faith to impede and delay negotiations."

The NLRB has set a hearing for Apr. 30 on the issue.

The unions reported that they were subsequently notified by Bolger that the Postal Service would not attend any future bargaining sessions until the NLRB responds to its petition, but that it would be available May 4 to discuss extensions to the existing agreements.

To that proposal, James J. LaPenta of Mail Handlers said, "we're not buying that."

He pointed out that the Postal Reorganization Act which established the USPS carries no provision for the extension of contracts as a substitute for collective bargaining. He noted that the law clearly provides for a specified time frame for negotiations in relations to the expiration of the contracts which Bolger is ignoring.

LaPenta also said the Mail Handlers, like the NALC and the APWU, will be challenging Bolger's position at the NLRB hearings.

THE UNIONS had considered an option of filing an unfair labor practice charge against the Postal Service for refusal to bargain, but said that action would not be initiated at this time.

Key contract goals outlined earlier by Biller include catch-up wages to restore lost purchasing power over the last three years, job security and improvements in job safety.

IMAGES OF LABOR, an exhibition of 32 original works by major American artists on themes from the lives of workers, debuted Apr. 15 at New York's Gallery 1199. The unique show is part of the "Bread and Roses" cultural project organized by District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. The exhibition will later travel to Washington's Smithsonian Institution as part of a two-year national tour. Shown with the sculpture called "Mother Mary Jones" by Ed McGowin are, from left, District 1199 Executive Sec. Moe Foner, artist Benny Andrews, actor Ossie Davis, poet Eve Merriam, and Harry Van Arsdale, president of the New York City AFL-CIO.

OSHA Assailed for Retreat On Lead Exposure Standard

a serious industrial hazard against which workers must be protected." He noted that many provisions of the standard are already in effect and would remain so during the agency's review.

The lead standard, which was issued Nov. 14, 1978, and went into effect Feb. 1, 1979, is designed ultimately to limit worker exposure to 50 micrograms of lead per cubic meter of air averaged over an eight-hour shift. The previous limit was 200 micrograms per cubic meter of air.

To ease the economic impact on industry, the Carter Administration provided for a 10-year phase-in—allowing some industries to reduce exposure levels gradually to 100 micrograms and eventually to 50.

IN EARLY stages, the exposure limits could be achieved through the use of respirators by workers. In later stages, the limits would have to be achieved solely through engineering and work practice controls.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld the standard last August, rejecting the industry challenge. Last December, the Supreme Court stayed certain parts of the standard dealing with engineering and work practice controls pending an industry appeal, but it refused to delay implementation of a rule requiring employers to transfer workers who develop high levels of lead in their blood to other jobs without reduction in pay, seniority or other benefits.

However, when a new "trigger level" was to take effect Mar. 1 providing for medical removal after a worker's lead absorption reached 60 micrograms per 100 grams of blood, OSHA responded to an industry request for a one-year delay by pushing back the effective date to Apr. 1. Auchter has since ordered the delay extended to May 1.

AUCHTER SAID the review of the lead standard would be made under a Feb. 17 presidenital order to assess the costs and benefits of all major regulations.

Despite the extensive hearings that OSHA conducted in the mid-1970s on the proposed lead standard, Auchter contended that "the original rulemaking record was lacking in many respects." He insisted that "the public had no chance to comment directly on the feasibility of the 50-microgram limit in some industries."

During the hearings, unions produced testimony supporting both the technological and economic feasibility of a 40-microgram exposure limit.

Labor Educators Explore New Teaching Techniques

San Francisco—New techniques that can help labor educators accomplish basic educational goals were explored in detail at the AFL-CIO's annual education conference here.

Workshops at the meeting emphasized methods for planning education programs for groups within the labor movement with different needs and interests and on innovative techniques for teaching such union skills such as organizing, bargaining and servicing to union members, officers and staff.

THE WEEK-LONG conference, which drew nearly 200 labor educators, was held jointly with the annual meeting of the University & College Labor Educators' Association.

AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields, who co-chaired the conference with UCLEA President Anne Nelson, called the renewal of interest in "basic labor education goals and grassroots education" coupled with new methods an appropriate theme in a year when organized labor is celebrating its centennial and planning its programs for the future.

In an example of how new approaches can be used, the conference featured a videotape address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue who talked about the goals and results of the recent series of AFL-CIO regional conferences.

Donahue explained the federation's policies and planned activities on a variety of issues of importance to labor. The videotape was followed by a live question and answer session between the participants and Donahue, who was in New York, by means of a telephone hook-up.

CONFERENCE workshops, many of which were conducted by education directors and staff from AFL-CIO unions, included discussions of successful methods for familiarizing new members and unorganized workers with unions and their functions as well as the development of local union education programs and programs aimed at the needs of women and minorities.

AMONG OTHER workshops were presentations geared to developing labor education plans for union officers and staff. These discussions included ways to improve skills for communication with members, using the resources available through universities and colleges, and gaining access to the media.

In a series of discussions highlighting the ways unions can solve problems by joint action, representatives of California labor, the AFL-CIO, youth organizations, senior citizens groups, and public interest organizations explained how they worked together to educate both union members and the public on vital issues.

Study Sees 20 Million Hurt by Reagan Cuts

with the impact of only $5.3 billion out of the $15.4 billion in benefit reductions required by the Reagan budget. Therefore, "it considerably understates the magnitude," the CBO said.

The reason for the limitation, the report said, is that the bulk of the Administration's cutbacks in assistance to the needy would be achieved by consolidating a number of federal programs into block grants to the states. While the total amount available would be reduced, the impact could not be measured without knowing how the states would allocate the federal block grants among many possible uses.

AMONG THE program cuts that were not measured by the CBO because of such uncertainties were low-income energy and housing assistance, Medicaid, unemployment insurance, trade adjustment assistance, and social security changes. Also excluded were the effects of "reductions in spending for programs in areas such as education and health, which tend to affect families with children but do not directly affect families' financial resources."

With about two-thirds of the funding cuts excluded from the computation, the CBO said most of the income losses to the poor and the near-poor would be less than 5 percent. But some 649,000 families receiving help from more than one program would suffer an average income loss of 19 percent.

Within the limited budget cuts counted for the study, families with children headed by nonwhite women would be most likely to be affected, the CBO said.

THE STUDY covered families with incomes below the poverty level and up to 50 percent above the poverty level.

It took note of the fact that some of the working poor would have increased take-home pay if Congress enacted the Administration's proposals for cutting personal income taxes.

But the impact of a tax cut would be received by the low-income population."

THE ARCHITECT of the Administration's budget, David A. Stockman, said the CBO study "demonstrates that the President's safety net is still intact" since most of the low-income families would not experience what he termed "a serious reduction in their spendable income."

Sen. Kennedy, however, came to a quite different conclusion. He said it is "ironic and tragic that an Administration which proclaims itself to be pro-family has given us an anti-family budget which will put even more pressure on the family structure of those already living at the economic margin."

The Issues of the '80s

TRADE UNIONISM, by its very nature and definition, requires a positive response to the question: "Am I my brother's keeper?"

From various quarters we are hearing that civil rights and human rights should be put on the back burner. Those voices do not speak for the American labor movement. They speak against the interests and the goals of workers and their unions—as well as against our allies among the civil rights and women's groups, the senior citizens, and all others who look to their government for justice.

The problem we face is clear to us all. The political friends of labor and its allies are out of power, and our opponents are in.

Nobody can accuse them of singling out any particular group to discriminate against. They are discriminating against everybody—except the truly rich and the most deserving corporations.

THEY CLAIM that their only goal is to cut back social programs that have failed or outlived their usefulness.

The programs we fought for did not fail. Teaching a youngster a trade he can take pride in and earn a living at is a triumph that brings benefits to the whole society.

Seeing to it that children get the food and medical attention they need to grow up able to compete and pay their way is the cheapest and best insurance we can buy for our future.

A whole generation of black youngsters has grown up without ever seeing the odious sign that says "No Negroes" or "Whites Only." Is that a failure? I say it is an advance for civilization.

Many of those youngsters will not now go to college because the Administration proposes to scotch the student loan program.

If you want to know what the civil rights issues of the 1980s are, look at the President's budget proposals.

They add up to an effort to reverse the social progress that has been won by legislative and economic action over the last 50 years.

ONE OF THE striking aspects of this assault is the frantic speed with which it is being carried out.

None of the programs being scuttled was created overnight. Most were considered and debated for years until action became unavoidable, and then for years more while Congress explored methods and funding levels.

Congress has not been asked or permitted to give the dismantling of these programs anything like the careful legislative deliberation that went into their creation. It has been asked to make, and in many cases already has made, drastic revisions in law without consideration or provision for millions of Americans who will be and are being injured in the process.

Some people have advised us to sit back and ride out the next few years. They tell us there's no point in resisting. They tell us the odds are against us—that it's a losing battle.

The labor movement isn't a game of chance. We have an obligation, a sacred trust, to do everything in our power to protect our people. We have a plain duty to do our best to head off the disasters we see in the making. And we intend to discharge that duty —win, lose, or draw.

Reagan Handout for Business Worthless Snake Oil Remedy

By Gus Tyler

IT'S "SNAKE OIL," says the Economist, in writing about President Reagan's proposed "investment incentives."

Coming from anyone else, that sort of snotty talk could just be brushed off. But the Economist is not just another publication: it is the highly prestigious British publication, of fundamentally conservative bent, read by policy makers around the world for its insights into global economic trends.

Hence, before this government rushes into this $165 billion giveaway to corporations that "provides work for bureaucrats, money for tax lawyers, and precious few benefits for anyone else" except puffed up profiteers, it might be well for our President and Congress—both Democrats and Republicans—to take a look at the Mar. 21 issue of the Economist.

DESPITE THE fact that just about everybody in Washington—liberal as well as conservative—is ready to embrace "incentives" as if they were motherhood or Dolly Parton, the Economist warns that "America may be about to follow Britain in finding out the hard way that accelerated depreciation has been oversold; that what gains it does bring are expensive; and that there are cheaper and more effective ways of increasing investment."

The big argument for swift write-offs is that this is a way to ease taxes for our overtaxed American corporations. But, says the Economist, "American companies are not over-taxed by international standards.

"A RECENT STUDY by accountants Price Waterhouse found that an investing company pays more tax in West Germany and Japan than in America. In West Germany the rule for most investments is straight-line depreciation over the asset's whole life, and in Japan the rules are almost as strict. Yet both countries devote a far larger share of gross domestic product to investment than America does." Britain "has the most generous depreciation rules" and little to show for it.

The cost to Uncle Sam over the next five years would be $165 billion. This multi-billion expenditure would be "an undisguised government handout for business and an inefficient carrot for boosting investment. Even at its present level, it often simply rewards investment that would have taken place anyway."

You don't get business to invest just by giving it a rebate on investments, says the Economist. "Investment booms arise mainly from an encouraging economic climate, not from accelerated depreciation schemes."

TO ENCOURAGE that "climate," the Economist recommends applying the giveaway money to "reducing the federal deficit" or to "lower interest rates."

But how can we expect such actions when the Federal Reserve Board is determined to check growth with its high interest rates and the Reagan Administration is about to increase—yes, increase —the federal debt, despite its savings at the expense of the poor, by giving away to corporations a sum equal to about a quarter of the federal budget?

Who Will Shoulder Society's Burdens?

During his campaign, President Reagan talked about getting government off the backs of the American people. That is how opponents of social progress usually describe their objectives.

Will the 340,000 men and women who will be laid off as a result of terminated CETA public service jobs programs breathe a sigh of relief at having government off their backs?

Will the 200,000 men and women who would have been helped by CETA programs to get jobs in private industry rejoice that there will be no federal intrusion into their lives?

What about the handicapped persons, some of them Vietnam veterans, who were being aided in the difficult task of moving from dependency to independence?

Will they appreciate the removal of the 'heavy hand' of government support?

Secretaries Look to Unions

Box of Candy No Compensation For Dead-End, Low-Pay Jobs

By Gloria Johnson

The following article is excerpted from Interface, the publication of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees. The author is director of Education & Women's Activities for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and treasurer of the Coalition of Labor Union Women.

THE AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, the National Commission on Working Women, and the Coalition of Labor Union Women, which formed an Ad Hoc Coalition for National Secretaries Week in 1980, seek to draw attention to the problems of unorganized white-collar working women during National Secretaries Week.

Secretaries are editors, writers, travel agents, conference organizers, typists, office managers, receptionists, and more. Unfortunately, they receive neither the recognition nor the wages they deserve.

During National Secretaries Week, bosses will take their secretaries out for expensive lunches, buy them boxes of candy or send them flowers.

But when the flowers wilt and the candy boxes are empty, those secretaries, all too often, will still be stuck in dead-end, low-paying jobs.

Today, 98.6 percent of all secretaries are women. They number 14.8 million. The myths describing them and their jobs are many and need to be destroyed before change can occur.

Some of these myths are contradictory in nature. For example: (1) Secretaries really are quite well paid. (2) Secretaries don't need to be well-paid because they only work for extra "pin money."

IN FACT, the average pay of a secretary is among the lowest in the country—less than the average wage for every kind of blue-collar work. Also, 1980 Labor Dept. statistics show that 75 percent of women work because of economic necessity, and not for "pin money."

Many of these women—many of these secretaries are heads of households with full financial responsibility—many of these secretaries are mothers of pre-school children—and many of them are among the millions of workers whose income often determines whether or not a family will or will not rise out of poverty.

Another myth is that secretaries remain in the same job year after year because they want to. The reality is that there is no career ladder for office workers.

Secretaries are hampered by another myth which says that there no longer is wage discrimination against office workers since passage of the Equal Pay Act of 1963.

Once again, the reality is somewhat different. Although the Equal Pay Act provides for "equal pay for equal work," that promise is an empty one if there are no men performing the equal work. Job segregation is so severe in the secretarial field that there simply is no man doing the same job in the next office to whom the underpaid secretary might compare herself.

IN ORDER for substantial changes to be made, secretaries must be recognized as professionals with rights.

They have the right to a comprehensive written job description which specifies their duties; they have a right to detailed information specifying the compensation, terms and benefits of their employment. They have the right to compensation for overtime work and work not included in their job description. They have the right to regular salary reviews and cost-of-living increases. They have the right to benefits and pay equal to those of men in similar job categories and the right to promotion opportunities and on-the-job training programs.

They have the right to organize into unions and bargain collectively to ensure that these rights are achieved.

SUCH DEMANDS are hardly revolutionary; in fact, they are taken for granted by large numbers in the workforce. They are basic and minimal rights which all workers have and which are essential protection against unfair treatment.

Today more and more women office workers are recognizing that organizing is the key to change. The clerical workers movement, consisting of grass roots groups, national organizations, and unions, has taken office workers' problems out of the realm of the isolated individual.

Such groups are building networks of working women in offices to win specific changes, and they are filing charges and pressing government agencies to enforce equal opportunity laws.

Their strategies include researching and documenting discriminatory practices, testifying before congresisonal committees and meeting with government officials, adopting resolutions and instituting programs to deal with special concerns of these women, and educating the public through the media about workplace discrimination, and developing training and upgrading programs.

Increasingly women are learning that it is only with the unions and the union contract that they have a formal, ongoing structure through which changes can be instituted—child care, pregnancy disability, pay equity, family sick leave—and which provide for job descriptions, grievance procedures, and wages which reflect the true value of the secretary's worth.

In Contract Talks

Restoration of Eroded Wages Major Goal of Postal Workers

THE POSTAL SERVICE can't hide behind the Administration's proposed budget cuts in subsidies to avoid agreement on a fair contract, President Moe Biller of the Postal Workers declared on Labor News Conference.

Biller pointed out that productivity of American postal workers jumped 5.5 percent last year as the volume of mail increased from 100 billion pieces to 106.5 billion, according to the Postmaster General's annual report. Biller also noted that mail volume over the decade is up sharply even though USPS has 75,000 fewer workers.

Biller stressed that inflation has seriously eroded wage rates negotiated three years ago. He said that in addition to a wage catch-up, job security and working conditions—especially job safety—will be among the top priorities in negotiations for a new contract.

Questioned by reporters, Biller pointed out that the limited cost-of-living protection that postal workers won in the arbitration award that settled the 1978 contract talks is based on a formula that falls short of maintaining the purchasing power of negotiated wage rates. He said postal workers have lost more than one-third of the national CPI increases over the term of the contract and are determined to guard against further erosion of purchasing power.

JOB SAFETY is "an intense issue" in the talks, Biller reported. Postal facilities have become "letter factories," he said, with "monster machines, a block long, some 20 feet high, with 20 people working on them."

He said the growing incidence of job-related injuries and deaths points up the need for stronger safety standards and stronger OSHA enforcement authority, including the right to make unannounced inspections of postal facilities. He said that while the union supports fully bipartisan bills now before Congress that would beef up OSHA's inspection and enforcement authority in the Postal Service, it would be much more effective to negotiate safety provisions into the contract.

"Congress can eliminate" legislated protections, he pointed out, but "when you bargain something, only you can give it away."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ASIDE FROM BASIC questions about the equity of the Reagan Administration's budget and tax program, a growing array of economists has been expressing grave doubts about whether the program, if enacted, will achieve its stated goals.

Robert J. Gordon, professor of economics at Northwestern University, says that "instead of the soaring output boom that the Reagan planners predict, and on which their budget assumptions are based, a more likely scenario is sluggish output growth, continued high unemployment, and large budget deficits."

THE CONGRESSIONAL Budget Office reports that the Administration's underestimation of future unemployment throws off its budget deficit estimates by tens of billions of dollars since the government would take in less tax revenue and spend more for unemployment compensation and other support programs.

Rather than the budget surplus by 1984 projected in the Administration's scenario, the result would be the nation's first budget deficit of more than $100 billion, predicts a study by the Democratic staff of the Joint Economic Committee (JEC) of Congress.

In addition to staggering deficits in the mid-1980s, says the JEC study, there would be little change in inflation, unemployment and high interest rates.

THE STUDY, said JEC Chairman Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), "just confirms common sense. Big tax cuts and super-tight money, in a time of rampant inflation and raging interest rates, is only a prescription for disaster."

Walter W. Heller, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, said that a tight money policy will not increase the money supply sufficiently to support the investment which the large tax cuts are supposed to spur. Heller said the result would be greater competition for scarce credit, further driving up interest rates.

"Tight credit and high interest rates are already stifling business investment and housing," Heller noted, adding: "A new twisting of the monetary noose could strangle them."

WHEN MONEY is tight, a labor economist noted, investment is more likely to occur "in high yield but high risk ventures unrelated to the needs of the economy," such as company takeovers, condominium conversions, gambling casinos and speculation in commodities.

While "supply-side economics" is often touted as a bold new approach to rescue the nation from the failures of old economic models, it bears a strong resemblance to the shop-worn "trickle-down" economics of past Republican administrations.

Indeed, Reuss said the current GOP program "almost exactly parallels the Harding-Coolidge 'Program for Economic Recovery' of the 1920s." Back then, he noted, taxes for the affluent were cut by more than two-thirds. Instead of investment, much of the savings "went into luxury consumption goods and speculative investment," Reuss said.

Also, the congressman pointed out, Harding-Coolidge budget cuts were accompanied by "regulatory reform, achieved by installing friends of regulated industries as the regulators."

"The redistribution of income away from the worker and farmer, and toward those at the top of the income scale," Reuss pointed out, "produced the bust" known as the Great Depression.

MORE RECENTLY, a program similar to the Administration's has been tried—in Great Britain. The results have been dismal. The tight money and social spending cuts imposed by the Conservative Thatcher government have produced the highest unemployment in Britain since the Depression. Business failures are epidemic. And inflation, the target of the policies, remains at double-digit levels.

As some critics put it, the Reagan program is a high-risk gamble, with workers and the poor taking the risks and the wealthy as the only sure winners.

TOP CONTRACT GOALS of the Postal Workers in scheduled negotiations with the Postal Service are catch-up wages, job security and improved safety, APWU President Moe Biller, center, said. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Jerome Cahill, left, of the New York Daily News and Jeff Mills of the Associated Press. The program is produced by the AFL-CIO as a public service and is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

PUBLIC CONCERT and sing-along session concluded a three-day Labor Songs and Labor Lore Institute at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. Songster Joe Glazer, right, leads the sing-along session. This year's institute drew participants from 16 unions.

Prepaid Group Health Care Held 'Best Buy' for Workers

Hershey, Pa.—Health maintenance organizations offer union members better care than conventional fee-for-service plans and unions should encourage their members to join them, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a conference on health care.

Seidman explained the federation's strong support for prepaid group practice health care "as the best buy for the medical care dollar" at a conference on Pennsylvania health maintenance organizations called by Gov. Richard Thornburgh.

PREPAID GROUPS, he said, provide higher quality and more efficient care. They select their doctors after rigorous screening, and physicians in health care centers work as teams to provide full review of each case.

Preventive health care and lifetime surveillance of health needs are also beneficial features of HMOs, Seidman pointed out, noting that the programs keep complete, readily available medical records.

HMOs are a factor in lower health care costs, Seidman told the conference of labor and business leaders, because they deliver all the phases of care, outpatient and hospital, directly to the patient.

"OVERALL COSTS for members, including both premiums and out-of-pocket costs, are 10 to 40 percent lower," Seidman pointed out. Because HMOs must provide care for the prepaid fee, they have an incentive to provide "necessary care in an appropriate setting" thus contributing to a lowering of hospital costs, he explained.

In addition, he said, the single prepaid fee removes barriers to receiving needed treatment since members "do not have the worry about the cost."

The AFL-CIO supported the 1976 amendments to the federal HMO law which give union bargaining agents the right to evaluate an HMO and decide whether to offer it to union members, but this was done only to protect the "integrity of the collective bargaining process," not to lessen the federation's support of HMOs, Seidman emphasized.

UNION MEMBERS should have the right to a choice between health care systems, he told the conference, stressing that the union should not be neutral if it believes an HMO is the best alternative for its members. Prepaid group plans also offer union members the opportunity to serve on their boards and influence policy, an advantage not possible in the fee-for-service sector, Seidman pointed out.

If prepaid group plans are to have an impact on the health care system in Pennsylvania, Seidman concluded, the groups must learn more about the needs and interests of unions and unions must learn more about the operations of HMOs.

Scholarship Fund Set in Memory Of Ruben Levin

A scholarship fund in memory of veteran labor editor Ruben Levin has been established by the Washington Area Friends of Histadrut.

The executive board of Labor newspaper, which Levin edited until his death in January 1981, announced at its spring meeting that it will contribute $2,500 to the fund which will provide an annual scholarship to an Israeli journalism student chosen by Histadrut, the general labor federation of Israel.

Labor is the national publication of 14 rail, airline and related transport unions.

The AFL-CIO International Labor Press Association and the Association of Railroad Editors have also said they will make contributions to the scholarship fund.

Levin, regarded by his colleagues as the dean of labor editors, joined Labor newsper in 1938 and became its editor in 1953. He was an active member of the Friends of Histadrut and a strong supporter of Israel.

Contributions are being accepted by Len Lurie, treasurer, Washington Area Friends of Histadrut, 1719 Ladd St., Wheaton, Md. 20902. Checks should be made payable to the Ruben Levin Scholarship Fund.

Inflation Rate Slows But Pay Lag Persists

rate has been 9.4 percent—or 10.5 percent without seasonal allowances.

The nation's 36 million social security beneficiaries will receive an 11.2 percent cost-of-living insrease in July as a result of year-to-year changes in the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers, a slightly different compilation. The social security rise reflects the inflation rate from the first quarter of 1980 to the first quarter of this year.

$23,134 for Middle Level

Budget for City Family Soars 12.8% Over Year

Most American families were far short of the middle-level standard of living reflected by the intermediate budget. Indeed, the income of most families more closely approximated the lower budget level. The Census Bureau reports that the median income of all families with one wage earner in 1979—the latest year for which it has statistics—was $15,652.

BLS said the intermediate and higher budgets rose more than the lower budget in 1980 because of large increases in taxes and homeowner costs. In drawing up the budgets, BLS includes only rental housing in the lower budget. Both homeownership and rental housing are factored in the other budgets.

Total consumption costs—the sum of outlays for shelter, food, transportation, clothing, personal and medical care, and miscellaneous items and services—rose about 10 percent in the lower budget and 10.5 percent in the intermediate and higher budgets, with the largest increase occurring in transportation. (See box, this page.)

PERSONAL INCOME taxes in the three budgets include estimated 1980 federal, state, and local tax payments, which went up 29.6 percent at the lower level, 24.7 percent at the intermediate level, and 24.6 percent at the highest level. BLS said that the large increases in taxes were the result of the federal income tax structures of the federal government and many states, which call for higher tax rates as income rises.

"While the percent increase in income taxes for the lower budget was higher than for the other levels, the impact of the increases is more pronounced at the higher levels because taxes constitute a larger share of the total budget at these levels," BLS said. Changes in state tax codes occurred in a number of states, it pointed out.

The social security contribution rate was unchanged at 6.13 percent from 1979 to 1980, but the maximum income on which contributions are paid into the social security system increased from $22,900 to $25,900. As a result, social security deductions increased approximately 13 percent at the lower level and 14 percent at the other two levels. (The contribution rate rose last Jan. 1 to 6.65 percent, while maximum income on which social security taxes may be charged went to $29,700.)

AMONG CONSUMPTION costs, transportation expenses rose 15 percent for families on the austere budget, 14.3 percent for middle-level families, and 14.1 percent for those at the higher level.

Shelter showed an 8.2 percent increase in the lower budget and increases of about 12 percent in the intermediate and higher budgets. BLS said the larger increases in the shelter component of the middle- and upper-level budgets were due to a combination of higher mortgage-interest costs and large increases in fuel and utilities.

Most other consumption costs rose at about the same rate for each budget level. Food costs increased 10.5 percent across the board. Clothing expense went up 4.7 percent, personal care costs 10.8 percent, and medical care 10.8 percent for all families.

THE BUDGETS do not represent how families actually do or should spend their money. Rather, they reflect certain assumptions about the manner of living at each of three relative standards of living. The budgets are prepared annually.

The estimates are drawn up for a hypothetical family consisting of a 38-year-old man employed full time, his nonworking wife, and their 13-year-old boy and eight-year-old girl. The couple is assumed to have been married 15 years, the family settled in the community, and the husband an experienced worker. The family has, for each budget level, average inventories of clothing, house furnishings, major durables, and other equipment.

The budgets are prepared for 24 metropolitan areas, defined as those with more than 1 million people, four non-metropolitan regions (populations between 2,500 and 50,000), and Anchorage, Alaska. Nearly three-fourths of all Americans live in cities and metropolitan areas.

FOR THE lower budget, autumn 1980 costs were 6.5 percent higher in the metropolitan areas than in the non-metropolitan urban areas, BLS said. The difference was 12 percent in the intermediate budget and 17.9 percent in the higher budget. Total budget levels were lowest in small cities in the South.

In a special note, BLS said that a comprehensive revision of the family budget series is in the works and that a committee of experts has completed a study of the methodology involved and recommended a completely new approach. The study and recommendations are being reviewed by BLS as well as by a large number of persons outside the bureau, it said.

Two Unions Appoint New General Counsels

Two AFL-CIO unions announced the appointment of new general counsels.

The State, County & Municipal Employees named Winn Newman to head its legal staff after serving as general counsel for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers for the past 10 years. Newman, who previously was AFSCME general counsel 1968-71, succeeds Larry Weinberg, who will remain with the union's legal department.

Newman is succeeded at IUE by Robert Friedman, who has been the union's associate general counsel for the past several years. Friedman joined the IUE legal staff in 1967 as assistant general counsel.

The Reagan Budget

Impact on the Metal Trades

Depletion of Skilled Crafts Threatened by Cutbacks

By Paul J. Burnsky
President, Metal Trades Dept.

To hear some of my colleagues in the labor movement tell it, our department and its 22 affiliated international unions are the lucky beneficiaries of the Reagan Administration.

They're only joking, of course, because they know better. But millions of Americans who know only that the Administration plans to expand the Navy by 50 percent in the next 10 to 15 years can't be blamed for assuming that the 250,000 workers who build and maintain ships, and the many more in supplier firms, can look forward to long-term, full-time employment. We wish it were so.

SIMILARLY, our department and its affiliates represent more than 60,000 workers employed by Dept. of Energy contractors. The Administration intends to wipe out that department. Such projects as synthetic fuels are already on the skids. The one segment of the department tagged for expansion is nuclear power, which happens to be the one where most of our energy people are concentrated.

At best, this is a very mixed blessing.

Let me first make the positive case for naval construction. We welcomed the modest Navy expansion program begun by President Carter near the end of his term. We are delighted that President Reagan proposes to broaden it substantially. This is only secondarily because shipbuilding creates jobs for our members. It is primarily because in any armed conflict short of a nuclear holocaust, adequate sea transport for men and materiel, adequately protected enroute, is indispensable to the defense of our country.

BUT THE Reagan big-Navy program is missing the boat. It concentrates on warships and ignores—even discourages—merchant ships. Merchant ships become wartime transports, the precious vessels that fighting ships protect. Yet the Administration wants to eliminate a subsidy covering the difference between U.S. and foreign construction costs, without which no ocean-going merchantmen at all would be built in this country.

This could doom Navy expansion. It takes at least three and as many as 10 years for a warship to progress from design to construction. For the next several years, then, Navy building will be limited to proven craft. Without merchant ships —needed in themselves—to fill the gap, shipyards will languish. The industry predicts as many as 40,000 workers will be indefinitely laid off. Some of the 24 major privately-owned yards will close.

EVERY ONE of those yards will be needed when the Navy's crash program matures a few years from now. Even the eight naval shipyards, which now do most of the modernization, maintenance and repair work for the fleet, will be returned to new construction for the first time in decades. But there will be neither yards nor manpower enough if the work they ought to be doing in the meantime is denied to them.

Less conspicuous but equally important is the erosion of suppliers. A shipyard is largely an assembly line. About half of what it puts together—steel, pipe, electrical equipment, valves, pumps—is manufactured elsewhere. But these things can't be picked up in your neighborhood hardware store. They are specialized items, built to Navy specifications. And unless there's a continuing demand for them, they are too much of a nuisance for most companies to make.

Admittedly, up to now my indictment of the Reagan Administration's maritime policies could have been—and often was—directed, with variations, at its peacetime predecessors. But there are differences.

THE FIRST difference wipes out any credit the Administration may have earned as champion of an expanded Navy. Both the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of the Navy are "considering" building the U.S. fleet overseas.

To be sure, this is not a clear and present danger. Even Sen. Jesse Helms might object to a new USS North Carolina being built in Liberia or Japan. But the other differences are not groundless fears but bleak realities.

Here are some of them:

MANPOWER POLICIES. Shipbuilding crafts range alphabetically from Asbestos Workers to Upholsterers, embracing along the line the Boilermakers, Carpenters, Electricians, Machinists, Painters, Plumbers and 14 more. What they do in the shipyard requires special knowledge beyond the basics of their crafts.

As a group these craftsmen are growing older. Sporadic employment has driven away many younger workers and deterred others from replacing them. Government-supported apprenticeship and pre-apprenticeship programs have helped in the past, but not nearly enough to keep up with the losses. Against this background:

- There is no indication that the Administration is even aware of the impending shipyard manpower problem, much less disposed to do anything about it.
- Deep cuts in federal training programs at all levels will reduce even further the prospects of finding replacements for aging shipyard craftsmen. Increasing the skilled workforce seems next to impossible.

This isn't just a shipbuilding problem. Last year, 3,000 machinists were graduated from registered apprenticship programs. Manpower authorities say that 250,000 more will be needed in five years. Yet the Reagan budget will force the dismissal of 80 persons from the small staff of the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

- Cutbacks in unemployment compensation will be a further deterrent to prospective workers, and to those who have been laid off, during this period of uncertainty in the shipyard industry. They will go elsewhere now, and few will be available when the Navy needs them.

In short, while the Navy worries in public about finding and keeping able crews to sail a bigger fleet, the Defense Dept. shows no concern about finding and keeping able workers to build it.

Apparently the only hope is that the construction of merchant ships in American yards will be stimulated rather than squelched, and that apprenticeship and other training will be enhanced rather than emasculated. The odds are poor.

SAFETY AND HEALTH. Our members hold some of the most hazardous jobs in the nation. They work where the footing is slippery, where the winds are strong, where the quarters are close, where the air is fetid, where the temperature is torrid or frigid.

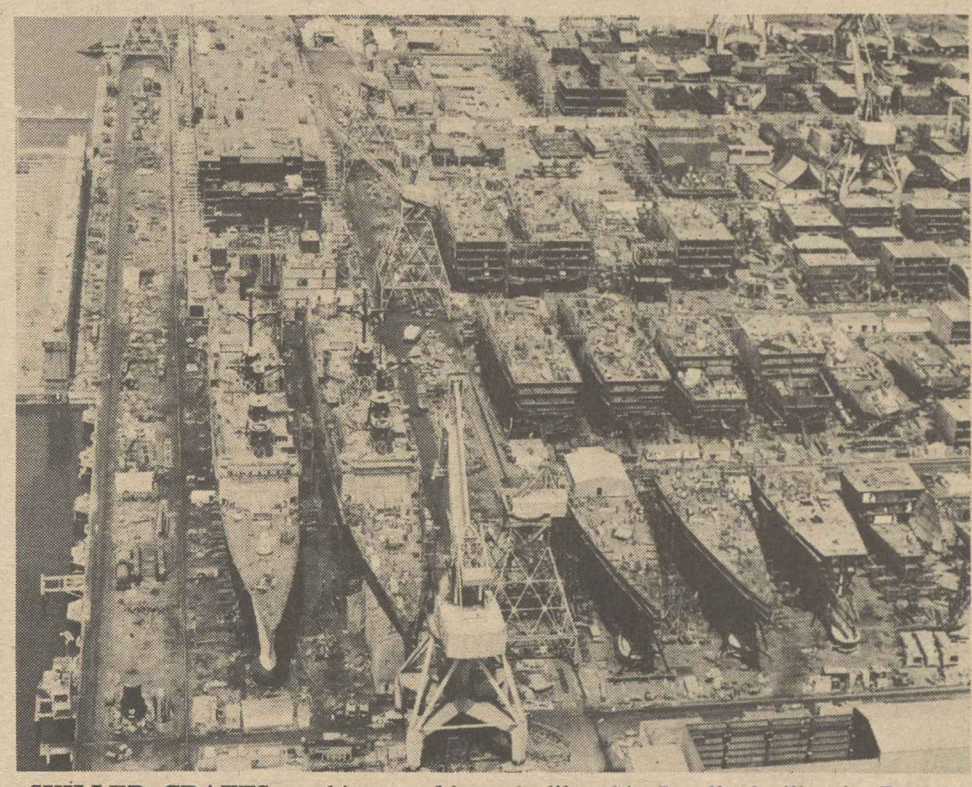
When the Reagan Administration appraises health and safety measures according to their "cost effectiveness," our members' lives are in the balance. There may be some workplaces, in some occupations, where OSHA regulations can be "eased" and OSHA inspections "relaxed." None of our members works in them.

- A ship under construction is a large, complex and specialized place. A proper health and safety inspection cannot be conducted by an outsider without guidance from a knowledgeable worker. Yet the Secretary of Labor has withdrawn a regulation requiring that the worker member of the inspection team be paid his regular rate while on that duty.
- A move is afoot to exempt most surface miners except coal miners from the Mine Safety & Health Act. This would include our uranium miners.
- The Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act is also on the Administration's hit list.

What seems to bother the Administration states-rights crowd is that a federal law works so much better and pays so much more realistic benefits than the worker compensation systems in many coastal states dominated by their allies.

- The earliest casualty on this list may be OSHA protection for federal workers, for its effectiveness is the result of an Executive Order rather than an act of Congress.

Soon after OSHA came into being, our Metal Trades Councils negotiated language in their federal shipyard contracts specifying conformity with OSHA standards and regulations. The language was impossible to enforce. In practical terms it was beyond the reach of the grievance procedure, and of course the federal workers cannot strike.



About a year ago President Carter created by Executive Order the Federal Advisory Council on Safety & Health, of which I am vice chairman. The council has been able to do what contract language could not.

Now, however, there is a new head of the Office of Personnel Management who has other ideas. Health and safety, he told an interviewer, is "primarily a labor-management issue," not one for government—as though government is not "management" in a federal shipyard. Besides, he said, his general view is that "things are going to be difficult for government employees." He ought to know.

An Executive Order survives only as long as the incumbent President wants it to.

- Finally, we cannot help worrying about places like Oak Ridge and Hanford. We, like the AFL-CIO, believe nuclear power is and will continue to be, at least for many years, vital to our country. We believe it is safe. But in an Administration that judges health and safety measures on their "cost effectiveness," will it be as safe as it has been in the past?

I don't in any way suggest there will be any deliberate neglect of the immeasureably important precautions required in nuclear installations. But their application within an overall policy that health and safety have finite value, measureable in dollars, creates a faint glimmer of worry that should not exist at all.

SKILLED CRAFTS working at shipyards like this Ingalls facility in Pascagoula, Miss., face an uncertain future under the Reagan Administration's program to expand Navy ship construction while ignoring the needs of the U.S.-flag merchant marine. Discouragement of merchant ship construction could cost the jobs of 40,000 shipyard workers represented by local councils of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

This analysis of the impact of the Reagan Administration economic program on workers represented by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. is one of a series by the AFL-CIO News as a follow-up to recommendations stemming from AFL-CIO regional conferences.

Department's Local Units Cover 650,000 Workers

The Metal Trades Dept. is unique among the constitutional departments of the AFL-CIO in that it functions in part like an international union.

Eighty local and regional Metal Trades Councils, from the East Coast to Hawaii, are certified bargaining agents for more than 650,000 workers in several hundred units, ranging from less than a dozen workers to more than 10,000.

Eleven of the councils represent 70,000 federal employees, most of them in the eight Navy and two Coast Guard shipyards. Together with workers in almost 300 private shipyards, large and small, they make MTD the nation's largest union of shipbuilders.

The other half-million workers for whom MTD councils bargain are found in a wide variety of operations, from atomic energy to petrochemicals to uranium mining. More than 30,000 work for Dept. of Energy contractors. (Affiliated unions of the department represent about the same number.)

All Metal Trades Councils are formed from local unions of the department's 22 affiliates, although it is rare for all 22 to have locals in the same establishment. The workers are members of their respective locals and pay per capita to the parent union. They collectively decide the additional dues that will be checked off to support the council, whose officers they elect. The council executive board is comprised of local union delegates.

Workers covered by council collective bargaining agreements amount to less than 15 percent of the total membership of department affiliates. However, direct and indirect services to the councils make up the bulk of the department's program.

Sex Discrimination Case

Court Absolves Unions Of Liability for Bias Pay

The Supreme Court unanimously rebuffed an airline's attempt to make unions share the cost of back pay it owes to women flight attendants who won a class action sex discrimination lawsuit.

Northwest Airlines had been found by a federal district court to have violated the Equal Pay Act of 1963 and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by paying its stewardesses less than male pursers for work requiring "equal skill, effort and responsibility . . . performed under similar working conditions."

THE AIRLINE then sued the Air Line Pilots and the Transport Workers, the two unions which at different periods had represented flight attendants. It said that since the unions were parties to collective bargaining agreements that incorporated discriminatory pay scales, they should share liability for back pay under a "right to contribution" legal doctrine.

The stewardesses had not sued the unions and expressly stated in court proceedings that they did not consider the union representing them responsible for the discrimination.

In its 8-0 decision, the Supreme Court said the airline would not have a valid claim even if the unions were assumed to have been at least partially responsible for the violations of the law.

IN BOTH LAWS, the Supreme Court noted, Congress carefully spelled out the remedies available to aggrieved workers and the means of enforcement. Therefore, the court concluded, "it would be improper for us to add a right to contribution to the statutory rights that Congress created in the Equal Pay Act and Title VII."

The Supreme Court decision was along lines that had been urged in a joint brief filed by the AFL-CIO and the UAW, and in a brief filed by the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The decision, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, made clear that denial of the "right of contribution" doctrine in the case of the two laws under consideration did not necessarily carry over to other laws that may be less carefully drawn. A case pending before the Supreme Court involving the right of contribution in antitrust verdicts involves a different set of laws, the court noted.

IN ANOTHER action of significance to unions, the Supreme Court declined to review and thus left standing a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia involving a construction site picketing ruling.

The case involved a non-union electrical subcontractor in Florida who was being picketed by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at a residential construction site. The picketing was confined to the gate reserved for the non-union firm while other firms working on the project used a separate gate. However, when electrical fixtures to be installed by the subcontractor were delivered through the "neutral gate," the IBEW extended its picketing to that gate as well, and the National Labor Relations Board upheld the union's right to do so.

The appellate court upheld the NLRB, and the Supreme Court action ended the case.

Budget Slashers Woo Right-Wing House Democrats

the House will have a chance to act on the amendments that will be in order, including the Latta-Gramm substitute.

The White House and its conservative organization allies have been doing their own lobbying during the Easter recess. President Reagan made a well-publicized phone call that was carried live by a Pennsylvania radio station to seek and apparently get the support of Democrat Eugene V. Atkinson for his budget proposal. And the President announced that he will address a joint session of Congress the day before the House is to act on the budget.

A GROUP of Reagan-supporting governors promised to lobby their congressional delegations for his program, and the right-wing American Conservative Union called on its followers to flood congressional offices with messages supporting the Reagan economic program.

The Republican-controlled Senate has already adopted part of the President's program through a reconciliation bill directing congressional committees to cut spending authority for programs in their jurisdiction.

Spurt in Economic Growth Seen Unlikely to Continue

The nation's economy grew at a surprising annual rate of 6.5 percent during the first three months of the year, according to a preliminary report by the Commerce Dept. But AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald warned that the economy will not be able to sustain such growth in the months ahead.

"Even with the strong growth of sales," Oswald noted, "unemployment remains at the very high plateau of 7.3 percent, with 1.5 million more people out of work than a year and a half ago."

THE FIRST-QUARTER advance in "real" gross national product, the nation's total output of goods and services, was the largest quarterly expansion in the economy since the 9 percent real growth rate in the second quarter of 1978. It compared with an annual growth rate of 3.8 percent in 1980's fourth quarter.

Commerce Sec. Malcom Baldrige attributed much of the first-quarter strength to "the upward momentum of the economy during the fourth quarter." He predicted that the economic growth would "flatten out" in the current and third quarters of 1981. He cited the following recent developments to support this view: non-auto retail sales have slowed in the past few months; domestic new-car sales have slumped since late March; industrial production has been flat for the past two months, and the level of nonfarm payroll employment stopped growing at the end of the first quarter.

BALDRIGE ALSO noted that consumer spending has been growing more rapidly than disposable income for three quarters. As a result, the personal savings rate declined to 4.7 percent of disposable income in the first quarter from 5.1 percent in the preceding quarter and 6.1 percent in the 1980 third quarter. He predicted that there will be a "substantial slowing" in consumer spending growth in the months ahead.

Meanwhile, the cost of money went back up a notch as most large U.S. banks raised their prime lending rates to 17.5 percent from 17 percent.

In other economic reports, the Commerce Dept. reported that housing starts climbed at a fairly mild annual rate of 5.8 percent in March, not nearly enough to make up for the sharp slide of 26.9 percent the month before. Many economists see further declines in new housing construction ahead.

THE COMMERCE DEPT. also reported that personal income rose only eight-tenths of 1 percent last month, another indication that the economy is slowing down. That followed increases of seven-tenths of 1 percent in February and 1.1 percent in January.

Separately, the Federal Reserve Board reported that the nation's factories operated at a seasonally adjusted 79.5 percent of capacity in March, about the same as February's 79.4 percent rate and still below January's 80 percent.

West Virginia Legislature Buries R-T-W

Charleston, W. Va.—The West Virginia legislature buried an attempt to saddle the state with a so-called right-to-work law, becoming the sixth state to reject a compulsory open shop law this year. In the 1981 session just ended, the legislature also approved a series of important labor-supported bills.

The open shop bill, dubbed a "right to freeload" measure by State AFL-CIO President Joseph W. Powell, was introduced in the state senate following a statewide media and personal appearance blitz staged by officials of the National Right to Work Committee based in Arlington, Va.

POWELL'S head-on rebuttals of the anti-union organization's arguments and his testimony before the senate labor committee contributed heavily to that committee's voice vote to postpone action on the bill indefinitely.

"Right to work" measures were killed earlier this year in Maine, Vermont, New Mexico, Idaho and Montana.

In another major success for labor, the state legislature approved a bill that will sharply tighten requirements on employers to identify hazardous chemicals in use in the workplace and disclose symptoms that can result from improper exposure to them. An attempt to cut out a section authorizing the state to monitor compliance was successfully beaten back.

ALSO ENACTED was a compromise bill intended to restore solvency to the state's unemployment compensation fund within two years through higher employer taxes. Although the bill calls for elimination of benefits for workers who voluntarily quit or are fired for misconduct, labor was successful in keeping provisions that put the burden of proof on the employer when a worker charges that he or she was forced to quit.

The State AFL-CIO strongly supported another new law that prohibits employers from eavesdropping on employee's telephone conversations without their knowledge. The measure closes a loophole in a 1968 federal wiretap law that lets telephone company supervisors listen in on workers on the job without notice.

The legislature voted to increase the state minimum wage as of Jan. 1, 1982, from $2.75 to $3.05 an hour.

AMONG OTHER new legislation is a measure permitting the state labor commissioner to require new construction or mining contractors to post bond covering one month's wages and benefits. This is designed to protect workers from employer bankruptcies or contractors who leave the state without paying wages.

A backlog of pending workers' compensation claims should be eliminated by a law requiring the compensation appeals board to meet monthly rather than every two months, the State AFL-CIO said.

Powell credited the passage of the wide range of beneficial legislation to labor's successful efforts in the 1980 primary elections to dump conservative legislators who had dominated the state senate for a number of years. The new senate president, he pointed out, has posted a 100-percent "right" voting record by COPE standards.

Army Hit on Purchase Of Japanese Trucks

A new program to help the automobile industry by accelerating planned government purchases of motor vehicles has no value if the vehicles are foreign made, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald stressed in a letter to Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis.

Oswald said labor's concern stems from a recent purchase by the Dept. of the Army of 40 Japanese-built Datsun trucks for use at Ft. Devens, Mass.

Rail Workers Battle Cutbacks

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI — Saturday, May 2, 1981 — No. 18

UAW Vote Clears Way to Reaffiliation

Detroit—A resolution authorizing the executive board of the Auto Workers to "take the necessary steps" for reaffiliation with the AFL-CIO has been approved by 62 percent of the union's convention delegates, and UAW President Douglas A. Fraser termed the vote a message of solidarity.

Fraser said the UAW leadership will "move quickly" to discuss with the AFL-CIO "the final terms and conditions of the reaffiliation so that we can consummate it without undue delay," possibly at a UAW board meeting scheduled for June.

THE EXECUTIVE board of the 1.2-million member union had unanimously recommended the reaffiliation resolution which was adopted.

The votes were cast by delegates who had represented their locals at the UAW's most recent triennial convention, held last June. To avoid the expense of bringing the delegates to a single location, the balloting took place at regional meetings across the country.

Ballots cast at the various locations were then combined and the resolution was adopted by a margin of 7,785 to 4,527.

The UAW and its president, the late Walter P. Reuther, had a major role in the formation of the AFL-CIO in 1955.

IT LEFT the federation in 1968. But in recent years, Fraser noted, the UAW and the AFL-CIO have worked closely on a number of important issues, including the campaign for comprehensive national health insurance and other union goals.

"Having a unified labor center in this country can only strengthen the trade union movement at a time when it is under severe attack from irresponsible corporations and their political allies," Fraser said.

He said the union's "rank-and-file convention delegates" have shown their desire "to work together and fight together with our brothers and sisters in the labor movement."

VICTIMS VIGIL brings trade unionists and environmentalists to the steps of the U.S. Capitol to protest Reagan Administration attacks on job safety regulations and clean air standards. Addressing participants is Eula Bingham, head of OSHA during the Carter Administration. Other speakers included President Howard D. Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., President Lloyd McBride of the Steelworkers and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers. The vigils will be conducted weekly.

Attack on Davis-Bacon Hit as Pay-Cutting Tactic

Repeal of the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law would give the construction industry's most unscrupulous employers preference in the awarding of government contracts, Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine warned at Senate Labor subcommittee hearings.

Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), chairman of the panel, opened the hearings by calling for repeal of the law, which he termed "inflationary and wasteful." The Labor Dept., he said, should not be "in the business of setting local wage rates."

Georgine, who also testified on behalf of the AFL-CIO, countered that there is "still a compelling need" for the 50-year-old law which requires payment of community wage scales and benefits on federally financed construction projects.

IN FACT, Georgine suggested, a failing has been inadequate enforcement of the law. Among many abuses that have surfaced, Georgine noted, were contractors who falsified payroll data to conceal the fact that they were paying workers substantially less than the Davis-Bacon wage. Other contractors have classified employees doing highly skilled work as laborers, paying them the lower wages. Minority workers and workers without immigration docu-

Service Employees, RWDSU Announce Plan for Merger

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A merger plan that would unite the Service Employees International Union and the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union has been endorsed by the executive boards of both unions.

Their joint statement said the projected merger would unite 910,000 union members, including 95,000 in Canada. The SEIU now has 675,000 members and the RWDSU 235,000.

Final action on the merger will be taken at separate conventions of the two unions, to be held prior to June 30, 1982.

Both SEIU President John J. Sweeney and RWDSU President Alvin E. Heaps stressed that merger will bring some 300,000 health care workers under the same banner. The SEIU presently has some 200,000 health care workers and the National Hospital division of the RWDSU represents about 100,000 workers.

Under the merger plan, Sweeney will be president of the new organization and SEIU Sec.-Treas. Richard Cordtz will be

20,000 Join In March to Capitol Hill

By James M. Shevis

Nearly 20,000 angry railroad workers marched on the Capitol to let the country know that they are not passively going to accept devastating federal budget cuts that would destroy the railroad industry and take away their jobs.

"We have fought long and hard for what we have," Chairman Fred J. Kroll of the Railway Labor Executives' Association told a noon rally on the Capitol's West Front. "We will fight just as long and just as hard to preserve our rights, our working conditions, and our jobs."

THE DEEP budget cuts proposed by the Reagan Administration would turn Conrail, the federally subsidized freight railroad, into a mere skeleton, and eliminate its passenger counterpart, Amtrak, as a nationwide intercity system, he warned.

The cutbacks would cost over 70,000 jobs and, because the number of contributors to the Railroad Retirement Fund would be reduced roughly by a corresponding number, the railroad pension system would face almost certain bankruptcy by 1983, Kroll warned.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who also addressed the rally, told the railroad workers that "you can count on the full support of the AFL-CIO and all its unions" in the fight for economic justice against the budget cuts. He labeled President Reagan's proposed cutbacks "a program for disinvestment in America's future," and urged Congress to "stop it in its tracks."

"WE CANNOT let the future of our country be jeopardized by a misguided attempt to pinch pennies from the federal

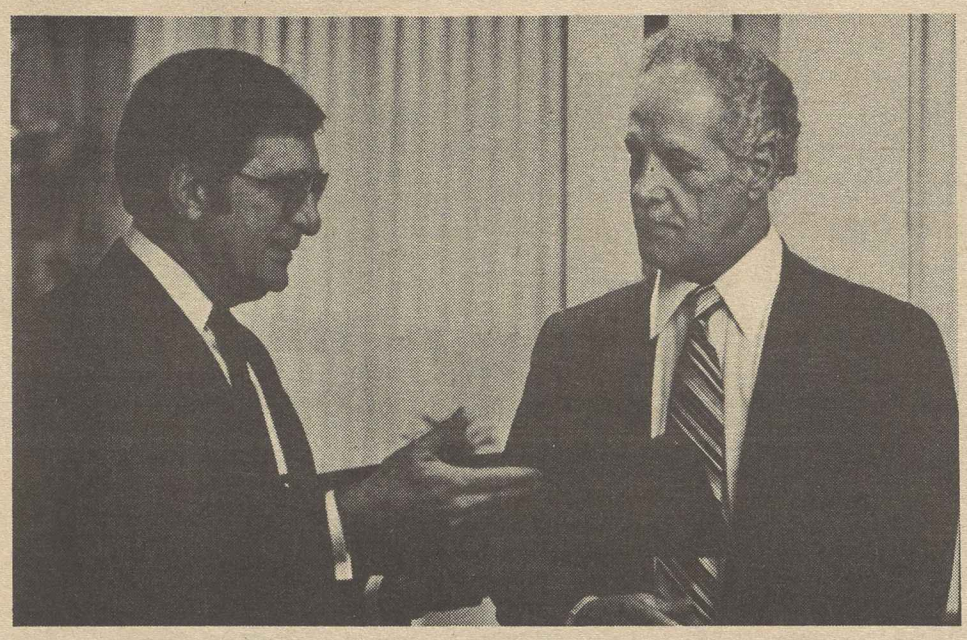
OSHA Facing New Assaults on 10th Anniversary



By John R. Oravec

Unmet promises and grim prospects for improving the safety and health of American workers marked the 10th anniversary of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue called for labor to commemorate the anniversary with a renewed commitment to defend OSHA against Reagan Administration assaults.

Addressing union members and environmentalists deeply concerned with Administration cutbacks, Donahue assailed "an outrageous and wholesale attempt to

High Court Urged to Uphold Right to Leaflet Fairground

The constitutional guarantee of free speech that assures the right to distribute leaflets to passersby on city streets applies equally to the streets of a state fairground, the AFL-CIO declared in a brief to the Supreme Court.

At issue is the constitutionality of a Minnesota state fair regulation prohibiting sale or distribution of any "printed or written material" except at booths rented from the state fair authorities. Under state law, violation of a regulation imposed by the fair's governing body is a misdemeanor.

THE INTERNATIONAL Society for Krishna Consciousness challenged the restriction as an infringement on religious freedom, and the Minnesota Supreme Court upheld the challenge in a split decision.

That decision, which the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to review, held that the state's interest in keeping order at the fairgrounds could be met without such a sweeping curb on solicitation and distribution. It said specific actions that disrupt traffic or fairgrounds activities could be dealt with if they occur, but the state had not shown the need for a broad prior restraint.

While the Krishna group made its argument on the right of religious freedom, the AFL-CIO brief focused on the free speech aspect of First Amendment guarantees.

LAWS RESTRICTING distribution and solicitation had been used against unions, especially during the 1930s and 1940s, until struck down by landmark Supreme Court decisions, the AFL-CIO noted.

Past precedents are so clearcut, the AFL-CIO suggested, that "the only issue which even arguably presents an open question is whether the fact that this case concerns streets, roads and parks of a state's fairgrounds rather than streets, roads and parks of a permanently-established town business district fundamentally alters the First Amendment analysis."

THE AFL-CIO brief disputed Minnesota's assertion that the governmental interest in avoiding possible annoyance to fairgoers is greater than that of a city with respect to pedestrians.

The 125-acre fairground, with a network of roadways and walkways is different than a closed arena or a ballpark, the AFL-CIO insisted. The fairground is "closed only in the sense that a medieval walled city is closed," the brief stressed, and fairgoers can easily avoid unwanted solicitations by simply "walking on" just as they can on a city street.

Pilots to Target New York Air's Corporate Links

The Air Line Pilots announced a major campaign to pin responsibility for the union-busting tactics of New York Air on its corporate siblings—Texas Air Corp. and Texas International Airlines Group.

Its goal, the union said, is to have the chief executive of Texas Air, Frank Lorenzo, recognize ALPA's union representation rights on New York Air through its existing contract with Texas International Airlines.

"Frank Lorenzo and his airlines are out to break the unions, and we have to stop him in his tracks," ALPA President John J. O'Donnell said.

O'DONNELL announced that the union has retained Ray Rogers, who was involved in the corporate campaign strategy that the Clothing & Textile Workers used to help bring J. P. Stevens & Co. to the bargaining table.

Rogers charged that New York Air, which has been operating non-union, is actually part of a company that is 85 percent organized "and that is making a well-planned, concerted effort to destroy these unions."

O'Donnell said Texas International "reneged on a contract settlement" with ALPA last year and the union still hasn't been able to get a new contract.

ULLICO Stockholders Elect Four Union Presidents

Stockholders of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. elected four labor leaders to the company's board of directors at their 55th annual meeting.

The four are President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., Bricklayers President John T. Joyce, and President John DeConcini of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers.

For First Year

New Major Contracts Boost Pay 9 Percent

Contracts negotiated by major bargaining units of 1,000 or more workers in the first quarter of 1981 provided average wage increases of 9 percent in the first year of the agreements and 7.7 percent annually over the life of the pacts.

The figures compare with an average first-year increase of 9.5 percent and a 7.1 percent over-term annual increase averaged in contracts negotiated during all of 1980.

The first-quarter data cover 58 settlements involving 202,000 workers—the smallest number of workers covered in a given quarter since the Bureau of Labor Statistics began issuing the series in 1968. The increases do not include estimated wage boosts under cost-of-living adjustment clauses.

SETTLEMENTS in the first quarter were concentrated in non-manufacturing industries, with few contracts reached in manufacturing or construction industries, BLS said.

Separately, BLS reported that productivity in U.S. businesses increased sharply in the first quarter, reflecting the big jump in overall economic output for the period. Output per hour worked rose at a seasonally adjusted 3.6 percent annual rate in the January-March quarter, after declining at a four-tenths of 1 percent annual rate in the 1980 fourth quarter.

In its report on major contracts, BLS said that key contracts covering 5,000 or more workers each provided a 10.4 percent first-year increase in combined wage and benefit increases and a 7.3 percent yearly boost over the life of the agreements.

THE FIGURES compare with increases of 10.4 percent and 7.1 percent, respectively, in contracts negotiated by large bargaining units during 1980. Settlements for large units covered only 88,000 workers in the first quarter.

Other highlights of first-quarter bargaining:

- Negotiated increases in pacts with cost-of-living provisions averaged 7.6 percent, compared with 9.9 percent for contracts without such clauses. Over the life of the contracts, the annual wages were 6.1 percent for contracts with COL clauses and 8.8 percent for those without. About 41 percent of the workers under settlements reached in the January-March period were covered by contracts with COL clauses.
- In manufacturing industries, negotiated wage increases averaged 9 percent in the first contract year and 6.7 percent over the life of the agreements. In 1980, the comparable figures were 7.4 percent and 5.4 percent.
- In all non-manufacturing industries, the averages were 9 and 8.1 percent, respectively, compared to 10.9 and 8.3 percent respectively in 1980.
- First-year raises in construction averaged 13.4 and 11.6 percent, respectively, compared to 13.6 and 11.5 percent in 1980.
- The average length of contracts negotiated was 34.1 months, slightly lower than the 34.6 months when the same parties previously bargained.
- Cost-of-living clauses were introduced or re-established in two agreements and dropped in four. Some 56 percent of the workers were covered by clauses with quarterly reviews and 35 percent with annual reviews. The most common formula provided adjustments of 1 cent an hour for each three-tenths of a point rise in the federal consumer price index.

WAGE INCREASES actually paid out during the first quarter of 1981—that is, current wage changes paid under 1981 settlements, increases under contracts negotiated in earlier years but deferred until 1981, and adjustments under COL clauses —went to 3 million workers, BLS said. These effective wage increases averaged 3.6 percent.

BLS said that COL clauses triggering wage increases in the first quarter of 1981 provided pay gains averaging 96 percent of the rise in the CPI during that same period.

In the current April-June quarter, 320 major agreements covering 962,000 workers, largely in the construction industry, are due to expire or may be reopened, BLS said. Also, at least 87 contracts covering 733,000 workers expired prior to Apr. 1, but new agreements had not been reached or ratified by the end of the first quarter in those sectors, which included coal mining and railroads.

Top Steelworker Officers Elected Without Contest

Pittsburgh — Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride and the USWA's four other international union officers have won new four-year terms as the nominating period ended with no other candidates qualifying for ballot spots.

Under the union's constitution, candidates without opponents are declared elected and do not appear on the May 28 election ballot.

The USWA leadership team, all first elected in 1977 and now chosen for an additional four-year term, includes Lynn Williams, secretary; Frank McKee, treasurer; Joseph Odorcich, vice president for administration, and Leon Lynch, vice president for human affairs.

Also elected unopposed were E. Gerard Docquier, the USWA Canadian national director, and 10 district directors. Contests are scheduled in 12 other USWA districts where from two to four candidates received sufficient local union nominations to qualify for ballot spots.

Elected without opponents were William Foley, Dist. 1; Len Stevens, Dist. 3; Clement Godbout, Dist. 5; Paul J. McHale, Dist. 9; Paul D. Rusen, Dist. 23; Frank Valenta, Dist. 28; Buddy W. Davis, Dist. 34; Bruce Thrasher, Dist. 35; Thermon Phillips, Dist. 36 and Robert Petris, Dist. 38.

New Hampshire Rejects Revived Drive for R-T-W

Concord, N.H.—Labor's allies in the New Hampshire legislature handed "right-to-work" advocates a stinging defeat as the House killed a measure to bar the union shop in the state, 189 to 160.

Two years ago, the anti-labor legislation passed the House, 183 to 161, but subsequently went down to defeat in the Senate. Labor's opposition, led by State AFL-CIO President Harland Eaton and former President Donald B. Cowette, who had to resign his post in the middle of the session for health reasons, was even more effective this year.

Opponents of the bill won adoption of a measure prohibiting reintroduction of a right-to-work bill in this legislature, making it impossible for RTW forces to renew their attack before 1983.

Labor now has won battles with the right-to-workers in seven states this year. Bills to do away with the union shop died in committee or on the legislative floor in Vermont, Maine, Idaho, West Virginia, and Maryland as well as in New Hampshire. In New Mexico, Democratic Gov. Bruce King vetoed an RTW measure, as he did in 1979.

Grace Succeeds Stephens On Labor Press Council

Mike Grace has been elected to the executive council of the International Labor Press Association. Grace, 33, is director of public relations for the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and editor of the department's newspaper, In Public Service.

Grace will fill the unexpired term of Bernard Stephens, who resigned from the ILPA Executive Council following his retirement as editor of Public Employee Press, the publication of State, County & Municipal Employees District 37 in New York.

Labor Fights to Save Law

New Attacks on OSHA Mark 10th Anniversary

undo everything that OSHA promises." He said the attack on federal job safety standards "has come in the name of balanced budgets, regulatory reform and cost effectiveness."

LISTING A number of OSHA standards and related programs that have fallen victim during the new administration's first 100 days, "it becomes quite clear that the federal government has switched sides," Donahue said.

"A law designed to protect workers has been twisted to say that the employer must be 'protected' from the workers' quest for a safe and healthful workplace," he said.

The 10th anniversary observance began on the steps of the U.S. Capitol with the first in a series of "Victims Vigils" mobilized by the Industrial Union Dept. and environmental groups. Participants carried placards bearing the names of fellow trade unionists from New York state who were killed on the job or died of job-related disease. The vigil concluded with a demonstration outside the White House.

President Lloyd McBride of the Steelworkers charged that the Administration—"in collusion with employer groups and certain members of Congress"—wants to destroy OSHA.

"IN THE NAME of some half-baked economic theory called 'cost-benefit analysis,' the Reagan Administration has launched a blatant political effort to not only stop any future safety and health standards, but to dismantle those protective standards already in place," McBride told the vigil participants.

One such move by the Administration that will have a deep impact on USWA members is the proposal to seriously weaken the lead standard, he said.

McBride welcomed the strengthening of ties between the environmentalists and labor, pointing out that, like OSHA, the Clean Air Act is coming under attack.

"For our part," he stressed, "we are not about to subject steelworkers, their families and their communities to polluted air which can kill and disease just as easily as lead exposure."

Eula Bingham, who headed OSHA during the Carter Administration, said she was "ashamed that our government is turning the clock back" on needed worker protections.

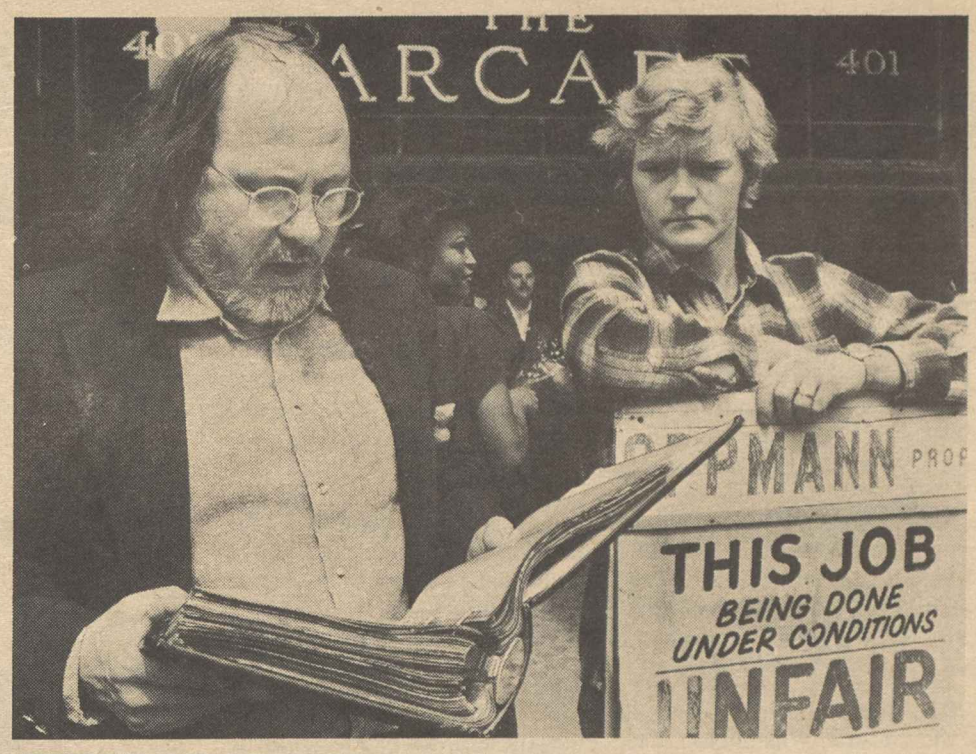
To retreat on standards now, she observed, is to penalize employees who have improved conditions to comply with regulations and to allow those who have not to compete unfairly in the market.

Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers warned that the Reagan pullback on the lead and cotton dust standards is the start of a campaign to wipe out other protections, including those against asbestos and vinyl chloride.

As for the cotton dust standard, Sheinkman pointed out that 35,000 textile workers have already fallen victim to disabling brown lung disease.

To reverse what little progress has been made would "condemn another generation of 50,000 American textile workers to the tortured wheezing and coughing which have struck down so many already," Sheinkman stressed.

He said the bottom line of the cost-benefit precept the Administration is imposing is simply "lives versus dollars."



IUD PRESIDENT Howard D. Samuel announced that the "Victim Vigils" would be conducted regularly in Washington on Mondays in coming weeks. The May 4 vigil at the Labor Dept. headquarters will focus on the concerns of ACTWU on the cotton dust pullback. Memorials for workplace victims from various states will follow: Pennsylvania, May 11; Ohio, May 18, and Wisconsin June 1, with several other states scheduled to participate in subsequent weeks.

Donahue noted that in addition to the gutting of safety and health standards, the new administration of OSHA has embarked "on a new game—censorship."

He pointed out that publications, films and slide shows developed to inform workers of workplace hazards have been banned under orders of the agency's new director, Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter.

UNDER THE redesigned approach of OSHA, Donahue warned that worker protections would be required only if they are economically efficient for employers.

"Benefits must outweigh costs, and the cheapest method—regardless of its effectiveness—may well be good enough," he said. "Instead of engineering problems out of the workplace, the new OSHA proposes redesigning the worker by slapping on a respirator" or other ineffective gadgets.

TWELVE O'CLOCK POET Daniel Thompson reads verse outside Cleveland Arcade for lunch-hour passers-by and members of Carpenters Local 182 who have set up an informational picket line to protest the hiring of non-union workers and the failure to pay the prevailing wage for a Post Office project in the arcade. Thompson, a family counselor for Cuyahoga County social services, had treated shoppers at the downtown complex to regular poetry readings until the picket line went up. Then he moved outside with the pickets.

Joseph Power Dead at 61, Headed Plasterers Since '70

Joseph T. Power, president of the Plasterers & Cement Masons for the past 11 years, died of cancer Apr. 27. He was 61.

Power began his trade union career as an apprentice with OPCM Local 5 in Chicago. He served as vice president and president of the local in the 1950s and was elected executive vice president of the international in 1959.

In mid-1970, Power was appointed president of the OPCM and was elected to his first full four-year term as president at the union's convention the following year.

JOSEPH T. POWER

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said that Power's death is a loss shared by all union members.

"JOE SET A model of personal integrity and dedication for the entire labor movement and those elected to lead it," Kirkland and Donahue said.

"His warmth and sincerity were his hallmarks and reflected great credit on the union he loved and served so well. Those who were privileged to have known him and to have benefited from his counsel and friendship are richer today," they declared.

Power had been a vice president and member of the executive council of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. since 1970 and had represented the federation as a worker delegate to the International Labor Organization.

He is survived by his wife, Mary, and six children, including Kathryn Van Helden and Jay Power of the AFL-CIO staff. Services were held May 1 at St. Anthony's Church in Falls Church, Va., and burial was in Arlington, Va.

CWA, Bell System Establish 'Quality of Worklife' Guide

The Communications Workers and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. announced adoption of a joint statement of principles to guide efforts to improve the quality of worklife in the Bell System.

The statement was drawn up by a CWA-AT&T committee on joint working conditions and service quality improvement established in national negotiations last August. The statement emphasizes that efforts to enhance the quality of worklife supplement collective bargaining, and that employee participation is voluntary.

"The integrity of the collective bargaining process, the contractual rights of the parties, and the workings of the grievance procedure must be upheld and maintained," the parties observed.

GOALS OF the program are "to employ people in a profitable and efficient enterprise," and to "create working conditions which are fulfilling by providing opportunities for employees and groups at levels to influence their working environment." CWA represents some 525,000 employees of AT&T and its Bell System telecommunications network.

CWA President Glenn E. Watts called the joint statement "an historic agreement that can have a significant impact far beyond this one industry. The whole area of quality of worklife is of great concern to today's workers—especially with the rapid introduction of advanced technology into the workplace.

"It is a subject that unions and employers will be dealing with at the bargaining table increasingly in future years."

THE JOINT statement of principles points out that innovations which result from the quality of worklife process will not result in layoffs or downgrading in pay or seniority of any worker, whether he or she is a participant in the process or not.

The parties named union and company coordinators to oversee projects at each AT&T subsidiary. Representing CWA are Executive Vice President John C. Carroll, Vice President W. C. Button, and Dina G. Beaumont, executive assistant to Watts.

The company and the union expressed a commitment to "providing the necessary information and training" to make quality of work life projects successful, and established a subcommittee to begin developing a training program in this area.

Carroll said that programs already are in place in the traffic department at Illinois Bell and in the plant department of Michigan Bell in Detroit. The major concern of the two projects, he said, is "how to make the work place a better place to work. Carroll predicted that programs would be established at every Bell company by the end of the union's current contract with AT&T.

Donald Dotson Named For Labor Dept. Post

Donald L. Dotson, a management lawyer and a former National Labor Relations Board attorney, has been nominated by President Reagan to be Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations.

Dotson, 42, has been chief labor counsel at Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. since 1976. Previously he had been a labor attorney for Western Electric and Westinghouse. He was on the NLRB staff from 1968 to 1973.

secretary-treasurer. A new position of executive vice president would be filled by Heaps.

The joint statement said the merged union's leadership would also include RWDSU Sec.-Treas. Lenore Miller and Leon Davis, now head of the RWDSU hospital union division.

Sweeney said the planned merger will "substantially" improve the bargaining power of workers in service-related fields that are traditionally low paying with many women and minority employees.

"These are the people most in need of a strong union," he said, "who stand to benefit most from the proposed merger."

HEAPS NOTED the past competition to organize health care workers and said "merger would mean that we could approach the organization and representation of workers in our jurisdiction from a position of unity and strength, instead of competitiveness."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, a former officer of the Service Employees, addressed the two boards.

The joint statement said the merger plan would geographically balance the union and create two divisions from the combined membership. One division would serve workers employed in retail, wholesale and department store jobs while the other division would serve the combined health care memberships of both the SEIU and the RWDSU.

The Intimidators

THE NEWEST WEAPON in the arsenal of the right wing is the politics of intimidation.

Its goal is to squelch dissent by persuading members of Congress that the price of disagreement is unacceptably high.

There is nothing surreptitious in the New Right's tactics. Quite the opposite, in fact. The attempted intimidation is deliberately open.

The National Conservative Political Action Committee didn't try to conceal its million-dollar negative advertising campaign to portray one senator and three House members as big spenders and "obstructors" of the Administration program. It held a news conference to announce the fact.

NOR WAS THERE any doubt as to why the campaign was being launched with a $400,000 television advertising blitz aimed at Sen. Paul Sarbanes of Maryland. Sarbanes happens to be an exceptionally able senator. But he is relatively junior in seniority, his party is a minority in the Senate, and his vote is not likely to be decisive on many issues.

It happens, however, that a populous segment of Maryland is in the Greater Washington area. Thus the anti-Sarbanes commercials will presumably be seen by other members of Congress—with the intended implication that they could be the next victims.

Ironically, the NCPAC and other New Right groups have also targeted the chairman of the House Budget Committee, James R. Jones (D-Okla.), whose conservative credentials until now have been considered impeccable.

The alternative budget that Jones supported was close to the Administration proposal. But the savage attack from the right carried a clear warning to House moderates and conservatives that no deviation will be tolerated.

Such tactics are not just political overkill. They are repugnant to the spirit and nature of American government.

. . . And Those Who Resist

THERE STILL ARE, fortunately, members of Congress who have held fast to principle and have resisted not merely overt intimidation but the much more common Capitol Hill failing of bowing to what is perceived as the prevailing political winds. Too often, the faintest breeze is mistaken for a gale.

It is refreshing to the political debate when a stalwart such as Carl Perkins, the soft-spoken chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee, tells his colleagues bluntly that President Reagan's proposed budget cuts "go beyond any rational equitable reduction."

If put into effect, the Kentucky congressman warned, "programs which have been developed and refined over decades of congressional review will be dismantled in days and weeks."

High Interest Casualties

Monopolies Manipulate Market As Smaller Firms Go Bankrupt

By Gus Tyler

ALMOST 3,000 COMPANIES went bankrupt in the first ten weeks of 1981. That's a big number: It's 63 percent more than for the same period last year which was, in turn, 53 percent more than in 1979. In other words, the number of firms that are going under is on the steady rise.

For the country as a whole, the news isn't good, of course. For the people whose business collapses, the failure is tragic. But there is still another party that suffers—that's you.

In a perverse way, these bankruptcies are inflationary. It's "perverse" because instinctively you may feel the contrary. If somebody goes out of business then that depressing fact should depress prices as receivers rush to sell whatever is on hand and to do so for whatever they can get.

BUT IT DOESN'T quite work that way. The unloading of stock is a momentary occurrence. The more lasting impact on our economy is what happens to the whole structure of the business world as thousands of small and medium size firms disappear.

We talk of "small and medium" firms because they are the ones who are dropping dead for lack of the capital they need to keep going. These lesser companies are always short on cash; they need ready credit to carry them for the slow days until they get paid by their customers.

Such small business operations are being denied the kind of opportunities for short-term borrowing that they enjoyed in the past because of the high interest rates imposed on the country by the Federal Reserve Board.

While they are pushed into bankruptcy, their giant competitors are able to survive and to occupy those places in the market they once shared with their lesser rivals. Times of bankruptcy are, therefore, also times of concentration in business ownership—a very formal and polite way of describing growing monopoly.

SUCH MONOPOLY empowers a handful of business monopolists to dominate the market place, to manipulate it, to withhold supply, to force up prices. In short, such a monopoly manufactures inflation.

The ability of such giants to survive while the dwarfs around them perish is inherent in the easier access of the big fellows to capital. Their reserves are greater; they can borrow at preferred rates from banks, even below the "prime rate;" they have officers of lending institutions on their boards.

Also, as Larry Weinberg, president of Brooklyn Economic Developments, puts it:

"Fortune 500 companies understand how to pass along the high cost of borrowing. They are sure enough of their market share that by raising their prices, they won't be pricing themselves out of business."

So they pass on the costs—to you and me.

The great irony here is that the high interest rates—set purposefully high by the Federal Reserve Board—were supposed to check inflation. Instead, they do just the opposite by hastening monopolies that spur inflation.

No Retreat on Labor's Commitment to Justice

We have learned that there is no such thing as final victory or final defeat on any issue.

We should be angered, but not surprised, by the current efforts to roll back the Voting Rights Act and to demolish affirmative action.

The enemies of civil rights and the defenders of privilege are as enduring and as energetic as we are. We never thought that centuries of prejudice and racism would vanish from our social life in a single generation.

But we have resolved that discrimination as public policy, authorized by law or by the absence of law, has gone for good. We are resolved that Congress shall make no law that permits the return of that ancient disgrace and repeal no law that prevents it.

Nor do we believe that the American people, somehow, overnight, have lost their fundamental sense of decency and abandoned their historic commitment to human rights, social and economic justice, and equal opportunity.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, Apr. 29, 1981.

Victim of Regulatory Reform

Price-Tag Logic Supplants Nation's Promise on OSHA

Excerpts from an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue to an Industrial Union Dept. "Victims Vigil" function protesting sharp rollbacks in OSHA protections.

THE 10th ANNIVERSARY of the landmark safety and health law should be the cause for celebration of gains made and plans laid for a future that would bring OSHA to its noble goal.

Instead, we are facing a grim threat as we see the outline of an all-out attack on the law by the new OSHA administration.

We assemble to resist that attack and we see clearly the lines of that struggle. It is our job to keep OSHA what it's supposed to be—a guarantee to every American worker of safe and healthful conditions on the job.

ANY FAITHFUL reading of the history of OSHA will reveal that we have never come close to that goal of safe and healthy worksites. Administered in its fledging years in a manner akin to sabotage, OSHA moved quickly into an era that might be called malignant attention.

Throughout the 1970s there were repeated and concerted attempts in every forum—legislative, judicial and executive—to delay the achievement of that safe and healthful workplace. It took every form known to the devious mind of man: exemptions by size of workforce, a starving for funds, a limit of inspectors and inspections and a seemingly endless string of lawsuits and other methods of delay on even the most minimal of standards.

In short, it was not until recent years that OSHA began to take the shape the 1970 law intended. That came about only because of the commitment of Labor Sec. Ray Marshall and the effectiveness of the American worker's best friend in safety and health, Eula Bingham.

Now, in 1981, another era has unfolded and it is, as you heard this morning, the worst so far—an outrageous and wholesale attempt to undo everything that OSHA promises. This attack has come in the name of balanced budgets, regulatory "reform" and cost effectiveness.

IT IS OUR JOB to counter that with the fact that OSHA is not obligated to smooth the processes of the corporate or federal office—but to the higher calling of saving workers' lives.

The purpose of the IUD's weekly vigil is to recall a few of the victims who have died because America has not fulfilled its 10-year-old commitment to the safe and healthful workplace.

Let me read a different list of victims—the OSHA standards that have already been jettisoned in whole or in part in the first 100 days of the new OSHA administration:

- Federal "right-to-know" hazards identification proposal: withdrawn.
- Hearing conservation protections: illegally postponed.
- Walkaround compensation: proposed that standard be revoked.
- Conveyor standard: cancel rulemaking hearings, extend period for more "comment."
- Proposed withdrawal of Indiana State Plan: extend "comments," withdraw complaints.
- Proposed amendments on cancer policy: withdrawn.
- Lead standard: petition Supreme Court to vacate lower court decision and reconsider entire standard on cost-benefit grounds.
- Cotton dust: petition Supreme Court to defer decision, again on cost-benefit grounds.

In addition to gutting standards, the Administration is trying its hand at a new game—censorship. Excellent worker education films, slide shows and publications produced by OSHA under Dr. Bingham have been ordered locked up or destroyed. Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne C. Auchter said OSHA cotton dust publications were biased because the cover showed a textile worker who had brown lung. Calling the picture "offensive," Auchter ordered the publications destroyed.

IT BECOMES quite clear that the federal government has switched sides. A law designed to protect workers has been twisted to say that the employer must be "protected" from the workers' quest for a safe and healthy workplace. Protection of workers will only be required if it's economically efficient for employers to do so. Benefits must outweigh costs and the cheapest method, regardless of its effectiveness, may well be good enough.

In other words, instead of engineering problems out of the workplace, the new OSHA proposes redesigning the worker by slapping on a respirator.

In the double-speak of 1981, that's called "getting the government off our backs."

THE EVENTS of 1981 come as no surprise to us and instead serve only to cement our resolve that we will see OSHA do its intended job of helping workers to live healthy and productive lives.

When we speak of people whose lives are not long enough, we are talking primarily about the exposed workers—about the 35,000 Americans who already have brown lung disease or the 800,000 workers who are daily exposed to the dangers of lead, to mention only two of the latest and more devastating actions by the new OSHA Administration.

But there are others whose lives are not long enough and they are not the victims, but part of the problem. They are the corporate and political figures whose frantic pursuit of their own goals—high short-term profits or re-election—leaves them far short of the frame of reference needed on issues so vital. It is left to us to see the longer view—and we play that role, too. That's why all of us in the trade union movement have a special responsibility to focus on the longer view and to insist upon humane government. That's why we must speak out now against the Administration's effort to put a price tag on the lives of American workers.

For Minorities, Women

Reagan Budget Cuts Threaten Skilled Trades Outreach Effort

APPRENTICE OUTREACH programs that have brought more than 100,000 women and minorities into the skilled trades in recent years will be wiped out or cut to little more than token levels if Congress approves the Administration's budget, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard declared.

Pollard pointed out that federal assistance for outreach programs has been supported by every President from John F. Kennedy through Jimmy Carter. He scored the Administration's abrupt shift "at a time when the nation needs these programs more than ever."

Noting that unemployment among black teenagers is now over 40 percent, Pollard declared that the apprenticeship programs have given "young blacks, Hispanics and other minorities the important ingredient of hope." He also pointed out that the workers who have found careers through outreach apprenticeships "have, as taxpayers, brought more money into the government than the government has put into their training."

QUESTIONED BY reporters on Labor News Conference, Pollard said that as more light is thrown on the effect of various budget cuts at the local level, more people are responding against them. He said that groups that at first thought that they would not be touched by the Reagan budget cuts now realize that they will be affected.

Pollard said that unemployment continues to be one of the most acute problems in the minority community, but "we're not going to put people to work by cutting the budget." Where there is waste, that should be eliminated, he said, but "extremism in any form is not going to be helpful" in making the nation strong, viable and competitive.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE, or partial replacement of lost wages for workers who are out of a job through no fault of their own, has been regarded as a basic right in this country for more than 40 years.

Nevertheless, this right is being chipped away. One of the last acts of the lameduck 96th Congress was to cut back certain jobless benefit protections, including the elimination of extended benefits for a worker who leaves his job "voluntarily," and ending federal funding for benefits to workers whose CETA jobs are terminated.

Now Congress is considering even more drastic changes, proposed by the Reagan Administration, which would deny or cut off jobless benefits for more than a million workers during the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1. Hardest hit would be workers unemployed for long periods as a result of economic recession and of problems in particular industries such as auto.

These hard-pressed workers will suffer even more if Congress goes along with proposals to slash and undermine the extended benefits program enacted in 1970 on a permanent basis.

Further, the Administration proposes to extend to recipients of regular unemployment benefits a measure enacted by the lameduck Congress which requires recipients of extended benefits to take jobs at the minimum wage level or at the level of their weekly benefit, whichever is higher. States would be forced to impose this requirement after a jobless worker's 13th week of benefits.

In 27 states, unemployment benefits are so low that every recipient would be forced into a minimum wage job or lose all entitlement to benefits. If the proposed requirement were now in effect, it is estimated that about one million experienced workers would have to take minimum wage jobs.

NOT ONLY THAT, a basic tenet of the unemployment insurance system would be lost—that is, to preserve the skills of workers until they can find another suitable job. Lost skills and qualifications would mean large losses in lifetime earnings which never could be recovered, a labor expert noted in recent testimony before a House Ways & Means subcommittee.

In order to force jobless workers into minimum wage level jobs, the Administration—which has been striving mightily to change the meaning of words like "truly needy" and "safety net"—wants to change the meaning of the "suitable work" provision contained in most state unemployment insurance regulations.

Lawrence E. Weatherford, the Labor Dept.'s new deputy assistant secretary for employment and training, freely acknowledged that the Administration proposal would redefine "suitable work" to mean any minimum wage job or jobless benefit level.

IN CONGRESSIONAL testimony, the AFL-CIO pointed out how contradictory it is for the Reagan Administration, a self-proclaimed champion of transferring power from the federal government to the states, to propose using the mechanism of federal standards to "force states to withdraw the protections that unemployed workers now have."

It would be bitterly ironic, the federation asserted, if Congress—which has ignored repeated pleas of presidential commissions and of organized labor to enact minimum federal unemployment benefit standards—takes further steps backward to force states to slash existing protections for the jobless.

Instead of raising federal and state trigger levels for extended benefits, Congress should lower them, the federation said.

Further, labor's long-standing proposal for a permanent extended benefit program which would extend coverage for up to 65 weeks makes much sense today as workers struggle through the nation's second highest jobless level since the Depression.

To cushion the cruel effects of economic downturns and changing employment patterns, the unemployment insurance system should be strengthened, not weakened.

ONLY TOKEN LEVELS of outreach apprenticeships in the skilled trades can be expected if Congress approves the Administration's budget, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Pollard was questioned by Warren Brown, left, of the Washington Post and Michael Posner of Reuters news agency. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

RAIL LABOR RALLY on the Capitol's West Front heard Chairman Fred Kroll of the Railway Labor Executives' Association warn that President Reagan's budget cuts will destroy Conrail and Amtrak, putting some 70,000 railroad workers out of jobs and threatening the railroad retirement system. The labor leaders near the rostrum include AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. Other rallies and demonstrations were held across the United States.

20,000 Rail Workers March, Rally In Capitol Hill Protest of Cutbacks

budget at the expense of economic prosperity," he declared. "We are here to remind the Congress that how national revenues will be spent ultimately resides in the hands of the people."

Following the rally, which was coordinated with demonstrations and news conferences in major cities across the United States, the railroad unionists visited congressmen and senators from their home states to urge sufficient funding for continued operation of Conrail, Amtrak, and the railroad retirement system.

EVEN AS the rail workers marched outside the Capitol, though, the Senate Commerce Committee voted to concur in the Administration's reduced budget for Amtrak. Despite Democratic objections, the committee voted 10 to 4 to approve $613 million for the line's operations in the 1982 fiscal year, exactly what President Reagan requested.

Kroll told the rally that the shrunken budget, if eventually approved by Congress, would mean the immediate loss of 11,000 jobs. The Amtrak funding plan would kill most of the nation's passenger routes next fall, and allow Amtrak to negotiate with rail labor unions to cut labor protection payments—possibly saving $75 million—by providing lump-sum payments to laid-off workers.

The Washington rally exceeded anticipated turnout estimates of the sponsoring Railway Labor Executives' Association, and was preceded by a half-hour, placard-waving parade from Union Station to the Capitol. Police said that the number of participants ranged between 15,000 and 20,000.

AS THE MARCH got underway, with Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, and the heads of over a dozen affiliated unions in the lead, the demonstrators rolled their voices in unison as if preparing for the kick-off at a football game, and periodically imitated the "whoo-whoo" of a train whistle. Many of the workers wore conductors' or engineers' caps, and carried picket signs or sported red-and-white Polish "Solidarnosc" (Solidarity) buttons. Most of the railway employees came from the heavily traveled Northeast.

"Upgrade, Don't Degrade, Our Railroads," one sign read. "A Strong Nation Needs a Strong Railroad," another said. Members of Local 744 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Philadelphia admonished the President in another: "This Isn't Hollywood & Vine. You Can Afford to Lose Your Job. But I Cannot Lose Mine. Investigate Conrail's Management."

At a pre-rally session led by labor troubadour Joe Glazer, the railroaders joined in singing "Solidarity Forever," "This Land is Your Land," and several of his improvised verses of the rally's theme song, "I've Been Working on the Railroad."

"And I want to keep on working on the railroad," they sang. "Soon no one will be working on the railroad . . . and I'll be singing those Amtrak blues."

President Fred A. Hardin of the United Transportation Union introduced Kirkland, saying that the latter's presence demonstrated that "not only is rail labor together, but all of American labor is together" on this issue.

THE FIGHT to save America's railroads and the jobs of American workers "is not a narrow trade union issue affecting only a small segment of our society," Kirkland stressed.

"This is not an exercise in nostalgia for the bygone days of Casey Jones and John Henry," he said. "This is a rally about the future of our society. Today, even more than yesterday, a strong rail system is essential to meeting our most important national goals."

Every other industrialized country in the world recognizes its rail transportation as a basic national resource, Kirkland said. Germany, Japan, Great Britain, France and other nations support their rail systems through national budgets, "and maybe that's one reason why they're beating us in international competition," he added. What the Administration is doing makes no sense, Kirkland said.

Kroll, who also is president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, told the gathering that railroad workers today are confronted with the most anti-labor legislative threats in U.S. history.

"TODAY'S BATTLE is not just one of a balanced budget and budget cuts," he said. "It is one of a conservative ideology being forced upon the American people which, if successful, will create two classes in America—the poor and the very rich, the have-nots and the elitists."

In its proposals, the Administration wants to cut Amtrak passenger service to such an extent that all routes outside the Boston-Washington corridor would be eliminated, leaving hundreds of communities without service and thousands of workers jobless.

The Administration also wants to dismantle Conrail, selling off as many lines as possible to other carriers. Meanwhile, it would cut funding so that freight service to some communities would have to be done away with, jobs eliminated, and remaining employees forced to give up wage increases, benefits, and job protections.

ILG Prods Donovan on Cut In Wage-Hour Inspections

New York—Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan got a first-hand look at sweatshops where illegal aliens and sometimes young children toil for a fraction of the federal minimum wage, and voiced shock and anger at what he saw.

The Secretary of Labor promised to meet with members of Congress to try to get "more teeth" put into the wage-hour law and "much more severe" punishments for violators.

President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers suggested that as a starter Donovan might do something to stop the scheduled cutback of more than 30 employees in the New York regional office of the Labor Dept.'s wage-hour division.

"IF THE SECRETARY of Labor and the Republican Administration are sincere in trying to root out the burgeoning new sweatshops in our major metropolitan areas," Chaikin said, "it is strange that they are cutting the Dept. of Labor budget for inspectors whose job is to pinpoint wage-hour law violations."

Donovan accompanied a Labor Dept. "sweatshop strike force team" on a raid in New York's Chinatown and told a news conference that he found young children and old women working for $1 an hour and "bogus" employee time cards already punched out for the afternoon.

Donovan urged "self-policing" of conditions by garment manufacturers and unions, and said that "if we can get this economy going, we could offer some hope to sweatshop workers for jobs that will pay them at least the minimum wage."

Donovan Appoints Collyer To Key Labor Dept. Post

Robert Burns Collyer was appointed Deputy Under Secretary of Labor for the Employment Standards Administration by Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan.

Collyer will be responsible for the Labor Dept.'s programs in the areas of workers' compensation, wage and hour enforcement and federal contract compliance, among others.

Tax Proposals Seen Counter To Objectives

Tax cuts to business under Reagan Administration proposals run counter to the goals of strengthening American industry, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald told a House subcommittee.

The proposed tax cuts would substantially distort business investment decisions, change relative tax burdens, and make reindustrialization of America's economic base more difficult, Oswald declared.

"Larger, more prosperous, capital-intensive firms would reap huge benefits while smaller, labor-intensive firms would benefit very little," he said.

As for the Administration's proposed individual income tax reduction, Oswald said that the 10-percent a year, across-the-board cuts would not help some 15 million low-income working Americans. They would be among the first to feel the adverse impact of the Administration's cuts in social programs, he said.

Middle-income workers would receive token cuts and only the wealthiest would benefit significantly. "Clearly a scheme which gives more to those at the top—in absolute as well as relative terms—cannot be considered fair or even-handed," Oswald observed.

THE SO-CALLED "supply side" notion that such cuts in marginal tax rates would entice more people into the labor force and encourage them to work harder ignores the fact that there are nearly eight million Americans looking for work, four million more on part-time schedules because full-time work is not available, and over one million workers who have dropped out of the labor force because the search for jobs was futile, he added.

In his appearance before the House Energy & Commerce subcommittee, Oswald noted that while the need for an extensive reindustrialization effort has been widely recognized, there is no consensus on the policies needed to achieve this goal. This lack of consensus, he suggested, stems from different perceptions as to whether there is something wrong on the supply side of the economy.

THE AFL-CIO'S position is that there are sectoral and regional problems in the economy and that, if tax cuts are to play an efficient role in the nation's reindustrialization efforts, they must be targeted to those industries that are essential to an industrial economy and are in need of this assistance, Oswald said.

He outlined the AFL-CIO's proposal for a tripartite Reindustrialization Board to channel public and private funds into reindustrialization projects, especially in areas most in need.

The board, made up of representatives of business, labor and government, would have initial authority to allocate $5 billion in tax expenditures and an additional $5 billion in loans, loan guarantees and interest subsidies. Emphasis would be on basic industries, and allocation decisions would include factors such as eliminating capacity bottlenecks, helping new U.S. industries with a high growth potential, and aiding firms that have difficulty competing because of unfair foreign trade practices.

AFT Member Honored As Teacher of Year

Jay Sommer, a foreign language teacher at New Rochelle High School in New York state, and a member of the American Federation of Teachers, was named 1981 National Teacher of the Year.

Sommer, who belongs to the Federation of United School Employees, the New Rochelle AFT local, was honored at a White House ceremony. The 53-year-old native of Germany grew up in Czechoslovakia, and spent the war years in a Nazi labor camp before emigrating to the United States in 1948.

Sommer, who speaks 10 languages fluently, was selected from more than 150,000 teachers. AFT President Albert Shanker observed that the honor was another indication that public schools are able to attract and keep teachers of high quality.

The Reagan Budget

Reversing 50 Years of History

This analysis of the impact of the Reagan Administration economic program was prepared by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. It is one of a series by the AFL-CIO News as a follow-up to recommendations stemming from AFL-CIO regional conferences.

The real issue of the Reagan budget is not whether it will cure inflation, which it probably won't, but what it does to the relationship between the American people and our government.

According to our new Administration, the root of our economic trouble is the federal government. Get the government off our backs by reducing government programs, the President says, and people will solve their problems on their own.

FUNDAMENTALLY it is a denial of 50 years of history. Almost a half-century ago, at the time of the Great Depression and the New Deal, America made two basic decisions: first, that we had a responsibility to help those in need, and second, that we could best exercise that responsibility not through individual acts but through government programs. We made those decisions partly out of our humanitarian heritage, and partly out of the hard-won knowledge that all of us benefit from a healthier and happier society.

No one today would claim that every government program is 100 percent on target or that there is not one ounce of waste in the government colossus. But on the other hand, no one should claim that the government itself is the problem, or that our needs will disappear if government activity is scaled down.

The particular tragedy of the Reagan budget is that in reversing a half-century of experience, it takes special aim at the poor, the disadvantaged and the unemployed.

THE LIST OF proposed cuts is long and dismal: job training, public service jobs, special jobs programs for youth, unemployment insurance; special educational programs for the disadvantaged, assistance to poor students; help for small business, cooperatives, housing rehabilitation, rural electrification, family farmers; food stamps, school lunches, certain social security benefits, help for single-parent families and for the disadvantaged, health services.

The Reagan Administration economic program is an attempt to turn back the clock to the 1920s and earlier, and like all efforts to turn back the clock it is doomed to failure.

The second issue is whether the budget cuts will cure inflation. Cut expenditures, balance the budget, end inflation—that's the conservative pitch. It sounds reasonable, and according to the polls, it has obviously influenced a lot of Americans.

THE TROUBLE is that it's false. There is no evidence that an unbalanced budget causes inflation, or that a balanced budget will help cure it. In past years the United States has had unbalanced budgets without inflation—and we've had inflation with balanced budgets. The same thing has been true of other industrialized nations. Inflation and the government budget are not necessarily related.

Administration spokesmen are fond of saying that if the typical American family planned its budget like the government, it would go broke. The fact is that few American families could survive on a balanced budget. If we couldn't borrow money to buy houses and automobiles, most of us would be living in tents and walking to work.

Instead of reducing inflation, some of the budget cuts could well fuel more inflation. Inflation is partially caused by the decline in productivity, which in turn can be traced to inadequate research, bad management and the deterioration of our industrial base, such as energy and transportation facilities.

BY REDUCING support for railroads and mass transit, for urban reconstruction, low-cost housing, rural economic growth and the development of alternate energy and water resources, the Administration program will undermine our efforts to improve productivity. That could lead to more inflation.

Then the Reagan program will be exposed for what it is, an effort to reallocate the nation's resources away from those at the lower end of the economic ladder into the hands of special interests, big business and the wealthy.

Enforcement Cut First Step To Dismantling of OSHA

How much is it worth to protect a human life? When President Carter left office he proposed that the world's wealthiest nation spend $242.6 million next year on the Occupational Safety & Health Administration. That's a little over $4 for each worker to be protected.

President Reagan's proposed budget provided somewhat less: $3.80 a worker ($228 million). Now that the deregulators are running, they are out of control. Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), who chairs the Senate Labor subcommittee that is supposed to protect the safety of workers, has persuaded his committee to set a new value on protecting human beings: $2.80 ($171 million).

THE REAGAN BUDGET would make those cuts by taking funds from New Directions grants and educational assistance to unions and even the employers, from standards setting and federal enforcement.

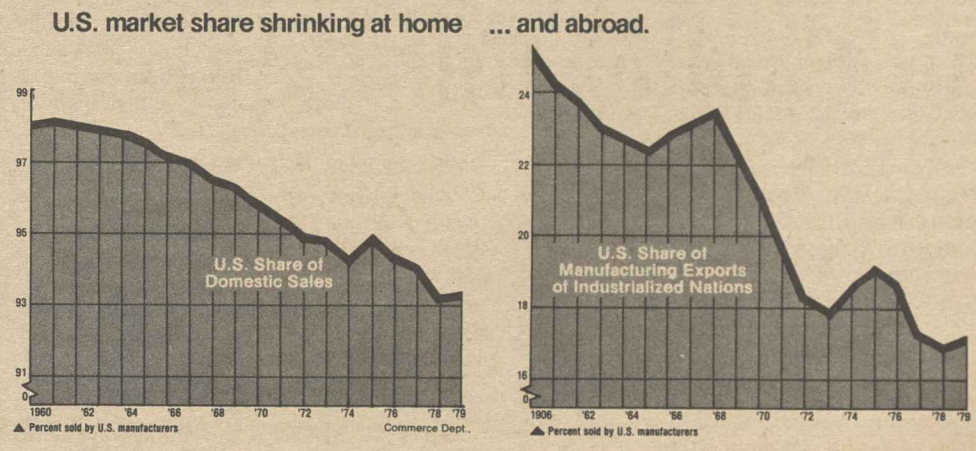
By 1982, the OSHA staff would be cut by 250. In a Feb. 26 letter to OMB Director David Stockman, Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan made very clear that most of the cuts would come from enforcement. He proposed 16,500 fewer federal inspections for 1982.

Reversing the mandate of the Act by administrative fiat, the Secretary is—in effect—calling for a dismantling of the federal safety effort and a return to the pre-OSHA days of state-by-state enforcement coupled with voluntary compliance.

THE STATES are being asked to increase their responsibility for enforcement with virtually no federal monitoring. Donovan's letter to Stockman goes further: "A major thrust of the 1982 OSHA budget is to reflect the agency's intention to place emphasis on expanded voluntary compliance activities . . . to achieve agency goals."

There is no evidence from any demonstration now or in the past that voluntary compliance works.

The Mine Safety & Health Administration, also under Donovan's protection, is being forced to accept proportionately larger cuts which will result in nearly 20,000 fewer mine inspections, an action that would reverse the current downward trend of death and injury in the nation's mines and mills.



IN INDIANA, the new OSHA responded to two successful lawsuits by beginning the process of withdrawing approval of the state plan. The AFL-CIO and the IUD sued the government to enforce the "as-effective-as" federal program provision of the law.

The Reagan Administration's OSHA not only has stopped the process of withdrawing federal approval of the ineffective Indiana plan, but has already shut down the OSHA offices in Ft. Wayne, Gary and Evansville, reducing the federal staff from 40 to eight. OSHA earlier had found that after six years of operation the state has a "consistent pattern of poor performance in critical program areas."

Federal staff in the remaining states running OSHA programs would be cut roughly in half.

The other half of the federal safety and health program, the National Institute for Safety & Health, isn't even mentioned by name in the Reagan budget. It got its budget slashed anyway (by a third). Always treated like a poor cousin, it is the only national institute that in fact is not a national institute. NIOSH is responsible for research and professional training. But the Reagan Administration doesn't want as many scientists looking under the rug of industrial decay. The Carter budget called for spending $81.5 million (less than $1.35 per worker). The $59-million Reagan budget means spending less than a dollar per worker.

The Reagan NIOSH budget cuts out all training funds, which means that all of the independent university programs (which cannot easily be controlled by Stockman's "top down" style of management) are scheduled to be eliminated.

Trade Policies Would Cost U.S. Its Competitive Edge

The Reagan Administration's early initiatives in international trade reflect a lack of awareness about the seriousness of America's international trade challenges.

The plan to dismantle the already inadequate Trade Adjustment Assistance (TAA) program reflects a callous disregard for the hundreds of thousands of American workers who lose their jobs because of increased imports. The failure to pursue aggressively limitations on Japanese auto and parts imports reveals an underlying "free trade" philosophy that is simply unrealistic in today's world, particularly in United States trade with Japan.

AND THE PROPOSED weakening of government export financing through the Export-Import Bank will mean the loss of billions of dollars of export sales of big-ticket capital goods such as nuclear plants and telecommunications systems.

Trade Adjustment Assistance is the main support that stands between American workers and disaster when imports take their jobs. More than 600,000 workers have been certified for TAA benefits since 1975. And import-impacted workers have less skill, lower incomes, and are more likely to be older, minority and female. This means they have a harder readjustment burden. Reagan's answer in a time of increasing import pressures is not to strengthen and improve the program, but to reduce it drastically.

A MILLION American workers in the auto and parts industries have lost their jobs due to auto imports, primarily from Japan. Two months ago President Reagan's Cabinet officers told us that limitations on Japanese auto imports were imminent. Now we hear that the government is reluctant to ask the Japanese for such reductions, preferring to wait for Japan to take action on its own initiative. The wait has already lasted three months. Nearly a million laid off auto and parts workers can't afford that wait.

The Export-Import Bank is America's only weapon in a spreading export credits war. France, Japan, Germany and the United Kingdom each use subsidized government credits to finance about 30 percent of their manufactured exports. The U.S. provides Ex-Im credits for only about 4 percent of our manufactured exports. Just as we move toward international negotiations next month to limit these government export credit subsidies, the Reagan Administration has proposed a 25-percent cut in Ex-Im bank financing.

Productivity Goals Retarded Under Budget Retrenchment

Government programs to strengthen U.S. productivity gains will be eliminated or drastically curtailed under the federal budget proposals of President Reagan.

Programs for developing new technologies have been targeted for dramatic slashes, while support for industries with the highest rates of job creation and productivity growth is also being cut back. A worse future for American industry and American workers will result if these proposals are implemented.

NEW TECHNOLOGY development will be dramatically curtailed by budget reductions in the National Science Foundation and National Aeronautics & Space Administration.

The Office of Science & Technology is scheduled for elimination from the Commerce Dept., while research and development support for new energy technologies —solar, geothermal, wind, biomass, shale oil and others—will be cut in the Dept. of Energy.

America's industrial strength has always been linked to technological advances of the kinds promoted by these government agencies. High-technology industries—from aerospace and computers to telecommunications and modern textiles—have formed the backbone of our international competitive posture. These budget cuts will weaken industry and jobs prospects in just those industries where we normally have competed successfully.

THE SAME pattern reappears in the cuts proposed for the Economic Development Administration, the Housing & Urban Development Dept. and the Small Business Administration. These agencies provide support—through investment in roads, utilities, and site development—for new industries in our cities and in areas seeking to attract new industry after plant closings and other job losses.

Small business, which provides almost all the job creation and a large share of the innovation in the U.S. manufacturing sector will be virtually stripped of much-needed support.

'Budget Discrimination' Challenged by Kirkland

The Administration's budget and tax program amounts to discrimination across the board—against everybody except the truly rich, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged in an address at the 31st annual meeting of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights (LCCR).

"Its entire economic program rests on the premise that budget cuts are needed to finance tax cuts that afflict the afflicted and comfort the comfortable," Kirkland said at an award dinner honoring the AFL-CIO on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the modern American labor movement.

"THERE IS NO income tax cut for 15 million low-income wage earners who are paying higher social security taxes and who are expected to absorb the loss of the assistance they need from social programs facing the budget axe," Kirkland said.

"Those in the middle are also shortchanged. They will feel the cuts in school budgets and essential public services. They will pay far more to heat their homes and drive their cars than they will receive in income tax cuts, thanks to the Administration's decontrol of oil and natural gas."

In accepting the LCCR's 1981 Hubert H. Humphrey Civil Rights Award in behalf of the federation, Kirkland observed that labor misses the eloquent voice of the late Vice President and Democratic Senator from Minnesota, particularly on Capitol Hill, where the Reagan budget battle is being waged.

"THOSE WHO SHARE the goals of Hubert Humphrey are out of power, and the opponents of those goals are in," said Kirkland. "We accept that as a natural hazard of the democratic process that has made our progress possible and, like Hubert Humphrey, the perennial happy warrior, we look forward to the next round.

"We are not strangers to legislative disappointment. It hardens our resolves. We have faced worse odds and more intransigent opposition than we face today."

The inscription on the award presented to Kirkland cited the AFL-CIO for "unwavering support of equal rights, equal opportunity, and equal justice for all."

Founded in 1950 by A. Philip Randolph, Roy Wilkins, and Arnold Aronson, the Leadership Conference is a coalition of 150 national organizations representing blacks, Asian and Hispanic Americans, labor, the major religious groups, women, the elderly, the handicapped and minority businesses and professions seeking to advance civil rights for all Americans through enactment and enforcement of federal legislation.

Nineteen-eighty-one is the centennial year of American labor—the 100th anniversary of the founding on Nov. 15, 1881, of the Federation of Organized Trade & Labor Unions, which became the American Federation of Labor five years later.

KIRKLAND NOTED that labor's oldest ally in the civil rights struggle, the NAACP, is about to turn 72 and that the LCCR itself—"the most effective and successful coalition in American history"—has been in business for nearly a third of a century.

The 500 delegates to the LCCR legislative strategy meeting also honored Eleanor Holmes Norton, former chairperson of the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and Clarence M. Mitchell, Jr., whose retirement as LCCR chairman was announced during the meeting. NAACP Exec. Director Benjamin L. Hooks was elected to fill out the remainder of Mitchell's unexpired term.

Sen. Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.) and House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter Rodino (D-N.J.) spoke on civil rights priorities in the 97th Congress. A panel followed on civil rights enforcement problems and how they affect blacks, women, the aged, the handicapped and language minorities.

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio), Rep. Louis Stokes (D-Ohio), and UAW Legislative Director Richard Warden discussed the Reagan budget cut proposals and their impact on the poor and minorities.

A special tribute was paid to Marvin Caplan, legislative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and former director of the Leadership Conference. President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers, an LCCR executive committee member, was master of ceremonies.

Attack on Davis-Bacon Act Seen as Pay-Cutting Tactic

ments are among the frequent victims, he noted.

While these abuses are the exceptions now, Georgine warned that the exploitation would be done legally if the prevailing wage law were scuttled and contracts went regularly to the employer paying the lowest wages and providing the fewest benefits.

Because of the Davis-Bacon Act, he stressed, efficiency and quality of work becomes the criterion for awarding contracts and the public interest is served.

AS FOR CLAIMED savings to the government in the cost of construction, Georgine reminded the panel of the experience in 1971, when Davis-Bacon requirements were temporarily suspended by an Executive Order of President Nixon.

During that period, rebids were directed on 1,263 projects that had originally been put out for bids under prevailing wage requirements. The "savings" came to only six-tenths of 1 percent, Georgine testified.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which has regularly opposed any increase in the basic federal minimum wage, attacked the Davis-Bacon Act as "a superminimum wage law" and urged its repeal. The business group also urged repeal of the Service Contract Act, which provides comparable safeguards on government service contracts.

THE ADMINISTRATION has not supported repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act, so the current hearings are not expected to result in floor action this year. But foes of prevailing wage laws, including open-shop contractors, have been pressing for administrative changes by the Labor Dept. in the law's enforcement.

Georgine noted, however, that a number of local and national contractor organizations strongly support continued prevailing wage standards so that in order to win government contracts they won't have to replace skilled and experienced construction workers with people willing to work for substandard wages.

The law's enforcement "should be strengthened," Georgine said, "rather than being weakened."

House Pressed to Support Additional Budget Funding

The AFL-CIO pressed House members to reject an Administration-supported budget resolution and support attempts to add funds for endangered programs.

Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed the concern of the AFL-CIO and its Budget Coalition allies at "the massive cuts in services and the loss of more than one million jobs that will result" if the Reagan budget or the slightly reshuffled version supported by House Republicans should be enacted.

"WE HAVE detailed our anger and our opposition before every possible public and congressional forum," Denison wrote House members as the budget debate began. His letter dealt with three principal options that are being put before the House under a restrictive rule allowing only specified amendments.

The basic bill, supported by Budget Committee Chairman James R. Jones (D-Okla.), was described by Denison as "a small step in the right direction of lessening the devastation and inequity contained in the Reagan Administration budget and tax proposals."

But the House may not ever get to a vote on that proposal, which is supported by the Democratic leadership.

First it will vote on a substitute resolution, sponsored by Rep. Delbert L. Latta (Ohio), the ranking Republican on the Budget Committee and co-sponsored by a conservative Democratic supporter of the Reagan program, Phil Gramm (Tex.).

THIS IS the measure President Reagan called on the House to adopt in his televised address to a joint session of Congress on Apr. 28.

"We embrace and fully support" the Latta-Gramm substitute, Reagan said. "The old and comfortable way" of dealing with a budget is for Congress to "shave a little here and add a little there," Reagan said. But "that way is no longer acceptable."

Denison wrote House members that the Republican substitute imperils "programs that train, employ, feed and house moderate and low-income workers and the poor, and which sustain economic development in the cities, towns and rural areas."

He urged adoption of the amendment that will be offered by Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) to restore some of the worst damage of the Reagan proposals.

The Obey substitute would add funds for programs including unemployment insurance, low-income energy assistance, education programs, Medicaid, programs for the elderly, housing programs, railroad funds, sewer treatment construction grants among others.

Denison said the AFL-CIO supports all efforts to restore funds for jobs and programs to help individuals and their communities "so long as those funds do not come at the expense of other areas in the budget."

House Republicans have been trying to woo Democratic votes for their measure by arguing that the President has a "mandate" from the voters for his program.

Denison challenged that position. "There was no mandate from American voters to dismember programs past Congresses have carefully developed," he wrote, or "to redistribute income to the already wealthy."

The election's mandate was "to repair an economic system torn by high inflation and high interest rates," he suggested. But these problems are not dealt with by the Republican budget, Denison stressed.

A scattering of moderate Republicans in the House are expected to break with the Administration on the budget votes. But Republicans are counting on a greater number of defections by conservative Democrats to tilt the decision the other way.

Postmaster Rebuffed On Bargaining Ploy

The National Labor Relations Board's regional director in Baltimore dismissed the petition of the U.S. Postal Service for a new bargaining unit determination, a move which the Postal Workers, Letter Carriers and Mail Handlers viewed as an 11th-hour maneuver to stall new contract talks.

The regional director, Louis J. D'Amico, gave the USPS through May 13 to appeal the decision to the full board. In his finding, D'Amico said that the petition to determine a new bargaining unit did not meet the board's requirements for seeking such an election.

The three AFL-CIO unions, as well as the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, had filed counter-petitions with the NLRB charging that the management action was designed to delay bargaining for months, if not years, and accused Postmaster Gen. William Bolger with contempt for the collective-bargaining process.

The unions seek to renew contracts that expire on July 20. USPS negotiators boycotted the opening session of the contract talks on Apr. 22, saying they would not attend any bargaining session until the NLRB responded to its petition.

Council Scores Donovan Move To Wipe Out Labor Standards

Assails Bid To Permit 'Homework'

By John M. Barry

Baltimore—The AFL-CIO charged that Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan's plan to scuttle the 40-year-old ban against industrial homework in the women's apparel and other industries would resurrect "kitchen sweatshops" throughout the country.

The council, in a statement adopted at its two-day spring meeting here, warned that Donovan's actions threaten "to undermine and ultimately destroy traditional standards protecting workers, employers and consumers."

FEDERATION President Lane Kirkland told reporters that Donovan's May 1 announcement of his proposal to lift the restrictions on homework came as a complete surprise to organized labor.

"We were not consulted," Kirkland said at a news conference during the council meeting. "We were not asked our opinion. We were not given the opportunity to explain our side of the case."

He agreed, in response to a question, that although Donovan pledged when he took office that he would never "blindside" organized labor, he had in fact done so.

KIRKLAND SAID that this and other actions Donovan has taken "are deeply disturbing to us. . . . They certainly do not reflect a thorough appreciation of the statutory role of the Secretary of Labor, which is to defend and advance the interests of working people. . . . It seems apparent to me that he is defending and advancing interests quite in conflict with those of working people."

Kirkland accused the Reagan Administration of using the Labor Dept. "as one of the instruments for an attack on our basic working standards, particularly those in the case of brown lung and industrial homework, which protect some of the most underprivileged workers in this country."

He told reporters that the council had discussed plans for the federation to lead a rally later this year to protest the Ad-

Interest Hike Puts Squeeze On Economy

By James M. Shevis

The Federal Reserve Board's latest tightening of the nation's money supply moves the economy closer to another recession, the AFL-CIO warned.

The federal government will have to pay more for its borrowings and record interest rates will crimp the buying power of millions of Americans, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

"PROSPECTIVE homeowners will be further squeezed on mortgages that are fast becoming short-term borrowings with variable interest charges. State and local governments are being squeezed out of the market by the high cost of money, thus postponing many urgent projects," Oswald said.

"And the United States further escalates the worldwide high interest war that appeals to speculators and high rollers."

With inflation 4 percentage points lower than its peak of a year ago, the Fed earlier this week announced a full 1-percent increase in its discount rate, bringing the bellwether rate to a new peak of 14 percent. In addition, the central bank hiked from 3 to 4 percent the penalty surcharge for banks that borrow frequently from its "discount window."

In announcing its discount-rate boost, the Fed said that it acted "in light of the current levels in short-term market interest rates" and "the need to maintain restraint in the monetary and credit aggregates."

THE FED'S move coincided with increases in the prime lending rate of most large commercial banks from 18 to 19 percent. Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan warned that the prime — the rate that

Program Funds Slashed

Conservatives in House Win Budget Showdown

By David L. Perlman

A bipartisan conservative coalition demonstrated its control of the House of Representatives by ramming through the drastic budget slashes that the Reagan Administration demanded.

The House voted 253-176 for spending ceilings and program cutbacks that the AFL-CIO warned will imperil job and job-related training programs, thrust the needy deeper into poverty, curtail housing assistance, reduce transportation services and cut off economic development in cities and rural areas alike.

FINAL DETAILS of the program cuts will be shaped in later congressional action, but the House-passed bill instructs its committees to cut back programs and rewrite laws so as to reduce spending by $36.6 billion in the fiscal year starting Oct. 1. Nearly half of that is to come from programs in the jurisdiction of the Education & Labor Committee.

The 50-vote Democratic majority in the House evaporated under the White House "carrot-and-stick" lobbying tactics, and 63 Democrats joined a solid lineup of Republicans. A handful of moderate Republicans swallowed their earlier criticism of the Reagan budget and bowed to party pressure to "go along" with the President.

A less extreme budget package had been crafted by the House Budget Committee and was supported by the Democratic leadership. But it never got to a vote because the House substituted the Reagan-endorsed resolution which was cosponsored by Republican Delbert L. Latta of Ohio and Democrat Phil Gramm of Texas.

When that passed, the battle was over.

A KEY TO the sentiment of the House came on an earlier vote on the alternative that was supported by the AFL-CIO and its allies in the Budget Coalition.

As introduced by Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), it included a group of relatively moderate "add-ons" to Budget Committee

Labor Asks Enforcement, Not Relief from Regulations

America's unions aren't seeking "relief" from government regulations that protect workers, consumers and the environment, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland informed a Cabinet-level task force headed by Vice President George Bush.

Bush had asked union leaders for suggestions to achieve "the regulatory relief our economy desperately needs." His letter included documents referring to "expensive" and "controversial" OSHA rules, to "stringent" civil rights requirements imposed on firms doing business with the government, and to the "escalation" of wages under the Davis-Bacon and Service Contract Acts.

KIRKLAND TOLD the Vice President that the task force request had been considered at a meeting of AFL-CIO affiliates, at which representatives of the unaffiliated Mine Workers and Auto Workers participated. Kirkland's reply thus reflected "the position organized labor has developed."

"We do not agree that our economy needs regulatory relief," Kirkland wrote.

BUT THE NATION does need "a vigorous economy, a sound environment, equal employment opportunities, safe and healthy workplaces, decent labor-management relations, and fair and equitable treatment of consumers," he said.

Regulations to achieve these goals should be perfected, not scrapped, and then vigorously enforced, Kirkland stressed.

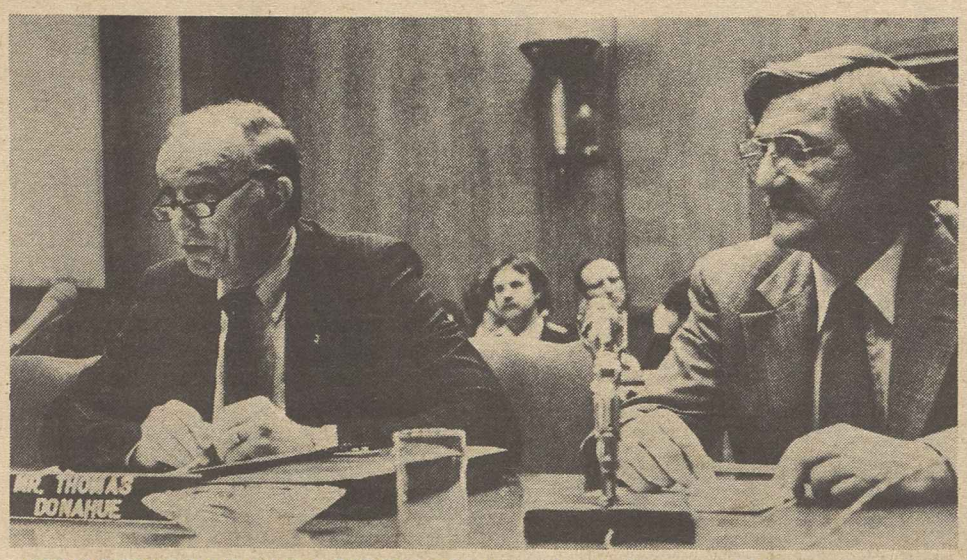
Unions Pledge Battle to Retain Cotton Dust Rule

By John R. Oravec



Brown lung victims and trade unionists put the Reagan Administration on notice that the federal cotton dust standard, or any other OSHA regulation meant to protect the safety and health of American workers, would not be given up without a fight.

"The right to a safe and healthful workplace is as basic as the right to freedom of speech, religion or a fair and speedy trial," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told several hundred demonstrators outside the Labor Dept. headquarters. Among the protesters were members of the Clothing & Textile Workers who have been disabled by the "brown lung" disease, byssinosis.

"The Bill of Rights is not predicated on cost-benefit analysis," Kirkland stressed in referring to the Administration's holdup of key cotton dust safeguards.

Unions Back Wage Deferrals In Move to Bolster Conrail

Railway labor unions agreed tentatively to give up future worker wage increases totaling $200 million a year—about 10 percent of the total payroll—to help the federally subsidized Conrail freight system become a viable private-sector railroad within the next three years.

Under the agreement, announced by Rep. James J. Florio (D-N.J.) at a Capitol Hill news conference, Conrail managers and supervisers would postpone $29 million in annual salary increases, an amount comparable to the deferral percentage agreed to by the unions.

Florio, who is chairman of the House subcommittee on commerce, transportation, and tourism, was instrumental in bringing about the accord.

FRED J. KROLL, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, said that the agreement was "a giant step" toward the preservation of the ailing freight line. He told reporters that the agreement, which must be ratified by individual unions that make up the RLEA, will encourage Congress to support Florio's bill to authorize further government assistance of about $600 million to Conrail over a two- or three-year period while the carrier makes the transition to the private sector. The federal aid would be tied to certain other goals that the railroad would have to meet besides the wage deferrals.

"Two hundred million dollars is a hell of a lot of money from the workforce—a hell of a sacrifice," Kroll said, that "we are confident . . . will create a viable Conrail." He said that presidents of 12 of 14 RLEA member unions have signed the pact and that two other unions—the Signalmen and the Locomotive Engineers—are reviewing the agreement with their attorneys.

Kroll, who is also president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, led a mass worker rally in the nation's capital a week earlier protesting proposed Administration budget cuts that would end all federal grants to Conrail after the 1981 fiscal year, and sell off much of the rail system to other companies. RLEA officials forecast that action would cost up to 50,000 jobs.

KROLL SAID that the unions agreed to the wage deferrals to avoid the "horrendous social costs" if the road stopped operating. Some 70,000 Conrail employees affected by the deferrals "would receive preferred stock in lieu of what they give up" once the line becomes a private railroad, he said.

Florio explained that, under the agreement, workers would give up the money for two or three years, depending on the life of the overall railroad labor agreement now being negotiated. Thus, the agreement could save Conrail as much as $690 million in payroll costs.

THE LABOR concessions mark "the first and most important step in seeing that Conrail reaches the point where it will no longer be dependent on the federal government," Florio said. "With this agreement, we can reach the Administration's goal of returning rail service in the region to the private sector. Without it, there would be no chance to reach the goal we all agree is necessary, the end of federal funding for Conrail."

Conrail—shorthand for Consolidated Rail Corp.—is a 17,000-mile federally planned and financed freight line in the northeast and midwest. It was created five years ago from the best lines of the Penn Central Railroad and six other bankrupt, privately run railroads. Conrail currently owes the government $3.3 billion.

L. Stanley Crane, chairman and chief executive officer of the carrier, who joined Kroll and Florio at the news conference, said that the wage deferrals would enable Conrail to "get off the federal dole and return to the private sector, which has been the objective all along. This labor agreement . . . was the absolute keystone to our future."

CONTINUED government funding of the line over the next two or three years "simply would not come unless Conrail can achieve savings," Florio said. He noted that the Administration had reached its tentative decision to sell off Conrail "on the belief that this kind of concession could not take place." There was no immediate reaction to the concession agreement from Reagan officials.

Although the wage deferrals are aimed at preventing the breakup and sale of large segments of the freight line, Crane said that the private railroad that will eventually emerge probably would have "some shrinkage in terms of miles of track." He said that he was unsure whether there would be any personnel cuts.

The 12 unions that have agreed to the concessions are BRAC, the United Transportation Union, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Maintenance of Way Employees, Firemen & Oilers, Carmen, Machinists, Transportation Workers Union, Train Dispatchers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Transport Workers, Yardmasters, and the American Railway Supervisors Association, which merged recently with BRAC.

Curbing Illegal Aliens

Firm, Fair Approach Urged on Immigration

The United States should combine a "compassionate" immigration policy with effective steps to stem the flood of illegal aliens and prevent the undermining of labor standards, the AFL-CIO urged.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue outlined at joint House-Senate hearings a 10-point AFL-CIO program for a "firm, clear, consistent and fair" immigration policy.

MANY OF ITS ingredients, he noted, were among the recommendations made last March by the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy. One of the commission's four public members was J. F. Otero, vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Donahue urged an immigration policy that would "foster reunification of families and offer haven for refugees from persecution, while adhering to the principle of concern for the welfare of American workers."

The United States is "a pluralistic society" that is "a better nation" for the contributions of its millions of immigrants, he stressed. But because illegal immigration "endangers jobs and labor standards," Donahue said, the AFL-CIO supports legislation that would include:

- Effective penalties for employers who hire illegal aliens, including criminal sanctions for repeaters.

"The lure of jobs is what brings most illegal workers into the United States. The quickest and the best way to stop illegal immigration is to stop giving jobs to illegal immigrants," the AFL-CIO said.

- An identification system for work purposes that can be checked by an employer at the time of hiring. The social security card could be used if improved and made "counterfeit-proof."

- Stronger border controls and increased funding for the Immigration & Naturalization Service. The AFL-CIO urged "full restoration of the 1,355 IRS positions and $21.6 million which would be cut under the Reagan Administration's budget plan."

- Better enforcement of labor standards and anti-discrimination laws. "The Labor Dept. should step up enforcement of labor standards legislation in areas and industries where significant numbers of illegal aliens are employed," and civil rights laws "must be rigidly enforced to eliminate any possibility that employers may discriminate against U.S. citizens."

- Ending dependence on temporary workers brought from other nations and eliminating one of the financial incentives for employers to use such workers by requiring them to pay social security and unemployment insurance taxes on them.

- A continued requirement that the Labor Dept. must certify that U.S. workers are not available and that employment of temporary workers from abroad will not adversely affect the conditions of U.S. workers. The law should be administered from the viewpoint of protecting American workers rather than better helping employers, the AFL-CIO urged.

- Acting to legalize the status of aliens "with a demonstrated attachment to the community," with consideration to the time an alien has lived in the United States and compassion for the families involved. But "the legalization process should not begin until the massive flows of illegal aliens into the United States have been stopped," the AFL-CIO cautioned. Otherwise, "the legalization process would simply encourage additional flows of illegal aliens."

- Before considering expanded legal immigration, "there is a need to absorb the full effect of a decade of large-scale legal immigration and refugee flow and to regularize illegal aliens and their relatives." The AFL-CIO, however, supports "continued emphasis on reunification of families and a humanitarian policy toward refugees," Donahue said.

- The United States "should continue to provide haven for refugees from political persecution" but should not be expected to do so alone.

O.A. Knight Dies, Retired Leader Of Oil Workers

Sun City, Ariz.—Funeral services were held here for O. A. (Jack) Knight, president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers for 25 years until his retirement in 1965.

Knight, who was 78, died on Apr. 16 at his retirement home here. He presided over OCAW during the period of its greatest growth. When he assumed the presidency in 1940, the union had a membership of 18,000. At his retirement, it was up to 170,000.

Born in New Hampton, Ia., Knight went to work for the Shell Oil Co. at its East Chicago, Ind., refinery in 1926, and was instrumental in organizing its workers there. He quit Shell in 1937 to work full time as an organizer for the Oil Workers International Union, OCAW's predecessor.

A vice president of the old Congress of Industrial Organizations, he represented the CIO on the unity committee that negotiated the merger with the American Federation of Labor. At the merger convention in 1955, he was elected a vice president of the AFL-CIO and of the federation's new Industrial Union Dept. He leaves his wife, Evelyn, and three brothers.

Court Bars Suits Against Wildcat Strikers

An employer can't sue individual union members for losses resulting from an illegal strike, whether or not the strike was authorized by the union, the Supreme Court ruled.

Its 7-2 decision upheld the action of lower courts that dismissed an employer's damage suit against members of the Teamsters who had taken part in an unauthorized "wildcat strike."

THE COURT said the employer could fire the strikers or otherwise discipline them for actions that violated the union contract, but he couldn't collect money damages from them.

The Supreme Court's reasoning was based, as the AFL-CIO had urged, on the intent of Congress when it dealt with the issue of lawsuits against unions in the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947. The AFL-CIO filed a brief with the Supreme Court because of the importance of the case, even though no AFL-CIO affiliate was directly involved.

In the Taft-Hartley Act, Congress stated clearly that while a union could be sued for damages resulting from a violation of a collective bargaining agreement, any money judgment could be enforced only against the union as an entity, and not against its individual members.

A UNANIMOUS 1977 Supreme Court decision in a Mine Workers case, in which the AFL-CIO also had filed a brief, specified that an international union cannot be held liable for an illegal strike by its local unions that it did not authorize or encourage in any way. In that case, the Supreme Court voided damages that had been assessed against the international union and its district council but let stand the judgment against the local unions.

The current case makes clear that an individual worker can't be sued by his employer for violating the contract even if the union can't be sued because it doesn't bear responsibility for the wildcat strike.

The opinion, written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., noted, as had the AFL-CIO brief, that the debate in Congress reflected a determination to avoid any recurrence of the infamous Danbury Hatters decision early in the century. Then, a union-inspired consumer boycott of a struck hat manufacturer resulted in a huge triple-damage judgment under the antitrust laws against the union and its members. Some had their homes seized to pay the fine.

NATIONAL OUTRAGE at the decision led to changes in the antitrust laws, and Brennan commented on the "deeply felt congressional reaction against the Danbury Hatters case" as voiced in the House and Senate debate on the Taft-Hartley Act.

The dissenters in the case were Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice William H. Rehnquist. They said making workers financially liable for their actions in violation of a contract would result in "fewer unauthorized strikes" and "greater industrial harmony."

Council Blasts Bid to Scrap Standards

ministration cutbacks in worker protections and social programs and had authorized a committee to work out the arrangements. The committee includes Vice Presidents Charles Pillard, Lloyd McBride, Murray Finley, Albert Shanker and William Wynn.

THE PURPOSE of the rally, Kirkland said, would be "to bear witness to the fact that there is a substantial part of the population who do regard these programs as items of essential value and importance to the people and to the Republic." He said there would be no particular target in terms of numbers of participants, and the objective is to have ample representation from a broad cross-section of labor and its allies in the civil rights movement and the Budget Coalition.

A report from the Standing Committee on Occupational Safety & Health, approved by the council, reviewed the Labor Dept.'s retreat on a wide range of job safety issues. It charged that the Reagan Administration is twisting the federal act from a law designed to protect workers into "a law protecting employers from the obligation of providing a safe and healthful workplace."

The council meeting was held in conjunction with the 31st Union-Industries Show, sponsored annually by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. Council members took part in the opening ceremonies and toured the show exhibits at the Baltimore Convention Center.

In other statements, the council opposed the sale to Saudi Arabia of Airborne Warning & Control Systems (AWACS) aircraft or equipment that would enhance the offensive capability of F-15 fighter planes previously sold to that country, called for changes in the 50-nation Multifiber Arrangement in the light of current international trade conditions, and urged the U.S. government to press both Britain and the Republic of Ireland to seek a lasting political solution of the violent dispute wracking Northern Ireland.

The council heard reports from Research Director Rudy Oswald on the condition of the U.S. economy and its dismal prospects under the Reagan Administration, from Legislative Director Ray Denison on the congressional outlook, and from Presidents Moe Biller of the Letter Carriers and Vincent Sombrotto of the Postal Workers on the current bargaining dispute with the U.S. Postal Service.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue gave an interim report on literature, graphics and other visual materials already available or being produced to mark the federation's centennial observance this year.

Kirkland presented an analysis of the regional AFL-CIO conferences held so far, and the council heard reports from other committees dealing with political activities, union mergers and international labor developments.

The council also rendered decisions on a number of internal disputes findings by impartial umpires that were appealed under Article XX of the AFL-CIO constitution.

IN ITS STATEMENT on industrial homework, the council noted that such schemes were long a "scourge" of the labor-intensive apparel industries because much of the work can be done on simple sewing machines. The "horrors" of industrial homework—substandard wages, child labor, excessive working hours, unsafe and unhealthful working conditions—became so rampant that states began to regulate homework more than 80 years ago. Forty years ago, the federal wage-hour authorities banned homework in seven industries — women's apparel, knitted outerwear, embroidery, gloves and mittens, buttons and buckles, handkerchiefs and jewelry — except for elderly or disabled persons or those who care for them.

Donovan's announcement proposing that the ban be lifted followed within two weeks his highly publicized "raids" on garment industry sweatshops in New York's Chinatown and in Chicago, where blatant wage-hour violations were found along with large numbers of illegal aliens among the exploited workers.

REPORTERS COVERING the AFL-CIO Executive Council sessions question President Lane Kirkland at a news conference. The council meeting tied in with the AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show at the Baltimore Convention Center.

HE SAID the removal of restrictions on homework "will in no way mean a reduced commitment to ending workplace violations wherever they occur — in factory sweatshops or in the home." He said the action would open up job opportunities in many "cottage" industries and encourage workers to report minimum wage violations "without fear of losing their jobs."

The Executive Council pointed out, however, that the reason the restrictions were imposed in the first place was that federal authorities found it impossible to enforce wage and hour standards in the home.

Further, the enforcement problem will be compounded by the "drastic cutbacks" in enforcement staff that Donovan has announced, the council observed.

IT CHARGED that the Secretary's proposal would "turn back the clock and disregard the experience of many decades, bringing back the sweatshop to the kitchens of city tenements and country homes in all sections of the country."

Moreover, the council noted, the many illegal aliens currently caught up in homework schemes are hardly likely to report minimum wage violations of their employers because they fear deportation if they reveal themselves to the government.

"Clearly, this will encourage employers to divert work from factories to unprotected workers working at home," the council said.

COMMENTING on Donovan's claim that the easing of federal regulations follows "a mandate" from the voters, Kirkland called that "quite a bizarre construction of the results of the last election." No one on the winning side, he observed, campaigned on the basis of undermining work standards by placing workers back in the kitchen at subminimum wages or reversing Labor Dept. policy on brown lung disease.

Kirkland expressed sharp disagreement with the Reagan Administration's suggestion that there is heavy support for its program among union members.

"I think I've met more of the rank-and-file than he (Reagan) has and do so repeatedly . . . and I see no sign of that," Kirkland said. "We see the contrary: There's deep concern."

THE AFL-CIO is convinced, he said, that the consequences of the Reagan budget cuts "are going to be profoundly adverse to the best interests of the country and its people, and we only regret that apparently very few people in the Congress are prepared to stand up and exhibit a 'profile of courage' and fight."

In response to other questions at this news conference, Kirkland said:

- He is optimistic that the Auto Workers will reaffiliate with the federation before too long, in the light of their favorable vote on that question, which would "enhance the solidarity of the trade union movement very greatly in these difficult times." He plans to meet with UAW President Douglas Fraser and the union's executive board later this month and hopes that reaffiliation will follow shortly.
- The question of the reaffiliation of the Teamsters is now a matter for that union's own internal deliberations, since the AFL-CIO has issued the invitation and has met with Teamsters officials on the subject. The death of IBT President Frank Fitzsimmons and the question of choosing his successor may have put the subject on the "back burner" for a time.

THE COUNCIL approved a 1981-82 budget for the George Meany Center for Labor Studies totaling $2,736,565, a slight increase from last year.

It also approved contributions to No Greater Love, the A. Philip Randolph Institute, the Full Employment Action Council, The Center for Welfare Policy, the African-Asian Institute, the New Leader, the Council on Crime & Delinquency, and the Michael Hammer Scholarship Fund.

The next council meeting was scheduled for Chicago, Aug. 3-5.

Revised Trade Pact Sought To Restrain Textile Imports

Baltimore—Changes are needed in the 50-nation Multifiber Arrangement to take account of the cumulative effect of imports on the American textile and apparel industries and their workers, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The council pointed out in a statement that these industries, already depressed, are being swamped by the flood of imports and thousands of jobs are being lost.

IT NOTED that last year the United States recorded a $4-billion deficit in textile and apparel trade, with imports of some apparel products now exceeding American production.

"The future does not bode well if import levels continue to climb 8 percent annually, while the U.S. market grows at only 1 to 2 percent annually," the statement observed.

For 1978 alone, about 614,000 U.S. job opportunities were lost from both direct and indirect effects of imports—nearly a fourth of all jobs in the fiber, textile and apparel industries, the council reported.

FURTHERMORE the council pointed out, the outlook for displaced workers is made even bleaker by the Reagan Administration's proposals for heavy cuts in the "already inadequate" Trade Adjustment Assistance program.

The Multifiber Arrangement (MFA), which was negotiated in 1973 and renewed in 1977, has helped preserve many textile and apparel jobs, but it has not succeeded in containing "the relentless surge of imports," the council said, as new suppliers add to the already high quotas of the major Asian exporting nations.

Simply maintaining the existing MFA is not enough, the statement declared. It called on the U.S. government in the negotiations now under way to seek these changes in a renewed MFA and in bilateral agreements:

- Regulation of imports in line with production changes in the importing countries. Specifically, the permitted annual growth rate for imports of 6 percent should be modified to reflect the growth rate of 1 to 2 percent that American industry is experiencing.
- Control of imports of specific products in their entirety, rather than on a piecemeal basis.
- Limiting nations with fully industrialized textile and apparel production to no growth in their quotas for the U.S. market.
- Elimination of the flexibility provisions in the MFA to curb the instability of year-to-year surges in import quotas.
- Expansion of the MFA to cover all apparel products, not just those made of wool, cotton or synthetic fiber.

AWACS Sale to Saudi Arabia Opposed

Baltimore—the AFL-CIO warned that the sale of highly sophisticated AWACS aircraft and offensive equipment for F-15 fighter planes to Saudi Arabia would be an act of irresponsibility and high potential risk to world peace.

"The addition of AWACS to the Arab arsenal would destabilize the Middle East balance, to Israel's disadvantage," the Executive Council said in a statement issued at its spring meeting here.

"The current fighting in Lebanon is a grim reminder of the ever-present threat of war in the Middle East."

AWACS aircraft are not only used for surveillance, but as a battle control station, the council observed. Used in conjunction with enhanced F-15s, AWACS is a potentially devastating offensive system, it added.

"Legitimate U.S. interest in resisting Soviet encroachment in the Middle East will not be served by providing this highly sophisticated aircraft to an unstable feudal monarchy which lacks the internal security required to prevent the top-secret AWACS technology from falling into hostile hands," the council said.

Saudi Arabia has declared a holy war against Israel, helps finance the terrorist activities of the Palestine Liberation Organization, coordinates opposition to the Camp David peace process, and undermines Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, the AFL-CIO observed.

Three years ago, the council opposed the sale of F-15 fighters to Saudi Arabia. The sale nonetheless took place, with assurances to Congress that the planes would not carry offensive equipment such as fuel tanks and bomb racks, which increase the aircraft range and firepower. The Administration is now considering providing the Saudis with this equipment, a move which can only weaken the credibility of U.S. commitments, the council warned.

Turning Back the Clock

THE SECRETARY OF LABOR has proposed to wipe out the 40-year-old ban against industrial homework in the women's apparel, knitted outerwear, embroidery, glove and mitten, button and buckle, handkerchief and jewelry industries.

This action threatens to open the way for the return of the sweatshop to the home and to undermine and ultimately destroy traditional standards protecting workers, employers and consumers.

Industrial homework became a scourge of the apparel industries because they are highly labor-intensive and require only simple sewing machines to operate.

THE HORRORS of industrial homework—substandard wages, child labor, long hours of work, unsafe and unhealthful working conditions—became so rampant that states began to regulate homework more than 80 years ago.

Forty years ago, the federal wage and hour authorities banned homework in these industries because it was clear that the enforcement of federal wage and hour standards is impossible in the home. Thirty years ago, Congress ratified these bans on homework.

Now the Secretary of Labor proposes to turn back the clock and disregard the experience of many decades, bringing back the sweatshop to the kitchens of city tenements and country homes in all sections of the country.

Moreover, since many people engaged in homework are illegal aliens, who work without records being kept and live in fear of any government authorities, violations of the minimum wage laws by their homework employers will go unreported by these workers for fear that they will be deported if they reveal themselves in complaints to the Labor Dept.

CLEARLY, this will encourage employers to divert work from factories to unprotected workers working at home.

At the same time, the Secretary of Labor has announced plans for drastic cutbacks in enforcement staff. This will compound the difficulty of enforcing wage and hour standards for all workers.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposes the Secretary of Labor's proposal to end the 40-year-old federal regulations prohibiting homework in the women's apparel, knitted outerwear and five other related industries.

We also urge the Secretary to reverse the proposed cuts in the Labor Dept.'s enforcement staff and provide for improved, not weakened, enforcement of the Wage & Hour Law.

1st-Quarter Productivity Rise Confounds Economic 'Experts'

By Gus Tyler

OFFICIAL ECONOMICS is embarrassed again. In the first quarter of this year, productivity leaped upward in a healthy bounce of 3.6 percent. Whereupon Business Tonight reported that the event "confounds experts as companies produce more with less."

How shall we explain the confounded state of these "experts?" They are in the predicament of the sage who told everyone that the moon was made of green cheese. Then, one day, some astronaut came back from the moon to report that he found all kinds of things on the moon, but not an ounce of cheese. The expert wanted to know what happened to all that green cheese.

A RISE IN "productivity" means that the hourly output of the average worker in America has risen. In the last nine months, productivity rose by 3.8 percent in the third quarter of 1980, fell by half a percent in the fourth quarter, and leaped upward again in the first quarter of this year. This behavior makes a mockery of all the nonsense emitting from he economic experts.

They said, for instance, that productivity has been sliding because businesses do not have enough capital to invest in modernizing their production methods. If that's so, why did productivity rise heftily in one quarter, sink badly in the next, leap upward in the following quarter? Obviously there were no such wild oscilliations in investments in new technologies.

They said, for instance, that government regulations for safety and health are a drag on productivity. Why were they a drag in October to December of 1980 but not in the three months preceding and the three months following?

THEY SAID, for instance, that workers malinger because they have too much union protection. So why do workers "malinger" at year's end and get busy with the new year?

No, all those official theories about why productivity lagged in the 1970s are as valid as the nonsense about the moon being made of green cheese.

Productivity in the 1970s lagged because it was White House policy to "cool the economy" to curb inflation, and when the economy slows down so does productivity. When the economy picks up so does productivity.

In the first quarter of 1981, our national output jumped upward by a substantial 6.5 percent. Productivity rose accordingly.

When the economy is cooled, we are stuck with idle plant and personnel. Full-time supervisors have fewer to supervise; full-time salaried employees have less work; even hourly wage workers slow down when there is less to do. When the economy picks up, supervisor and worker are busy and turn out more per hour.

WHAT HAPPENED in the quarter—and in similar quarters—is proof that the best way to lift productivity is by uncooling the economy, by pushing for full employment.

The facts are clear and have been for many years but the facts don't seem to be enough for those economists who still think the economy is made of their brand of "green cheese."

Back-Home Lobbying Gets Ear of Congress

In the last Congress, when back-home union members told their legislators where they and their union stood on specific issues, labor's positon usually prevailed.

When union members remained silent, labor lost.

Grass-roots lobbying makes the difference.

Union members, as concerned citizens, must hold their elected officials accountable for their actions—not just at election time, but all year round.

Unless workers take the time to write, call or visit their lawmakers, thanking and encouraging them when they are right and criticizing them when they are wrong, the legislative interests of workers will suffer.

If the voice of working people is not heard, then the needs of working people will be ignored.

—AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison in foreword to The People's Lobby, a report on the 96th Congress.

Putting a Price Tag on Life

Retreat on OSHA Standards Denies Workers' Basic Rights

This article by Murray H. Finley, president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, is reprinted from the May 4 issue of the New York Times.

PRESIDENT REAGAN has opened his war on health and safety protection with an attack on the Occupational Health & Safety Administration's cotton dust standard.

After years of suffering and struggle, textile workers finally won protection from crippling brown lung disease—its medical name is byssinosis—when, in 1978, OSHA issued its cotton dust standard, which reduced the quantity of dust in factories.

Now the Labor Dept. is trying to weaken or eliminate the protection that workers fought so hard to gain. It appears that the Administration is determined to find a basis for tearing out the heart of the standard: the requirement for engineering controls.

TO TEXTILE WORKERS, who are exposed to cotton dust every working day, it is a question of life or death. Brown lung victims suffer a shortness of breath that grows progressively worse; the disease slowly cripples workers and finally leads to an agonizing death.

In 1970, this country decided it had witnessed enough of this tragedy.

Congress passed the Occupational Safety & Health Act, which Richard M. Nixon signed into law. Finally, workers were guaranteed what is morally due them: the right to a safe and healthful workplace, and the legal duty of employers to make it safe.

Some employers—namely Burlington Industries and J. P. Stevens, both textile manufacturers—already have largely complied with the standard. So it is obvious that the standard is attainable.

Of course, we didn't get the OSHA law without a struggle. The United States Chamber of Commerce and industry associations fought the labor movement all the way. But the law was passed and textile workers thought they had won a victory. That would settle the issue, one might believe.

A GOVERNMENT of law should live up to the law. It would seem incredible to even suggest that the government would stop enforcing the law, that officials that have sworn an oath to uphold the law would try to undermine it.

Who could have guessed that Sec. of Labor Raymond J. Donovan would decide that employers should be given the option of forcing their workers into respirators and gas masks instead of cleaning up factory air?

It seems incredible that in 1981 anyone could seriously suggest trading lives for dollars, but that is exactly what workers are facing. By not enforcing the standard, by stalling, the Administration is giving the textile industry a license to kill.

THAT IS WHY thousands of workers in 30 cities across the country are demonstrating this week to oppose the Reagan attempt to dismantle the cotton dust standard.

They are speaking out because for generations textile workers have died before their time, husbands and wives have wept for loved ones, and children have lost a parent.

They are demonstrating because workers are killed, injured, and diseased on their jobs because their employers have failed to take precautions that can end this carnage.

If the Occupational Safety & Health Act was intended to accomplish anything at all, it was to rid the workplace of toxic substances. Never did Congress seek to create a workforce encased in respirators and gas masks. Nowhere did it ask the Secretary of Labor to try to put a price tag on life. The current efforts in that direction subvert the legislative process.

WHAT WOULD be the impact on textile workers, their families, and the nation as a whole?

In 1979, the Labor Dept. reported to Congress that 74,000 workers would be spared the agony of brown lung disease by the requirements of the cotton dust standard. If Mr. Donovan is successful, he will deny that protection to 50,000 of those workers.

The dimensions of that human tragedy are unthinkable, not only for the afflicted workers but also for their families and their communities.

The textile industry may save money, but workers and taxpayers will pay the costs.

BY ALL reasonable estimates, it will cost the government $5 billion to provide disability benefits and medical care for brown lung victims. Each victim requires $100,000 in income support, medical expenses, and administrative costs. This does not even include the additional $378 million in workers' compensation costs.

While these figures themselves are sufficient to justify the retention of the existing standard, we must not allow ourselves to succumb to the game of numbers. Workers have a right to a clean workplace, free from recognized hazards. Congress declared this right in 1970, and it must be maintained today, no matter how fierce and heartless are the cries for its subversion.

We must remain a nation of law and a nation with compassion.

Programs Face Curtailment

School Children to Bear Brunt Of Reduced Aid to Education

SCHOOL CHILDREN throughout the nation will feel the brunt of the cuts in the education budget that the Reagan Administration is urging Congress to approve, AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields warned in a network radio interview.

The deep slashes in federal assistance that the Administration urges are more than "trimming." She said the cuts, if approved, will force hard-pressed school districts to end or severely curtail programs aimed at educational equity, access, help for the handicapped and other children with special learning problems. School-related programs in nutrition, child care, drug and alcohol abuse and additional tutoring in basic reading skills are also threatened, she said.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Shields said that while it is possible to do "a more efficient job with the funding available," the Administration is rushing for congressional approval of cuts that are "measured only by the budget deficit—not measured by the pluses or minuses of the programs" that will be affected.

SHE SCORED the effort to convert much of the remaining federal aid to schools to unrestricted block grants that will let the states "choose among a number of very serious problems that have to be addressed." She added that "those most in need will be forced to compete for the least amount of funds," which would be a "severe blow to the children who need help the most."

Reporters questioning Shields on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Ann McFeatters of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AMERICAN WORKERS won a historic victory in 1970 when Congress enacted the Occupational Safety & Health Act, thereby acknowledging for the first time that workers have a right to minimum standards of safety and health on the job.

Long before the 10th anniversary of the law's effective date—which labor is now commemorating—OSHA had become a workplace word because it touched the lives of so many.

It is remembered that OSHA's birth was not an easy one. It was the culmination of decades of struggle by organized labor as well as growing public awareness of and disgust with the yearly thousands of needless job-related deaths and injuries.

Now, under the guise of regulatory reform, so-called cost-benefit analysis, and spending restraint, the Reagan Administration has begun to unravel the painstaking gains of a decade.

A SAMPLE of the standards which the new OSHA administration has killed, "postponed" or is trying to stall include cotton dust, lead, asbestos, cadmium, noise, toxic substance labeling and walk-around compensation.

OSHA's funding would be sharply cut by the Administration's proposed budget and even more by a Senate Labor subcommittee. This would mean fewer OSHA inspections than the currently less than adequate on-site visits. "Voluntary compliance" would be emphasized.

Also, the Administration proposes to chop by a third the budget of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, whose scientific testing provides the basis for OSHA regulations. The Administration already has fired the director of NIOSH.

SUPPORTERS OF OSHA have exposed "cost-benefit" analysis not only as a cruel trade-off of human life and health for profits but also as a sham. This pseudo-scientific gimmick, they note, takes a proposed action to improve health or safety and subtracts arbitrarily selected costs in dollars from arbitrarily selected benefits in dollars.

But as the OSHA-Environmental Network, a coalition of labor and environment groups, points out, this method, "when used to determine who and how many should die, cannot fairly incorporate the value of those lives to the victim, his family or his society; future human, economic and ecological effects and their value, and the public's health care, welfare and productivity costs."

In setting forth rules or standards, OSHA already is required to consider their "feasibility" from both a technical and economic standpoint. These considerations have made it easy enough to err on the side of dollars before lives.

REAGAN'S BOOKKEEPERS and deregulators conveniently ignore other factors in their false equations, such as the fact that health and safety regulations help stimulate the economy and create jobs by requiring improved technologies to be manufactured, installed and maintained.

Although OSHA currently is under its sharpest attack ever, there have been strong challenges by powerful interests all along.

Every annual congressional appropriations bill for OSHA was threatened by pot-shot amendments, culminating in 1975 with the passage of a rider exempting employers of ten or fewer workers from OSHA requirements.

AMENDMENTS TO CUT back OSHA's funding were defeated in 1978 and 1979. Last year, pressure from organized labor helped to block the Schweiker proposal to exempt so-called "safe" workplaces from major provisions of the law.

One price of America's industrial might is the awful toll of 4,950 work-related deaths and 6 million job-connected injuries and illnesses each year. It is tragic and inhuman that, just at the time health and safety have become valued in the workplace, the Administration has chosen this area to "get the government off the backs of business."

STUDENTS FROM kindergarten to college will bear the brunt of the Reagan Administration's education budget cuts, AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields, center, warned on Labor News Conference. Shields was questioned on the network radio interview by Ann McFeatters of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

BROWN LUNG VICTIMS conduct a candlelight vigil in Washington to protest the Reagan Administration's attempt to stall implementation of OSHA's cotton dust standard. The Clothing & Textile Workers held protest demonstrations in 35 other cities across the country on May 4.

'Victims' Vigil' Opens All-Out Fight to Save Cotton Dust Standard

victims' vigil held in 36 cities across the country. It was one in a series of weekly demonstrations initiated by the Industrial Union Dept. and environmentalists to protest attacks on federal safety and health regulations.

Kirkland said the labor movement is tenaciously committed to the battle to save OSHA.

"We will defend the health and safety of workers in any arena—the courts, state legislatures, bargaining, the streets if necessary, and wherever public opinion takes shape," he declared.

EARLIER, a delegation of 60 ACTWU representatives and brown lung victims—many in wheelchairs—tried to meet with Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan or Assistant Sec. Thorne G. Auchter but were stopped by security guards. They were told Donovan was out of town and Auchter was quoted as telling a group of about 20 reporters that the ACTWU delegation was too large for any "meaningful dialogue" to take place.

Before the rally, four top officers of ACTWU met with Vice President George Bush to tell him that the Administration's cost-benefits study would further delay the installation of needed engineering controls and thereby extend the risk of textile workers in contracting brown lung disease. Bush contended that workers could be adequately protected by wearing respirators, the union leaders reported.

ACTWU's President Murray H. Finley, Sec.-Treas. Jacob S. Sheinkman and Executive Vice Presidents Sol Stetin and Scott Hoyman sought to convince Bush that the cotton dust standard should be kept intact.

KIRKLAND NOTED that, after a 15-year struggle by textile unions to persuade the federal government that cotton dust kills, the Carter Administration issued a standard in 1978 that requires mill owners to install engineering controls, provide other safeguards and reduce the use of cumbersome respirators.

But the Reagan Administration and big business interests decided they didn't like it, Kirkland observed.

"The way the facts on cotton dust and brown lung total up, they don't like the numbers, so they will reopen the rule-making procedure until they get it right. Getting it right will mean in their parlance 'getting the government off our backs,' " he said.

On the eve of the rally, a memorial service and candlelight vigil for brown lung victims were held at St. John's Episcopal Church next to the AFL-CIO headquarters and a block from the White House.

FEDERATION Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue described the service as a vigil not only for the dead and those suffering with the disease.

"It is a memorial service as well for the living and for those even yet to be born who nonetheless are condemned to die from this disease as long as cotton dust is permitted to accumulate in the lungs of textile workers," Donahue said.

In addressing the rally, held in a large tent erected on parkland across from the Labor Dept., Finley pledged: "We will not weaken, we will not retreat until there is no more brown lung disease in the mills of this country. We are determined to put some compassion back into government."

Senators Lowell Weicker (R-Conn.) and Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) also vowed in their addresses to fight for maintenance of effective OSHA regulations. Similar pledges were made in messages from Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.) and Rep. Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.).

AMONG THE demonstrators confronted by police outside the Labor Dept. headquarters was 80-year-old Inez Howland, who has been suffering from brown lung disease for the past 15 years. She was among a number of textile workers who were in wheelchairs because of their disabilities.

ACTWU reports that there are 35,000 brown lung victims totally and permanently disabled by the disease. An estimated 85,000 of the nation's 560,000 textile mill workers suffer from some degree of byssinosis.

Other demonstrations were held across the country, in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles and in smaller cities such as Scranton, Pa., Little Rock, Ark. and Manchester, N.H. In Allentown, Pa., ACTWU members distributed OSHA booklets on the hazards of cotton dust which Auchter had ordered recalled because he determined they were biased in favor of workers.

The demonstration in Opelika, Ala., was held a day later so that the busload of ACTWU members and brown victims who participated in the Washington rally could take part on their return.

House Conservative Coalition Wins Showdown on Budget

recommendations for a variety of people-helping programs. And in fact it would have avoided the projected deficit of the rival budget proposals by deferring the revenue-losing tax cut another year.

BUT THE Obey substitute was crushed, 303-119. Only one Republican, James M. Jeffords of Vermont, voted for it. And 117 Democrats joined 186 Republicans in defeating it. A proposal backed by the congressional Black Caucus to shift funds from defense to social programs was rejected by an even bigger margin.

The Republican-controlled Senate has up to now given the President everything he has requested on budget issues and the few relatively liberal Republican senators are more than balanced by conservative Democrats.

More than a month ago, it voted 88-10 to direct its committees to reduce spending levels by $36.9 billion in fiscal 1982, about the same as the House action.

Now the Senate has before it a comprehensive budget resolution, the counterpart of the measure the House has adopted.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison put senators on formal notice that labor is "in total disagreement" with the economic assumptions of the budget.

"The AFL-CIO believes that the proposed spending reductions will do irreparable damage to human lives and community economic well-being," he wrote each senator.

The federation, he said, considered the Administration's tax proposals "inflationary and outrageously skewered toward bettering the economic position of the wealthy."

DENISON SAID labor sees "no justification for throwing billions of dollars a year in federal tax cuts under the Kemp-Roth plan to the nation's corporations and their stockholders and high income individuals" in the hope that benefits will "trickle down to workers and consumers."

In terms of congressional sentiment, there has been more dissent expressed to the Administration's deficit-increasing tax-cut proposals than to its spending cuts.

While both the House and Senate budget resolutions project revenue losses from tax cuts along the lines sought by the Administration, the estimates in this case are not binding and tax legislation will be dealt with separately from the budget process.

Postal Service Pressed to End Bargaining Delay

Baltimore — The AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the U.S. Postal Service to drop its maneuvers before the National Labor Relations Board, and begin to negotiate a new agreement with the unions that represent nearly 600,000 postal workers.

In a wire to Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger, Federation President Lane Kirkland said that labor views "with great concern" Bolger's refusal to sit down and negotiate with the Letter Carriers, the Postal Workers, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers, and the unaffiliated National Rural Letter Carriers Association. He urged Bolger to join with the unions in "an honest and sincere effort" to reach agreement.

Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto and Postal Workers President Moe Biller reported to the Executive Council on the impasse with the Postal Service. Management shunned the opening session of the contract talks and petitioned the NLRB for a new bargaining unit determination. An NLRB regional director dismissed the petition last week, and gave the Postal Service until May 13 to appeal the decision.

Arbitrators Report Record Caseload

New York—The American Arbitration Association reported that a record 17,062 labor disputes were registered with its 24 regional offices last year.

The total is the highest number of labor filings in the organization's 55-year-history. It compares with 16,669 in 1979.

New Poll Casts Doubt On Reagan Economics

A national poll commissioned by the State, County & Municipal Employees revealed that President Reagan's personal popularity doesn't carry over into many of the details of his economic program.

The poll, based on interviews in late April, found 63 percent rating Reagan's record as good to excellent. But it also found only a minority wanting Congress to adopt his budget-cutting proposals intact.

Depending on how the question was phrased, the majority opposed to Congress giving the President all he has proposed ranged from 53.2 to 81.9 percent.

The poll, by Fingernut/Granados Opinion Research, also found majority disagreement with the President's budget cuts on specific issues. And only 34.5 percent of the group said they would support a tax program that would give the biggest benefits to the wealthy.

Schedule for May Listed By Labor Studies Center

Classes in organizing techniques and grievance arbitration highlight activities during May at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Silver Spring, Md. The classes are open to full-time officers and staff members of AFL-CIO affiliates.

Three national and international unions are using the campus facilities for their own training programs during the month, along with the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD). The schedule:

Organizing Techniques, May 3-8—An institute on the essentials of successful organizing campaigns and review of National Labor Relations Board procedures.

Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation, May 17-22—An opportunity to prepare a grievance case for hearing, argue it before a professional arbitrator, hear his comments and suggestions, and review the case on videotape.

Unions using the campus for their own leadership development programs are the State, County & Municipal Employees, May 3-8; Communications Workers, May 10-13; Railway & Airline Clerks, May 10-15.

The Building & Construction Trades Dept. is conducting a program for organizers, May 10-15.

AIFLD is sponsoring two groups on campus beginning May 3—20 Portugese-speaking trade unionists from Brazil and 22 English-speaking union leaders from Caribbean countries.

More information on these and other labor studies programs may be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Avenue, Silver Spring, MD., 20903. Telephone: 301/431/6400.

'Most Successful'

Labor Backs Extension Of Voting Rights Law

The Voting Rights Act has been the nation's "most successful" civil rights law and is still needed, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testified at House hearings.

Kirkland expressed the AFL-CIO's support for a bill introduced by House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.). It would extend the Voting Rights Act 10 years beyond its 1982 expiration date and clarify a section dealing with standards for judging local and state voting laws.

BECAUSE CIVIL rights legislation has frequently had to overcome Senate filibusters and other delaying tactics, a House subcommittee headed by Rep. Don Edwards (D-Calif.) has begun early hearings on the extension bill.

Kirkland cited the long history of legal subterfuges and harassments that kept blacks and other minorities from voting in many areas of the nation and warned against assuming that the danger of discrimination has been eradicated.

"Our national history and the inevitable lingering consequences of that history made this law necessary," Kirkland said, "and make its continuation essential."

THE LAW was first passed in 1965 and broadened in 1975 to extend its special protections to Hispanics and other language minorities.

If opponents cannot prevent the law's renewal, they are expected to seek to eliminate a requirement that jurisdictions with a past history of discrimination must obtain Justice Dept. or federal court approval for any change in their voting laws.

Kirkland urged the continued need for such safeguards, and supported a provision in the Rodino bill that would make clear that a voting change cannot pass muster if the effect is to discriminate, even if there is no showing of an intent to discriminate.

AS FOR the evidence of continued need, Kirkland cited the fact that more than 800 proposals for changes in voting laws have been rejected as discriminatory.

"It is evident that there remains a solid determination in some quarters to block equality of voting rights," Kirkland said.

Citing attempts to dilute the law and make it applicable in all states and localities, Kirkland questioned the motive for seeking to impose regulation where there is no evidence that it is needed.

The framers of the original law, he noted, "took pains to devise an enforcement system that is simple and speedy. Under Section 5, the heart of the Act, a covered jurisdiction sends to the Attorney General a copy of the voting law that jurisdiction wishes to follow, and material on the law's purpose and effect.

"THE ATTORNEY General must reply within 120 days; if his response is that the law meets the Act's requirements, that is the end of the matter."

Because the law is so effective and simple to administer, Kirkland said, blacks and other affected minorities "are now participating in political life in greatly increased numbers, both as voters and as candidates."

The burden of proof should be on those who would let the law lapse or change its provision, Kirkland insisted.

Labor Stresses Need to Enforce Key Regulations

"We do not believe that workers should wait indefinitely for protection against deafening noise," he said, or be forced to wear respirators on the job to save the cost of engineering controls.

Labor considers that the government has "an inescapable role" in protecting its citizens, Kirkland said. Experience teaches that without regulation, "manufacturers do not take care of the environment, employers do not take care of workers and sellers do not take care of consumers."

Kirkland said the material furnished by Bush's Task Force on Regulatory Relief indicates that the trade union movement is "fundamentally at odds" with the Administration approach. The Administration seems bent on "increasing corporate authority at the expense of environmental, worker and consumer protection," he protested.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT is willing to cooperate for constructive purposes, Kirkland wrote Bush, and labor recognizes that laws and regulations "do not always work perfectly."

Many union people "have direct experience with the effects of government regulations," Kirkland noted, and "we would be pleased to put that experience at your disposal."

But Kirkland emphasized that "given the trust imposed on us by our members, we can only cooperate in an effort to improve the regulatory process—to do a better job of cleaning the environment, protecting worker health and safety and job rights, and assuring consumer protection."

MARVIN CAPLAN, legislative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and former director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, accepts a brief case from retiring LCCR Chairman Clarence M. Mitchell, Jr., as a tribute to his service with the civil rights coalition. He was honored at the organization's annual meeting in Washington.

Reagan Bid to Cut Medicare Seen Costlier in Long Run

Administration proposals to cut back on Medicare services could cost the government as well as the elderly more money in the long run, the AFL-CIO warned.

Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed the false economy aspect in a statement submitted to a House Ways & Means subcommittee that is evaluating various budget cut proposals.

LAST DECEMBER, in what was intended as a step that would result in long-term cost reductions, Congress approved legislation that removed the previous 100-visit limit on home health services under Medicare, and also expanded comprehensive outpatient rehabilitation services and allowed reimbursement for alcoholism treatment at a facility not connected with a hospital.

Now the Administration wants to discard these provisions and make other budget-reducing cutbacks in health services.

A congressional committee report that accompanied the legislation enacted last year predicted that the initial increase in costs would be more than made up in future years by eliminating the need for costly hospitalization and substituting less costly outpatient and home care.

Denison also protested an Administration proposal to end reimbursement for vaccination of the elderly against pneumonia. "The cost of prevention is less than the cost of curing the disease after it has been contracted," he said in testimony based on an analysis by the federation's Dept. of Social Security.

On other budget-cutting proposals being considered by the subcommittee, Denison said the AFL-CIO would strongly oppose:

- Less frequent inspection of nursing home facilities that are eligible for Medicare reimbursement.
- Requiring employers with hospital insurance plans to pay for full hospital coverage for workers over 65 who are entitled to Medicare coverage.
- Increasing deductions and co-insurance under Medicare as a means of holding down costs.

Fitzsimmons Role Cited in Building Teamsters' Gains

Teamsters' President Frank Fitzsimmons, who died of cancer May 6, "built a strong organization that was respected for its ability to represent the best interests of its members," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said.

In a joint statement, the federation officers noted Fitzsimmons's frequent cooperation with AFL-CIO affiliates "on issues of mutual concern to America's working men and women." An Industrial Union Dept. statement noted his cooperation with IUD's coordinated bargaining programs. Fitzsimmons, 73, was undergoing treatment for lung cancer at the Scripps Clinic in La Jolla, Calif.

He was elected general vice president of the 2.3 million member unaffiliated union in 1966 and in 1967 took over the functions of then-president James R. Hoffa. Fitzsimmons was elected president in 1971, and was re-elected in 1976.

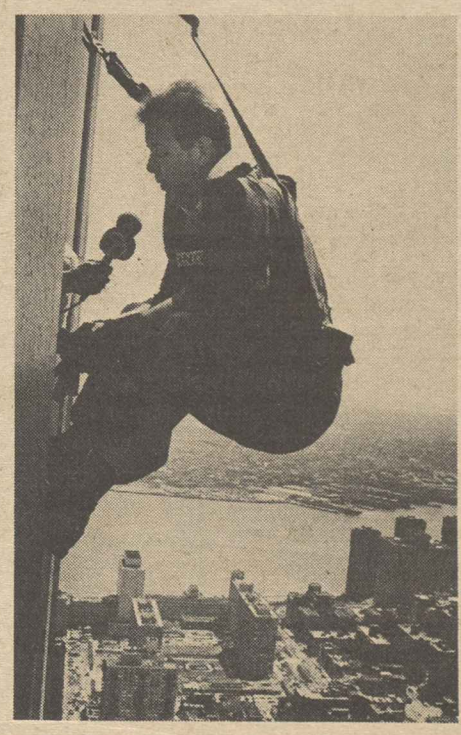
Fitzsimmons had been business manager of Local 299 in Detroit, and held offices with the Michigan Conference of Teamsters and Joint Council 43. He was elected vice president of the union in 1961.

The Teamsters executive board is expected to designate an acting president until the union's convention, which opens June 1.

Window Washer Takes On Tall Job

New York—Jim Cook has been doing windows for years in London, but he's long had the ambition to do the ultimate window-cleaning job—on Manhattan's Empire State Building.

The 37-year-old Londoner realized that lofty desire recently when he climbed out on a ledge of the building 86 floors up as an honorary member of Window Cleaners Local 2, an affiliate of the Service Employees.



HIS TRIP AND expenses were financed by Smirnoff's vodka distillery as one of seven winners in a promotional "Great Dreams" contest.

Arrangements for the ascent of the 102-story building were made with the help of SEIU President John J. Sweeney and Leonard Nork, president of the window cleaners local. Cook said he didn't want to be a "glamor boy," but preferred to be treated like a regular union worker.

After arrangements were completed for his work permit, workers' compensation insurance and other details, Cook trained alongside union window cleaners "to get the hang of things."

THE CLEANING of Empire State's 6,500 windows is full-time work for a team of union members from Local 2. It takes the team three months to complete the job from top to bottom and start at the 102nd floor again.

Cook, who lives with his wife Janet and their 16-month-old son in the Highbury section of London, said the cleaning job on the Empire State is much like it's done at home, "except that in London we don't have any union and we get paid a lot less."

Interest Hike Puts Squeeze On Economy

banks charge their best corporate customers — would probably climb higher, and that the country faces a possible business slowdown this summer and autumn.

Many short-term interest rates surged in the aftermath of the Federal Reserve Board's discount-rate increase. The Treasury Dept. auctioned $3 billion of three-year notes at an average annual yield of 15.81 percent, the highest ever for notes of this term. That was up sharply from the average yield of 13.37 percent for comparable notes sold on Feb. 17.

Meanwhile, an industry official warned that the housing industry is in for worse times because of the higher interest rates.

"IF PRESENT interest rates . . . persist, housing units will plunge below 1 million annualized starts in a few weeks," President Herman Smith of the National Association of Home Builders (NAHB) told reporters. The NAHB lowered its current prediction of housing starts for 1981 to an annual level of 1.2 million.

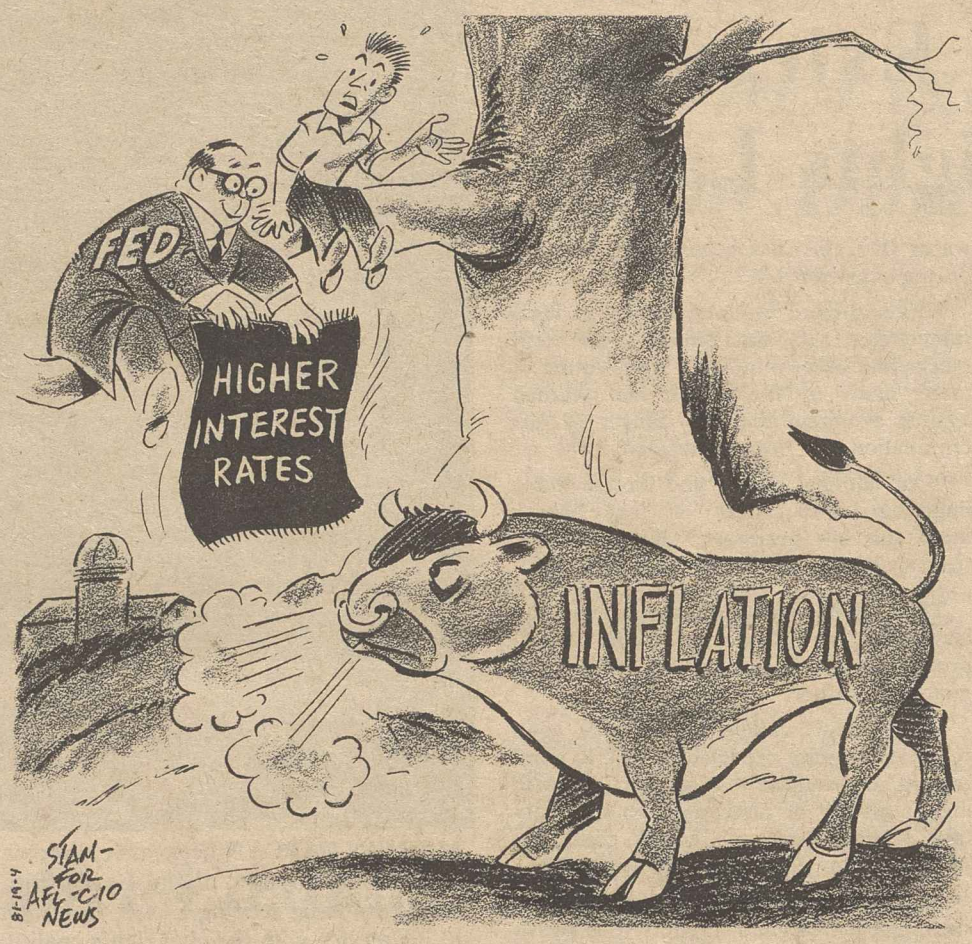
Two federal agencies cited recent sizable increases in both long-term and short-term interest rates as the reason for raising maximum rates under their government-insured mortgage programs to record levels this week.

The Housing & Urban Development Dept.'s Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration simultaneously announced a full 1 percentage point increase, to 15.5 percent, on level mortgage payments for single-family homes and a similar rise, to 16 percent, on graduated mortgage payments for single-family homes, effective May 8. Maximum allowable rates on other government-insured housing programs also were increased—to as high as 19 percent in some instances.

Political Solution Called Best Hope In North Ireland

Baltimore—The death of Bobby Sands is a "tragic symbol of the senseless but inevitable violence that will continue to plague Northern Ireland until a political solution is reached," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

A council resolution deplored the violence and also "the refusal of the British government to deal with the causes of that violence—political, economic and religious discrimination."



It called on Britain "to begin the process of negotiations with the Republic of Ireland" and to seek to reconcile the Protestant majority in the North "with the reality of the need for a lasting political solution that respects the rights and freedom of all the Irish people."

The resolution asked the United States government to encourage mediation of the dispute so as to help achieve an end to violence.

'You're No Help!'

IUD Views Targeted Aid As Key to Industry Growth

Philadelphia—A domestic reindustrialization program based on targeted solutions for particular industries is the key to economic recovery, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s executive council declared in a resolution.

Instead, the IUD said, the Reagan Administration program is based on "the 'magic and mirrors' of supply-side economics."

THE RESOLUTION, along with others on plant closings, workplace and community environment, and human rights in the United States, was adopted during a two-day meeting of the IUD council here.

The IUD noted that every other advanced industrialized democracy has a selective, coherent industrial economic policy. "The United States is the lone exception," it said. "Over the past 15 years we have witnessed a steady de-industrialization of the U.S. economy."

In a related resolution, the IUD reiterated the need for legislation to protect workers against the threat of plant closings.

"Such legislation should include a program to reindustrialize American industry, to pursue sound international trade policies, and to remove the tax incentives that foster plant closings decisions by management," the IUD said.

NEW LEGISLATION should specifically provide for protections equivalent to those already enjoyed by workers in other countries, including mandatory advance notice of plant closings, higher levels of income support and for longer periods, for dislocated workers, actions to attract new industries to areas that have lost employment due to plant closings and major layoffs, and rights of union successorship when an operation is closed and then reopened under "new" management, the IUD said.

A third resolution scored Administration attempts to weaken the Occupational Safety & Health Act and the Clean Air Act of 1970, and called for preserving and strengthening them instead.

Reagan budget cuts already have gutted OSHA's standards and enforcement program, the directorship of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health has been politicized, and there have been delays, retractions or reinterpretations of OSHA rules according to management dictates, the IUD charged.

BOTH OSHA and the Clean Air Act have powerful standards and enforcement language which, if implemented properly, help to promote the modernization of outmoded operations, it added. The resolution warned against "amendments or administrative actions which weaken environmental and health and safety standards allegedly to meet economic need."

The department also reaffirmed its support of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution, and urged its affiliates to work for its ratification by three more states by June 30, 1982, the time limit for its approval.

The IUD also urged Congress to extend all provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act for at least another 10 years, and to amend the law to overcome the weakening effect of a Supreme Court ruling by outlawing practices that have a racially discriminatory effect, as well as those adopted with discriminatory intent.

Union, Contractors Broaden Scope of Masonry Institute

The Bricklayers and the Mason Contractors Association have announced a cooperative effort to strengthen their industry through improved labor-management relations, research, training and promotion.

"Labor and management in the United States are either at or near a dangerous crossroads," Bricklayers President John T. Joyce told a press briefing in Washington.

THE TWO SIDES must move towards cooperation "or disintegrate into an enemies relationship," he added.

Joyce and MCAA President Louis J. Helbert, Jr., discussed the decision of their organizations: an expanded International Masonry Institute.

First formed in 1970, the institute has carried out masonry promotion programs while training was conducted by an apprenticeship trust.

The new IMI will absorb those two programs and be responsible for two new ones: labor-management relations and research and development.

THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT program will be funded directly by MCAA and the Bricklayers. The other three will be funded by collectively bargained contributions for each hour worked by bricklayers in the United States and Canada.

Joyce and Helbert said their organizations have begun a campaign to obtain contributions for the research fund. They said they hoped that in three to five years the contributions would provide the base for a multi-million-dollar-per-year research effort for the industry.

The masonry industry has receipts of about $5 billion annually and directly employs about 500,000 people. All government research now adds up to only about $3.5 million, Joyce and Helbert said.

MCAA HAS about 1,500 member employers—all 100 percent union, Helbert said. The Bricklayers have 135,000 members.

Joyce said the basic problem is that the individual contractors are too small to put sufficient funds into research. He said the industry faces the prospect of relative decline unless it finds ways to cope with technological trends, changing skill levels, competing materials and other problems.

On the labor-management side, he said the institute will explore local binding arbitration, the need for better mediation machinery, impediments to worker mobility nationally, and quality-of-worklife projects.

ASKED WHERE MCAA stands on the current drive by business to repeal the Davis-Bacon Act, Helbert replied: "I cannot see where the repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act would help our association as it exists today."

Joyce said the two groups "are not going to get into any areas that polarize."

Two Harvard University professors will be active in the expanded Masonry Institute. John Dunlop, former Secretary of Labor, will be a public trustee, and D. Quinn Mills, veteran mediator, will chair the labor-management relations program. (PAI)

Labor Scores Tariff Relief Plan for China

Preferential tariff treatment for the People's Republic of China would endanger the U.S. economy and the well being of American workers, taxpayers, and consumers, the AFL-CIO told the International Trade Commission.

"At a time of a credit crunch in the United States and 7 percent unemployment, it is particularly unwise to grant special tariff privileges to China so it can develop its industrial might," the federation's research director, Rudy Oswald, said in testimony submitted to the panel.

OSWALD URGED the commission to analyze the impact of preferential tariffs for the communist nation on U.S. industries and American workers, already hurting from a flood of foreign-produced goods into this country.

"An extra tariff benefit will encourage imports in most manufacturing industries, at a time when the United States needs to revitalize its industrial base," Oswald pointed out.

"We do not believe that backdoor subsidization of foreign imports from a communist country is an appropriate form of foreign aid."

WHILE THE AFL-CIO has always believed that the needy should receive appropriate foreign aid, it does not believe that subsidization of foreign imports from a communist country is an appropriate form of foreign aid, Oswald said.

The United States already has begun to experience some of the effects of granting market privileges on an unregulated basis to imports from China, a highly controlled, centrally planned economy, Oswald pointed out. In the textile industry, for example, the sudden in-rush of 100,000 dozen sweaters from the PRC caused concern over possible market disruption.

Adding more imports to the American economy from a closed, non-market society is especially unwise at a time when the federal budget is being restricted to assure that there will be no protection or help to workers displaced in various industries, Oswald summed up.

Food Stamp Slashes Target Strikers' Families

House and Senate committees voted to deny food stamp assistance to any family in which a member of the household is on strike and to slash total spending for the food stamp program below current levels and far below projected needs.

The committee actions signalled the sharp shift to the right in this Congress. A total ban on food stamps for strikers has been a perennial conservative goal, even though relatively few strikers qualify for assistance.

FAMILIES OF strikers have to meet the same means test that is imposed on other low-income households. Strike-related assistance normally accounts for only about two-tenths of 1 percent of food stamp expenditures, although the ratio is somewhat higher now because of the coal mine dispute.

AFL-CIO News

LABOR'S CENTENNIAL AFL-CIO 1881-1981

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, May 16, 1981 No. 20

In past years, the Senate has regularly defeated proposals to bar food stamps to strikers and their families. But the dominance of the conservative coalition in the new Republican-controlled Senate was demonstrated in a 13-3 vote by the Senate Agriculture Committee for the anti-striker amendment—even though the Administration had not proposed it.

The vote was closer in the House committee—25-16 for the anti-labor restriction.

The House and Senate Agriculture Committees did, however, reject the Administration proposal to deduct the value of free school lunches from a family's food stamp allotment. But they made some other changes that will delay the start of food stamp eligibility for most families seeking assistance.

THE BUDGET request of $10.5 billion for the 1982 fiscal year represents a reduction of $1.8 billion from what would be needed to continue the present program. Changes to tighten eligibility standards are expected to knock about 1 million persons off the program and curtail benefits to many of the remaining 19 million persons in low-income households.

Reagan Ax Hits Social Security

Kirkland Says Proposals Shatter Dreams of Elderly

By David L. Perlman

Social security benefit cuts demanded by the Reagan Administration would shatter the retirement expectations of millions of workers and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledged that unions "will do everything we can to prevent their enactment."

To hold down costs, the Administration is asking Congress to reduce benefits for all future retirees and to impose stringent new curbs on disability payments.

BUT THE BIGGEST impact of the Reagan proposals would fall on workers who choose early retirement with a reduced pension at age 62 instead of working until 65 or later.

By the Administration's own calculations, a worker entitled to the maximum social security benefit who retired next January would receive $159 a month less than under present law—$310.50 under the Reagan plan as compared with $469.60.

Other changes in the benefit formula would continue to widen the difference. The Administration projects the maximum benefit for a person retiring at age 62 in 1987 as $325.60 a month less than present law.

KIRKLAND POINTED out that a high percentage of those taking early retirement are persons "who have worked at hard, dirty jobs all their lives and simply are unable to work any longer, largely for health reasons that are not serious enough to qualify for disability benefits."

Ironically, Kirkland noted, the one section of the Administration proposal that would add to costs instead of reducing payments will help "those who least need the protection of social security," persons in relatively well-paying jobs who continue to work after 65.

The Administration proposes to phase out over three years all earnings tests so that those persons would be able to collect full retirement benefits while continuing on the job after 65.

CONSIDERING THE sharp cuts imposed on the most needy social security recipients, Kirkland protested, "that is fiscally irresponsible and morally reprehensible."

Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker told a news conference that benefits must be cut back to keep the social security system "from going broke."

Schweiker held out the hope that the Administration's cutbacks will avoid a social security tax rate increase scheduled for 1985, with a possibility of a payroll tax reduction by 1990—if the economy performs as predicted.

By its choices, the Administration rejected the recommendations of numerous study groups for an injection of general treasury revenues to supplement the social security tax and for less drastic steps to deal with a largely short-term funding crisis stemming from a combination of prolonged high unemployment and high inflation.

Reagan Budget Sweeps Through Senate Intact

The Senate approved President Reagan's budget proposals virtually intact, paving the way for follow-through action to curtail or do away with many of the programs the trade union movement has long supported.

Amendments that would have lessened the severity of program cutbacks were repeatedly voted down by a conservative coalition, and the final passage vote was a one-sided 78-20.

The House had approved a similar Reagan-endorsed budget resolution the previous week, and House-Senate conferees quickly agreed on the final terms. The $695.4 billion budget ceiling for outlays is $43.9 billion less than the budget proposed by President Carter before he left office. But because of projected tax cuts, the Reagan deficit is more than $10 billion higher.

In past years, this first budget resolution would be considered merely a target and would be substantially revised closer to the Oct. 1 start of the new fiscal year.

But both the House and Senate have directed their legislative committees to make immediate changes in programs within their jurisdiction so as to accomplish the spending cuts called for in the budget. The committees have flexibility in where to make cuts, but not in the total amounts.

MORE THAN one-third of the budget reductions voted by Congress will come from income-support programs for those below or just above the poverty line.

Unemployment insurance and trade adjustment assistance would be reduced despite the Administration's forecast of continued high unemployment. Job training and public employment opportunities for those out of work and out of school would be drastically curtailed.

Less money would be made available for job safety and occupational health, for enforcement of the wage-hour and Davis-Bacon Acts, for housing, transportation and veterans services.

Prime Lending Rate Notched Up to 19.5%

The squeeze on money tightened further this week as most major banks in the country raised their prime lending rate from 19 percent to 19.5. The banks cited increased costs of obtaining lendable funds and a surge in loan demand.

The increase, the fourth in about a month, was initiated by Chase Manhattan Bank of New York. All the 20 other largest banks posted similar increases soon after. Many economists expect an even higher prime rate to follow.

The prime is the base lending rate on corporate loans, which influences other interest rates and thus pushes up the cost of housing, autos and other goods. It reached a record 21.5 percent shortly before last Christmas and fell to 17 percent by Apr. 1. The rate began climbing again on Apr. 10.

Unemployment Rate Sticks At 7.3% for Third Month

The unemployment rate for the nation remained at 7.3 percent in April for the third month in a row as the growth in jobs and in the size of the labor force closely approximated each other, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The labor force increased by 545,000 to 106,722,000 over the month, with gains registered by all three major worker groups—men, women, and teenagers. Total employment grew by 564,000 to 98,976,000.

BOTH THE unemployment rate and the number of unemployed workers, 7.7 million, have remained relatively steady since last December, BLS noted.

Among major worker groups, the biggest change over the month occurred among Americans of Hispanic origin. Their jobless rate dropped 1.6 percent to 9.1 percent in April. The rate for black workers fell five-tenths of 1 percent to 13.2 percent while the rates for all other categories remained unchanged or dipped only slightly.

Eight of the 10 most populous states showed a decline in the unemployment rate in April, with New Jersey's down to 7.9 percent from 8.6 percent in March. In New York and Pennsylvania, unemployment was up over the month, rising two-tenths of 1 percent to 8.4 percent in the former and one-tenth of 1 point to 7.3 percent in the latter.

Nonfarm payroll employment was 91.5 million in April, down 220,000 from March, after seasonal adjustment. Most of the decline, however, was attributed to the coal miners' strike.

CONSTRUCTION JOBS declined by 80,000, but were still 100,000 above last July's recession low. Manufacturing employment edged up over the month.

BLS also reported that the average workweek for production workers was unchanged from March at 35.3 hours.

Key Gains Set In Furniture Workers Pact

Sumter, S.C.—Some 1,000 workers at Georgia-Pacific's furniture plant here gained significant wage and fringe-benefit improvements in a new contract negotiated by their union.

The pact raises hourly pay by a range of $1.37 to $1.65, depending on job skill, over a three-year period, Furniture Workers President Carl Scarbrough reported. Scarbrough, who directed negotiations, said that the vacation schedule also was liberalized, and insurance and pension benefits improved.

ONE OF THE deepest causes of worker resentment — restroom facilities — was solved by the negotiations. The restrooms were in shocking conditions, and allowed almost no privacy, Scarbrough said. Furthermore, the company required workers to ask permission to use them.

"That will no longer happen," he said. Under the new contract, workers will not have to ask permission, and the company has agreed to renovate the facilities.

"With this contract, there's a new feeling among the Georgia-Pacific workers," said UFWA Southern Vice President Willie Rudd, who assisted the plant bargaining committee. "It marks the end of an era of poverty wages and poor working conditions. It's the beginning of a time of dignity, decent wages, and greatly improved conditions on the job."

UNDER THE OLD contract, workers' pay averaged $3.35 to $4.68 an hour. The new contract reduces the number of years required for a three-week vacation from 18 to 15. Accident and sickness insurance benefits rise from $65 to $80 a week in the first year of the agreement, to $90 a week in the second year, and $100 in the third year.

The campaign for a just contract settlement at Georgia-Pacific's Sumter plant was highlighted by a march and rally attended by thousands. Speakers included Rev. Joseph E. Lowery, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s son, Dexter, and South Carolina civil rights leader Modjeska Simpkins.

The rally and bargaining effort had wide support from the labor movement and included participants from the Carpenters, Woodworkers, the South Carolina AFL-CIO, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and the Industrial Union Dept., and UFWA locals from as far away as Memphis, Tenn.

MASS RALLY by fellow trade unionists helped members of Furniture Workers Local 273 win a fair contract settlement at the Georgia-Pacific plant in Sumter, S.C. Representatives of the Woodworkers, Carpenters, South Carolina AFL-CIO and UFWA members from other areas, including Local 282 of Memphis, Tenn., joined in the demonstrations.

Interest Rates Boosted On U.S. Savings Bonds

The Treasury Dept. has increased the interest rate on U.S. Series EE savings bonds from 8 to 9 percent, compounded semiannually, when the bonds are held to maturity. The term to maturity was shortened from 9 to 8 years.

Also, interest on Series HH savings bonds was raised from 7.5 to 8.5 percent, with maturity remaining unchanged at 10 years. The interest rate increases took effect on May 1.

AFL-CIO Deplores Attack on the Pope

Terrorism and violence victimize "not only those who stand in the line of fire; civilization itself suffers irreparable wounds," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a statement deploring the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II in Rome.

The world Catholic leader is "a good and decent man whose sole cause is the cause of peace," the federation's officers said, calling for prayers for his recovery.

"The Pope is more than the principal figure of a great religion; he is a symbol of peace and international good will as well as a strong advocate of worker rights," the statement emphasized.

Union Label Show Draws 200,000, Puts Spotlight on Labor Centennial

By Susan Dunlop

Baltimore—A special emphasis on the centennial of the organized labor movement was the highlight of the 36th AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show which opened at the Convention Center here May 8 for a six-day run.

Nearly 200,000 visitors from the Baltimore area attended the show to see a colorful and informative exhibition of the skills, services and products of American union members and their employers.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland officially opened the show at ceremonies which drew local and state trade union leaders and included members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council which met in Baltimore prior to the show.

Kirkland called the show a demonstration of labor's "confidence in the importance of the collective bargaining system and also in the strength of American industry."

Stressing that "in a climate of mutual respect, labor, industry and government can work together to make our economy work," Kirkland said the show tells "the best side" of the story of American industrial relations.

THE PARTNERSHIP of labor and industry pays off for both sides, he emphasized, calling that partnership "a tribute to the give and take of the collective bargaining process as a mature, common sense means of forging agreement out of differences."

Maryland Gov. Harry Hughes called the good relations that exist in the state between government and organized labor "one of the primary factors in our favor with which we can interest industry in investing in Maryland."

Baltimore Labor Commissioner Jeffrey Austin, representing Mayor William Schaefer, extended the city's official welcome to the show on its first return engagement in Baltimore since 1966.

AUSTIN ALSO read a proclamation from the mayor declaring May 10 "Val Hamer Day" in the city. Hamer, 84, is a native of Baltimore and a veteran hand glass blower who has appeared in the Glass Bottle Blowers' colorful demonstration in every Union-Industries Show since 1954. Hamer began working in a Baltimore glass factory at the age of 13 and was a glass blower and glass maker until his retirement in 1963. The Baltimore show will be his last appearance in the union's exhibit.

The doors to the show, which is produced and managed by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., swung open on more than 300 exhibits and demonstrations staged by AFL-CIO unions and their employers. An estimated $100,000 in prizes and free samples were given away to show visitors.

The AFL-CIO's own exhibit, prepared with the cooperation of the Baltimore Industrial Museum, focused on the centennial theme. In a display of "The Way We Worked," the development of industry and labor in Baltimore was traced in a display that featured art and artifacts from the city's port, mills and factories.

IN EXHIBITS designed to educate the public as well as entertain, unions including the Machinists, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Allied Industrial Workers displayed the broad range of the products they make and the services they perform.

Highlights of every Union-Industries Show are the live craft and skill demonstrations, and union members from the divisions of the Food & Commercial Workers drew crowds to watch them at work and to win union-made food products from union stores as prizes.

The Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers exhibit featured two of Baltimore's most expert cake decorators, and visitors to the Graphic Arts exhibit could watch their souvenir, a sketch saluting organized labor's support of the Boy Scouts of America, being printed while they waited.

Men's, women's and children's clothing —and the union labels they carry—were the focus of new and enlarged exhibits prepared by the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers. The importance of the union label was highlighted at the Allied Printing Trades booth which featured a touch of labor history in its giveaway—old-fashioned pressman's caps made of newsprint.

AN IMPORTANT element of the show is the opportunity it gives unions to remind the public of labor's interest and involvement in community, economic and social issues. The AFL-CIO's two newest affiliates took this approach, with the Professional Athletes promoting their "Unions for Youth" summer athletic camps and the International Union of Police Associations urging participation in the national "Crime Stoppers" prevention program.

The Seafarers booth explained the work of their acclaimed Harry Lundeberg School at Piney Point, Md.

A new exhibit from the Operating Engineers combined information on apprenticeship and training with background on the union's community service programs. AFL-CIO railroad unions, including the Railway Clerks, the Carmen, the Signalmen and the Maintenance of Way Employees, asked show visitors to "ride the train" while explalining their jobs and skills in the industry.

IN ADDITION to a wide-ranging display of the many products their members make, the Steelworkers exhibit focused attention on the union's civil rights, senior citizens and workers' rights programs.

Other exhibitors also used their exhibits as a showcase for the many benefits of union membership, among them the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Molders. A "wheel of fortune" operated by the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, featuring union-won benefits as "winning numbers," helped the union give away prizes to visitors while urging them to join and support unions.

Important trade union issues were emphasized at the Air Line Pilots exhibit where members asked show visitors not to patronize the union-busting New York Air service. At the Government Employees' booth, Baltimore citizens had the opportunity to send post cards to Congress urging retention of the separate retirement program for federal workers.

WHILE SOME of Baltimore's best union musicians entertained, show visitors enjoyed the Chemical Workers' live "magic of chemistry" demonstration or had a portrait made by the Painters' caricaturist who explained the union's various skills as he worked.

Unions that combined a rare up-close look at their members' work and special skills with information on training and apprenticeship included the Laborers, Carpenters, Sheet Metal Workers and Plasterers.

Hands-on experience was the highlight of the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers booth, which included a working post office and a special cancel for letters mailed from the show. At the Bricklayers' exhibit, visitors could try their hands at the art of wall-building.

SHOW VISITORS were taken behind-the scenes of live theater and motion picture projection both past and present at the Theatrical Stage Employees exhibit, and they enjoyed a look at modern-day television broadcasting at the see-yourself-on-TV demonstrations of the Broadcast Employees.

Emphasizing the fact that consumers can find a union label on a wide variety of products were colorful displays by the Insurance Workers, Furniture Workers, Brick & Clay Workers and Distillery Workers.

A unique look at their complex jobs was provided by union members such as the Communications Workers and the Fire Fighters, while the Plumbers & Pipefitters staged a large display that peeled away stages of the construction jobs members work on to emphasize the importance of using trained union labor at each level to be sure the job is done right the first time.

A CENTRAL function of the Union-Industries Show is to explain to the public that union members are involved in all phases of the industrial and service economy. The exhibits of unions such as the Aluminum Workers, the Upholsterers and the Flint Glass Workers showcase the many products union members make for use in the home.

At the Service Employees booth, visitors could have their blood pressure checked while learning about the union's organizing activities in service industries from health care to office work, while exhibits like those of the Firemen & Oilers and the Boilermakers explained union members' jobs in heavy industry.

The Paperworkers combined their display of the world's smallest working papermaking machine with a series of prize drawings for sacks of products made by their members.

Reagan's Social Security Scheme Seen Shattering Hopes of Elderly

Instead, the Administration proposed:

- A two-way reduction in benefits for persons retiring at 62. The early retirement formula is now 80 percent of what a worker would receive if retiring at age 65. The Reagan proposal is to reduce this to 55 percent of normal retirement. And the amount would be further reduced by injecting three years of no earnings into the wage calculation on which the benefits are based.

- Changing the formula that relates benefits to average wages so that in future years persons retiring at any age would receive less than under present law.

BASED ON Administration wage projections, a person retiring in 1987 at age 65 who was entitled to the maximum benefit would receive $82.50 less each month than under present law.

- Limiting eligibility for disability benefits to persons completely unable to work for medical reasons, and whose anticipated period of disability is at least two years.

Present law requires only a one-year prognosis of disability and also allows consideration of age and experience, as well as medical incapacity, in determining eligibility. The Administration said "more than one-third of disability cases age 60 to 65 involve non-medical factors." Thus, many fewer older workers would qualify for disability benefits in the future. This is, of course, the same age group so heavily penalized by the reduction in early retirement benefits.

- Further restricting disability payments by increasing the waiting period for benefits from five months to six months, requiring a prior history of employment for 30 of the past 40 quarters, instead of 20, and tightening ceilings on maximum family benefits.

- Restricting, in a manner not yet spelled out, the social security benefit that can be earned by a worker who gets a private-sector job after retiring from public employment covered by a civil service retirement plan.

- Postponing for all persons on the social security rolls, not just those who retire after the law is changed, the date of the annual cost-of-living benefit adjustment. In 1982 and thereafter, benefits would be adjusted on Oct. 1 instead of July 1.

SCHWEIKER acknowledged under questioning that this appeared to contradict President Reagan's campaign pledge not to tamper with the cost-of living provisions of the law, but suggested that it was little more than a housekeeping adjustment to the fiscal year the government now uses.

Kirkland commented that recipients of social security benefit checks have already had their payments eroded by inflation and shouldn't have to wait an additional three months for their adjustments.

Among other "savings" proposed by the Administration are subjecting sick pay—now mostly exempt—to the social security tax and eliminating any children's benefits for families of persons retiring before 65.

THE PROPOSED change in the earnings test, which would add about $7 billion to the cost of the program over five years, would allow earnings up to $10,000 before a reduction in benefits in 1983, $15,000 in 1984, $20,000 in 1985 and no limit thereafter.

Present law allows up to $5,500 this year, with no limit after age 71 and next year is scheduled to allow $6,000 in earnings before deductions, with no limit after age 69.

Kirkland noted that these proposals are in addition to cutbacks proposed earlier in President's Reagan's budget, including reduction in student benefits and elimination of the minimum benefit.

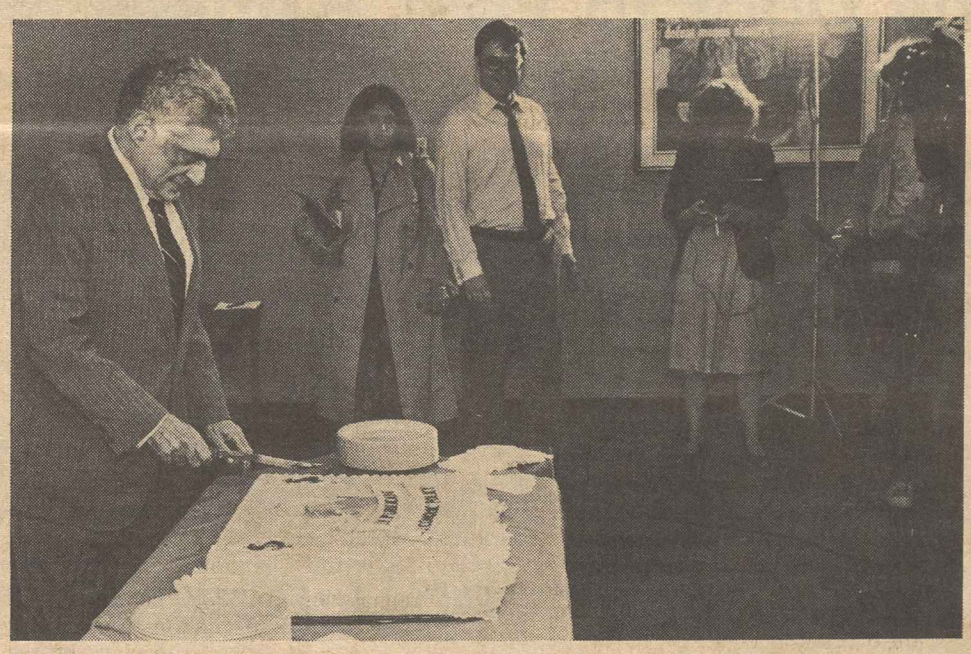
TOGETHER, he said, they constitute "the most severe reductions in social security protection ever suggested" by an Administration.

National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman said Administration proposals amount to a "frontal attack" on the social security system and could lead to its ultimate destruction.

Clayman stressed that social security is the principal source of income for most retirees. The proposed cuts would be especially "devastating," he said, to persons forced to take an early retirement because of poor health or unemployment.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council last February urged the concept of general revenue financing to supplement—but not replace—the existing payroll tax.

"Workers must not be denied the benefits they have worked for and paid for during their working lives," the council stressed. "The government must keep its word," and changing the terms "would constitute a breach of faith that would undermine public confidence in social security."



Social Security Benefits Compared

Earnings Category	Present Law	Reagan Proposal
Retirement in 1/82 at age 62
Low	$247.60	$163.90
Average	372.80	246.80
Maximum	469.60	310.50
Retirement in 1/82 at age 65
Low	$355.30	$355.30
Average	535.40	535.40
Maximum	679.30	679.30
Retirement in 1/87 at age 62
Low	$384.40	$225.20
Average	580.70	348.30
Maximum	755.60	430.00
Retirement in 1/87 at age 65
Low	$477.10	$477.40
Average	719.00	691.90
Maximum	942.80	860.30

Proposed benefits include the effect of a 55% benefit rate (instead of 80%) for retirement at age 62. Calculation of initial benefits in 1982-87 includes 50% of wage inflation factor; formula would revert to 100 percent in 1988 but initial benefits then and later would remain lower than if current law (with 100 percent factor) remained in effect.

Low earnings are defined as the federal minimum wage, average earnings as the average wage subject to social security payroll tax, and maximum earnings as those at or above the maximum subject to the payroll tax.

Benefit amounts are for worker only, who is assumed to reach the exact age shown in January. Other assumptions are that the worker entered covered employment in 1956 and worked steadily thereafter and that future earnings for retirement in January 1987 follow trend under intermediate assumptions in the 1980 Trustees Report.

TV CAMPAIGN CENTERPIECE—a large cake representing the Reagan Administration's economic scheme—is cut up by President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees. AFSCME is running a nationwide media effort to point up the inequities of "Reaganomics."

State-County Ad Campaign Slices Up Reagan Economics

The State, County & Municipal Employees is mounting a counter-offensive against Republican and industry promotions of the Reagan economic policies, AFSCME President Jerry Wurf announced.

AFSCME recently aired a series of hard-hitting television advertisements blasting the glaring injustice of President Reagan's budget and tax-slashing program. It's a part of a $1 million media effort by the union that also includes newspaper and radio ads.

AFSCME said the purpose of its nationwide ad campaign is to take the union's message directly to the American people, urging them to contact their senators and representatives regarding the unfairness of the Reagan program.

"Our ads point out that vital government services like school lunches, Medicaid, mass transit and social security will be cut back sharply if Reagan's plan gets final approval," Wurf said.

"The ads show how unfair and unequally distributed Reagan's tax cuts would be," Wurf added.

The "star" of the 60-second TV spot is a giant cake featuring the words, "Republican Economic Policy." The ad shows the wealthy getting large chunks of cake, while workers and the poor end up with only tiny slices.

The TV ad originally appeared on five Washington and New York stations, but four network-owned stations in the two cities refused to air the ad. All TV stations in two other cities—Albany and Des Moines—have also rejected it. The stations' main objection, their executives say, is that the spots are "advocacy ads," and it's against station policy to run them.

Other major markets where AFSCME's television ads have appeared are Boston, Dayton, Chicago, Seattle, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Milwaukee and Hartford.

AFL-CIO Protests Cutbacks In Federal Energy Programs

The Administration's proposals to cut back or dismantle some energy programs would undermine efforts to provide a sound energy policy, the AFL-CIO warned.

In a statement submitted to the Energy Dept., Federation President Lane Kirkland urged the Administration instead to expand and improve existing energy programs.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S plan to reduce programs that encourage the development of new energy sources, energy conservation and energy efficiency standards along with decontrol of energy prices "makes the Administration appear to be abandoning a cogent, carefully developed national energy program in favor of outmoded theories that will give high profits to oil companies and hardship to the American people," Kirkland said.

Energy research and development programs outside the nuclear area and conservation programs would be cut back sharply by the Administration. The cuts would seriously retard U.S. efforts to achieve energy independence and eliminate more than 118,000 jobs needed to make these programs work, Kirkland observed.

Specific cutbacks include severe curtailment of the low-income energy assistance program. The Administration would fold this program in with several others and reduce total funding by about 27 percent. The program was funded at $1,850 million in 1981. The program helps needy families and elderly persons pay their heating bills, using a portion of the windfall profits tax to alleviate the inflationary impact of oil deregulation.

OTHER ADMINISTRATION proposals would cut $442 million, or 59 percent, from energy conservation programs; $789 million in fiscal 1982 from synthetic fuels subsidies; one-fourth, or $196 million, for other energy supply programs, including significant reductions in funds for research and development for geothermal, hydropower, electric energy systems and energy storage systems; one-half, or $321 million, of outlays for research and development in fossil fuels, and 69 percent, or $380 million, in solar research, development, and demonstration projects.

Kirkland stressed that an effective energy policy is a necessary basis for a healthy economy with low unemployment and reduced inflation. The nation has made great progress in constructing an energy policy to enable it to meet those goals, he noted, but many shortcomings remain in U.S. energy policy.

THERE IS A need for a government oil import authority to act as the sole importer of oil to enable the United States to deal with the Arab oil cartel as an equal, he said.

He called also for expansion of energy conservation programs, especially the weatherization of schools, hospitals, public buildings and low-income housing. And requirements are needed to ensure that vital equipment for U.S. energy facilities is made in the United States rather than imported, he added.

Food Stamp Slashes Hit Strikers' Families

the cutbacks it is making in other programs will add to the number of people eligible for food stamps. But it says that the added costs would come to "only" $250 million next year while the Congressional Budget Office estimate is close to $1.5 billion.

In either case, the money won't be there under the House and Senate committee bills. Last year, when unexpectedly high unemployment and inflation pushed up food stamp costs, the Carter Administration sought and Congress voted additional funds.

But the Reagan Administration has said that it won't ask for more money when the spending ceiling is reached. Under present law, the Agriculture Dept. can cut back benefits to avoid depletion of funds.

Misreading the Mandate

THE NATIONAL CHARACTER of America includes a deep commitment to human rights, and to helping the needy, sharing our wealth with the deprived, the weak and the helpless. The ability and the eagerness to extend a strong helping hand is a mark of self-confident, independent character.

The Administration is misreading the American people if it assumes that the last election signaled a change in that basic trait.

What it did signify was a desire for action born out of deep frustration with the seemingly insurmountable problems of high inflation, virtual energy bondage, eroding job opportunities, crippling interest rates, decaying cities—and with a government which appeared powerless to provide remedies.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE voted a call for action, but nowhere in that call did they express the desire to see decades of social progress wiped out.

In fact, Mr. Reagan never asked us to make that choice. Never during the election were the Reagan-Stockman budget cuts put on the block for the electorate to examine, debate and ultimately reject or accept.

The budget-cutting mania will translate into the loss of over one million jobs—a curious position for an Administration which campaigned on a return to the work ethic and an end to high unemployment.

The Reagan tax cut will hand more than 60 percent of the largess to the richest 20 percent of taxpayers and a most healthy slice of that to the top 1 percent—odd for an Administration which asked for votes on the promise of relief for the hard-pressed, middle-income American worker.

THE CRY for regulatory reform extends only to the weakening of laws protecting health and job safety, the environment and consumers, laws which the majority of Americans would like to see strengthened—hard to square with an Administration which purports to represent the prevalent points of view in our society.

The majority of voters did not go to the polls to ask for a slash in the social security benefit, or a crackdown on aids to education, or radical surgery on health care programs, or taking the food off the tables of poor families.

The Reagan philosophy and its policies, if extended to their logical conclusions, call for a basic lowering of the standard of living and of the hopes and expectations of the average American working person.

HOW ELSE can one interpret a philosophy that is designed, for example, to do everything it can to force the unemployed, regardless of their skills and experience, to accept the first available low-wage job or lose the wherewithal to feed their families?

How else can one understand wholesale attacks on such vital job health and safety standards as those developed for cotton dust, toxic chemicals or lead, except in terms of a philosophy that believes it is the workers' place to be at the mercy of the all-powerful employer regardless of the personal price they must pay?

Revival of Industrial Homework Opens Door to Past Abuses

By Gus Tyler

LABOR SEC. Raymond J. Donovan wants to legalize industrial homework, a practice that was outlawed in this country some 40 years ago.

The law was passed at that time because "homework" was wrecking major portions of American industry. Legitimate employers could not survive in competition with unscrupulous employers who were having their work done in the homes of workers.

An employer using homeworkers does not have to provide space, machines, nor sanitary facilities: a big competitive edge.

He does not have to pay the legal minimum wage because without check-in and check-out records there is no way to know how much a worker makes per hour. Hence, there can be no overtime pay nor enforcement of a 40- or even an 80-hour workweek.

CHILD LABOR can be used indiscriminately. Since there is no account of who is working on the stuff at home, many of the workers—if not most—will go uncovered by social security, workers' compensation, and unemployment insurance.

In short, an employer using homeworkers can live by the law of the lawless, imposing his bestial standards on the industrial jungle of his own making.

This primitive practice can not be applied in all industry. Autos, battleships, steel ingots, and barrels of refined oil can not be turned out in homes. But apparel can, because both the fabric and the finished goods are portable and can be turned out on a simple sewing machine.

The circumstance applying to garment factories also applies to junk jewelry, handkerchiefs, knitwear, and hundreds of other occupations where no heavy machinery is involved.

Because homework can devastate such industries where several million workers are employed, America outlawed this destructive device almost half a century ago.

IN HIS PUSH to restore this primitive practice, Donovan explains that it will "open up job opportunities."

Indeed, it would. Women (and it will be mostly women) and their children, working at home, will find more employment. But for every one of the garments issuing from that "home" and sold in the market there will be one less garment sold that was manufactured in a legitimate factory.

So employment would shift to homeworkers who labor under conditions recalling the darkest ages of industrial inhumanity while unemployment (and bankruptcy) would stalk those factories that are operating under circumstances befitting modern times.

IN THE PROCESS, not a single new job would be created. Unemployment would be redistributed from better paying to poorer paying posts, from humane sites to inhuman pits. Bad jobs would drive out good jobs as a Dickensian darkness would descend upon sectors of our economy that, after a hundred years of sweat and struggle, rebellion and reform, finally managed to bring a few rays of sunshine into the workplace.

Commenting on Donovan's proposal to return to the pestilence of the past, one wag suggests that the Cabinet member change his title to Secretary of Anti-Labor.

Standing Up to Tactics Of Fear and Innuendo

The National Conservative Political Action Committee has declared war on a lot more than liberal politicians who are friends of labor.

It is leveling a body blow to the concept of an all-inclusive electorate making a reasoned, democratic decision.

The weapon is fear, innuendo, the half-truth.

We will use honorable measures to respond to this attack.

We will register our members. We'll inform them of the issues, the record and the candidates.

We will make our political contributions openly, so there's no mistake that we stand with our friends.

Similarities Noted in Struggle Of Polish Labor, U. S. Blacks

By Bayard Rustin

RECENTLY I returned from Poland where I was invited to lecture by a regional section of Solidarity, the independent trade union movement.

What was most striking about that country was the sense of openness and frankness which was everywhere evident. Even people whom I did not know (cab drivers and waiters, for example) spoke openly and frankly about the problems their society faces. Criticism was openly voiced, and the bulk of that criticism was directed at the Polish government and at the Soviet Union.

Among Poles there is of course the sober realization that their country faces serious economic problems and there is the awareness of the threat of Soviet invasion. Yet there is also a spirit of quiet optimism among the people. Above all there is the absence of fear.

POLES ARE AWARE that they are implementing a wide-ranging social trasformation of their society and they are going about it an orderly fashion. The effects of this social transformation are no less than revolutionary.

The driving force behind the move to democratize that totalitarian country is the 10-million strong Solidarity trade union movement. Solidarity is guided by a profound respect for the principle of disciplined nonviolence. Indeed, throughout the ten months of labor unrest there has not been a single act of violence committed by the Solidarity movement.

Despite countless provocations, Solidarity's responsible leadership has succeeded in developing a movement that is restrained and disciplined. Moreover, it is a movement that is united by four guiding principles: Christianity, democracy, socialism and equality.

AS SOLIDARITY Chairman Lech Walesa indicated to me, the union does not wish to assume primary responsibility for Poland's economic affairs. The union would prefer to maintain the traditional separation between management and labor. Solidarity's attitude toward economic matters is perhaps best summarized in one of the union's mottoes: "Nothing about us without us."

Solidarity's activities clearly are not limited to those of trade unions as we know them in the United States. As Walesa told me, "Only one-fifth of what we do is of a trade union nature." The union's remaining activities center on such questions as eliminating the vestiges of censorship, winning access to radio and television, safeguarding the independence of educational institutions, and defending unjustly political activists.

What is particularly striking about the Polish Solidarity movement is its many similarities with the American civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. In both movements dignity is a constant and all-pervasive theme. Both movements had strong religious roots. The American civil rights movement, like the Polish movement, was built upon a foundation of nondiscrimination and tolerance. And both movements have deeply rooted traditions of nonviolence.

NOR IS THIS comparison merely superficial. A number of Poles I spoke with mentioned how inspiring the televising of Roots was. "It told us that you have to struggle to win your dignity," one worker told me. Others mentioned having seen films on the life of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. "They were almost like an instruction manual on how to build a movement," one Solidarity activist suggested.

Clearly the dream of a free and just society is universal. It has lived and flowered in Selma and Montgomery. Today it lives and thrives among the workers of Poland. It can never be silenced by guns or tanks, for man's will to freedom can never be fully suppressed. It is this will to freedom that unites us in the West with those who are in the East.

THE POLISH people are transforming and humanizing their society. Only the possibility of Soviet invasion looms as an obstacle to their progress. For this reason, it is incumbent on the democratic countries of Western Europe and North America to exert coordinated pressure upon the USSR to prevent the tragedy that would follow a Soviet invasion.

Western firmness in the face of Soviet aggressiveness throughout the world is one of the most important factors in safeguarding the promise of Solidarity. And Solidarity's continued existence is one of mankind's greatest hopes for lasting peace.

All Government Levels

Heavy Public Employee Losses Foreseen Under Reagan Plan

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES will suffer a double blow from President Reagan's budget: loss of jobs at various government levels and reduction of public services, Executive Director John F. Leyden of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. declared.

Leyden said the ripple effects of the cutbacks that will erase more than 1.2 million jobs from the economy will eliminate some 40,000 jobs at the federal level alone. He said the "dramatic impact" of the job losses bears out the description of the Reagan budget as "the most costly roll of the dice that has ever been proposed by the economic policy-makers of this country."

IF THE PROGRAMS and services are not restored, there are likely to be reductions in force "of a magnitude never before experienced" among public employees, he asserted on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Leyden predicted that as the reduction of essential services performed by teachers, fire fighters, postal workers and police, other public employees affects the local level, public support for the budget cuts will fall off.

"I think people will rebel," Leyden said. "I think that when they see that services that they expect to be continued are terminated, when they see a number of people who were working or had productive jobs displaced, they're going to go to their congressmen and their senators any say, 'enough; the program hasn't worked, and it's time that we tried something else.' "

He pointed to the turnaround in Massachusetts, where voters supported Proposition 2½, which covered real estate taxes, but are now growingly alarmed as they face a reduction of the quality and level of public services that "they didn't anticipate when they voted for the measure."

"Initially, people will support a cut, as they did in Massachusetts, when there was a proposed cut of real estate taxes," Leyden observed. "The services that are lost as a result of those cuts will be similar to what we're going to find to be the case when the federal budget cuts take place. Massachusetts lost fire service, police service, and other services that the public came to expect. . . .

"I think it's going to take six to eight months, if these cuts go through, for the rest of this country to understand the full significance—the magnitude —of the cuts and the services that they're going to lose as a result of the cuts," he said.

LEYDEN SAID organized labor is trying to restore some of the budget cuts. One measure before Congress would save some 200,000 jobs.

"We're not satisfied that we can't restore more but, being realistic, we'll take that as a starting point and work from there to restore some of the other jobs," he said.

Leyden was questioned on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program by Michael Arian of Government Employee Relations Report, a publication of the Bureau of National Affairs, and Alan Adams of Employment Relations Report.

Washington Window

FOR MANY BROWN LUNG victims, who traveled to Washington to protest the Reagan Administration's decision to stall cotton dust standards, the long bus ride from their homes in the Carolinas, Alabama and other textile states was especially arduous.

These men and women have been affilicted with the disease called byssinosis, or brown lung, which has incapacitated or killed some 35,000 textile workers in this country. For these people, even routine chores often are too difficult because of the years and decades in dusty mills which robbed them of most of their ability to breathe.

But they came to Washington not for themselves but for all those who still must toil inside unhealthy cotton mills.

Here are some of their stories:

● FRANK COX, 61, had to quit work at the J. P. Stevens mills in Spartanburg, S.C., three years ago because of what he came to know as brown lung.

"I'd go to my job on Monday and I could hardly stand up. I could hardly breathe. It was like having a plastic bag over my head," said Cox.

"We didn't know what caused it until it was too late. We like to work in the mill. We love our jobs. But we were just disabled.

"I had always been healthy. I haven't smoked in 27 years. I went through World War II. Then I worked in the dust for 31 years. That's what did it."

● BLAN KILPATRICK, 71, left the mills in 1972 because of her disability. It was only two years ago that doctors properly diagnosed her ailment as brown lung.

Kilpatrick worked for 35 years for Cannon mills in the company town of Kannapolis, N.C. Her bosses and company doctors "never told me I was getting sick even after they knew it. I saw people die from it (byssinosis) before they even knew what it was."

Kilpatrick, who is active in the Carolina Brown Lung Association, regrets that she was never able to join a union in her tightly controlled company town. Nevertheless, she's helping the Clothing & Textile Workers in a local organizing drive.

"If they get rid of the cotton dust standard," said Kilpatrick, "they will continue using workers and throwing them away like trash. We're here to tell Reagan and Donovan and Auchter that we're not trash."

● MOSES WEST, 63, worked in the Stevens mills in Roanoke Rapids, N.C., for 42 years before his growing disability forced him to retire in 1979. "The doctors told me to stop in 1970. I finally had to give it up. It got too hard."

West said he needed to keep working to put his three children through college. He's now living on his social security retirement benefits. So far he has been turned down for social security disability and workers' compensation benefits.

To get these benefits, said West, "you have to be almost dead. They don't believe what the doctors say."

● VELMA BRANTLEY, 52, from Spartanburg, S.C., had to leave the mill in 1976 after working there for 25 years. It took her two years to get social security disability benefits.

But it wasn't until January of this year that she was diagnosed as having brown lung. "The doctors told me I had chronic bronchitis and emphysema."

"At the time I came out of the mill, they didn't even have breathing tests," said Brantley. She added that she never was given even the slim protection of a face mask.

"Today," she said, "we have made people know we're going to fight for what's right. Generations to come can say, 'our grandmothers and grandfathers fought for us.' "

DOUBLE BLOW of job losses at all government levels and reduction of public services will fall on public employees as a result of President Reagan's budget, Executive Director John F. Leyden, center, of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Alan Adams, left, of Employment Relations Report and Michael Arian of the Bureau of National Affairs. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Key House Rollcalls on Budget Slash

The House rejected the labor-endorsed budget resolution, which was introduced by David R. Obey (D-Wis.), and adopted instead the drastic budget cuts urged by President Reagan and co-sponsored by Delbert L. Latta (R-Ohio) and Phil Gramm (D-Tex.).

Column 1 shows the 303-119 defeat of the Obey budget proposal, which would have lessened the severity of the funding cuts. Right votes (R) supporting the measure were cast on May 6 by 118 Democrats and 1 Republican. Voting wrong (W) were 117 Democrats and 186 Republicans.

Column 2 shows the 253-176 votes on May 7 to adopt the drastic Latta-Gramm budget. Right votes opposed were cast by 176 Democrats. Voting wrong were 63 Democrats and 190 Republicans.

Price Surge At Wholesale Level Eases

Inflation at the wholesale level moderated in April, but was still running at a near double-digit rate, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The seasonally adjusted rise in producer prices of eight-tenths of 1 percent, which translates to a 9.6 percent annual rate before compounding, compared to an increase of 1.3 percent in March.

"THE DECELERATION in the finished goods (wholesale) price index from the unusually high March advance was caused primarily by a considerably slower increase in finished energy prices," BLS said.

"Another moderating influence was the consumer foods index, which showed no change following an eight-tenths of 1 percent rise in March."

On the other hand, BLS said, prices for finished goods other than food and energy moved up 1 percent, or twice as much as in March. Finished goods are products ready for sale at retail.

During the 12 months ended in April the producer price index for finished goods climbed 10.6 percent. The wholesale price report usually provides a good indication of future price trends at the retail level. The April increase in wholesale prices was in line with price rises for finished goods in January and February.

Prices for intermediate materials rose 1.1 percent for the fourth time in the last five months. Crude material prices went up 1.5 percent, after falling 1.3 percent in March.

ENERGY COSTS in April rose 1.6 percent at wholesale. In March, energy prices jumped 6.1 percent, reflecting in part President Reagan's Jan. 28 oil-decontrol order.

Gasoline prices increased 1.3 percent over the month compared with 7.5 percent in March. Home heating oil prices were up 1.7 percent, compared with 9 percent in the previous month.

On the other hand, natural gas prices rose more rapidly than in March, 2 percent as compared with 1.3 percent. Price increases for finished lubricants also accelerated in April.

Prices for consumer finished goods other than foods and energy reflected increases among a number of items, including passenger cars, which rose 1.4 percent after an increase of three-tenths of 1 percent in March, and tobacco products, which soared 5.1 percent over the month, following a year of generally small increases, BLS reported.

Prices also were higher than in March for clothing, books, and alcoholic beverages. Gold jewelry prices were unchanged after falling rapidly for the past several months.

VIGIL FOR VICTIMS of industrial accidents and job health hazards in Pennsylvania is conducted at the White House to protest the Administration's rollback of OSHA standards and environmental safeguards. The weekly demonstrations are being coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s OSHA/Environmental Network.

Students Cited For Essays on Handicapped

The labor movement works for the employment of the handicapped through collective bargaining agreements and its overall equal opportunity policies, Everett Lehman, director of special programs for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers told the winners of the national "Ability Counts" essay contest for high school students.

Lehman, representing AFL-CIO Vice President Charles H. Pillard who is vice chairman of the President's Committee for Employment of the Handicapped, pointed out that the trade union movement long ago fought for and won the first industrial safety laws and has been the leader in winning state workers' compensation laws and in upgrading occupational safety and health legislation.

The essay contest winners and their families were the guests of the AFL-CIO at a luncheon in their honor held during the annual meeting of the President's committee. Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts chairs the committee's labor panel.

The students' trips to Washington, D.C. for the awards ceremony were paid for by the federation and its state central bodies.

THE FIVE national winners, along with 36 other state winners, wrote on the theme "Mainstreaming of Disabled Students in My Community's Schools." The five top winners shared $5,500 in cash scholarships donated by the Disabled American Veterans.

First prize of $2,000 went to Edna Elain Crawford of South Carolina. Second prize of $1,500 went to Robert Burns of Pennsylvania; third prize of $900 to Susan K. Anderson of Oregon; fourth prize of $600 to Michele Schmickle of Texas; and fifth prize of $500 to Charles Keller of Colorado.

NATIONAL WINNERS of the annual essay contest for high school students promoting the employment of the handicapped are congratulated by Harold Russell, left, chairman of the President's Committee for Employment of the Handicapped, and Everett Lehman, director of special programs of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The winners were Edna Crawford, South Carolina, second from right, first prize; Robert Burns, Pennsylvania, second prize, and Susan Anderson, Oregon, third prize. State winners were guests of the AFL-CIO during their visit to Washington for the awards ceremony.

Pennsylvanians Join Protest On Rollback of OSHA, EPA

A delegation of Pennsylvania trade unionists and environmentalists came to Washington to protest the Reagan Administration's widening campaign to dismantle workplace safety and air quality laws.

The group demonstrated at the White House and lobbied their representatives and senators on Capitol Hill as part of the weekly victims' vigils for workers who have died as a result of occupational accidents and job-related disease.

THE VIGILS are coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s OSHA/Environmental Network in an effort to preserve the Occupational Safety & Health Act and the Clean Air Act.

Participants of the Pennsylvania vigil expressed concerns over sharp budget reductions for OSHA enforcement programs and administrative actions to reduce the effectiveness of established and proposed regulations.

Representatives of state environmental groups taking part in the demonstrations, including the Sierra Club and Trout Unlimited, cited a serious threat to public health posed by lack of effective controls of emissions from utility plants in the Ohio River Valley. They cited estimates by the Environmental Protection Agency that 54,000 pollution-related deaths could be averted by stricter controls.

"THESE CONCERNED citizens have come to Washington to explain that we are not just talking about numbers and budgets, but also about human suffering, death and sorrow," IUD President Howard D. Samuel said at a press conference. "We want the Congress and the Reagan Administration to realize that if they weaken OSHA or the Clean Air Act, they are literally threatening the lives of thousands of people."

Pledging a strong commitment to the fight, Samuel said "the health of workers and communities cannot be sacrificed on the altar of supply-side economics."

Sierra Club representative Brock Evans said workers must not be forced to make the choice of "it's either dirty air or your job." He noted that workers in other countries are not confronted with that kind of "blackmail."

Other environmentalists expressed concern over the increased amount of acid rain affecting Pennsylvania's rivers and streams, which is killing off the state's $1.6 billion per year sports fishing industry.

Fish in streams are much like canaries in mines—to warn people of impending hazards, they pointed out.

IN MEETING with congressional representatives, the vigil participants sought support in the effort to reverse the Administration's attempt to roll back OSHA regulations and proposals dealing with the labeling of toxic substances, hearing conservation, cotton dust and exposure to lead, hearings on conveyor hazards, and walk-around compensation for workers participating in OSHA inspections.

Sitting in on the meeting were Pennsylvania's Republican Senators John Heinz and Arlen Spector and Democratic Representatives Don Bailey, Allen E. Ertel, William H. Gray, Doug Walgren and Gus Yatron.

The Pennsylvania vigil was the third in the series of Monday demonstrations in Washington. Participating in coming vigils will be Ohio, May 18, and Wisconsin, June 1.

Mini-Strike Wins Gains for Guild At N.Y. Dailies

New York—A 6½-hour strike against the New York Times by the Newspaper Guild brought the union tentative, new three-year agreements with both the Times and the Daily News and appeared to remove the possibility of another prolonged confrontation between the city's newspaper unions and the two dailies.

The Guild was the last of the city's major newspaper unions to reach tentative agreements with the papers, which are bargaining jointly through the Publisher's Association of New York. The Times and Daily News were shut down for three months in the fall of 1978 by a Pressmen's strike.

BARGAINING IS continuing at the New York Post, which broke with the publishers' association during the 1978 strike.

While full details of the Guild settlements with the Times and the Daily News were not available pending membership ratification, it was clear that the wage increase provisions would raise the minimum rate for experienced reporters, photographers and outside advertising sales persons to more than $750 a week at the Times and to more than $715 a week at the Daily News.

Under contracts that expired Mar. 30, the minimum rates were $616.07 at the Times and $578.81 at the News.

The wage increases, like those negotiated earlier by the printing crafts and the drivers' union, average $51 a week retroactive to Mar. 31, $36 in the second year and $37 in the third year, plus cost-of-living increases in the second and third years matching any rise in the regional consumer price index that exceeds 6 percent. There also is an additional $6 in the second year for health and welfare improvements.

The Guild's tentative agreements also would immediately eliminate a lower set of minimum wages for employees hired since Jan. 1, 1979, moving them to parity with more senior employees' minimum rates. This was a central area of dispute in the talks.

FORMER TUC LEADER DIES

London—Sir Vincent Tewson, general secretary of the British Trades Union Congress from 1946 to 1966, died May 2 at his home in Letchworth. He was 83. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland sent a message of condolence to the TUC.

Donahue Cites Dangers

Cut-Rate Role for OSHA Poses High Human Cost

Philadelphia—The Reagan Administration's bargain basement approach to OSHA standards is a primitive and unreliable tool for ridding workplaces of hazards, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue warned in keynoting the National Safety Council's regional congress here.

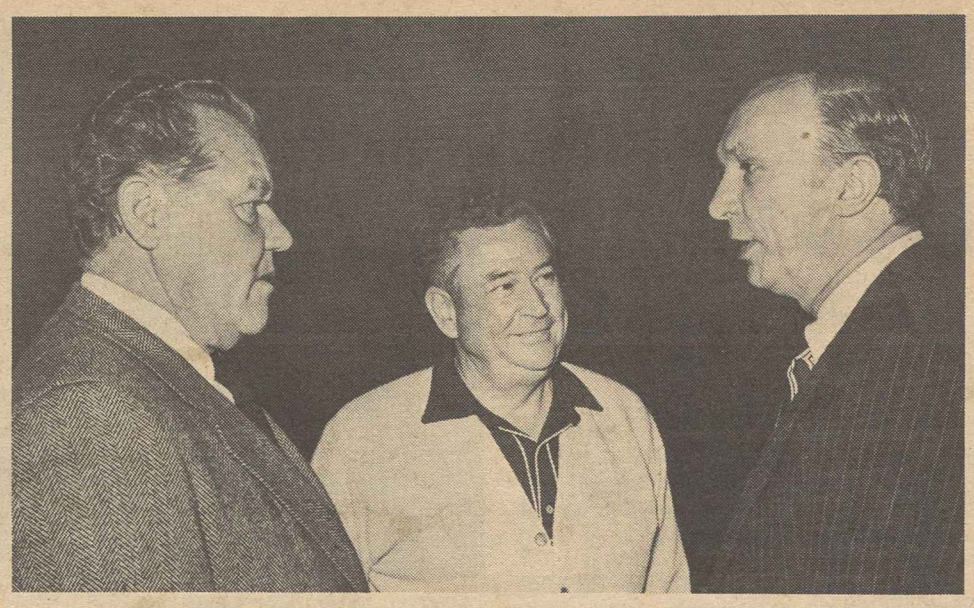
For workers, the Administration's cost-benefit concept on job safety and health regulations is a no-win proposition, Donahue said in pointing out that an estimated 100,000 die each year from occupational disease.

DONAHUE NOTED that the Administration is also embracing the "cost effectiveness" dogma that is keyed to resolving workplace problems through the least expensive route for management which, in some cases, would require workers to use burdensome respirators rather than installing engineering controls.

"As a result, the workplace continues to be a time-bomb of toxic contaminants —and it continues to tick," he warned.

Organized labor finds the Administration's regulatory approach unacceptable and inhuman, he said in stressing that the AFL-CIO will continue to stick with its position that "the goals of the Occupational Safety & Health Act are attainable without sacrificing workers' lives and health or the economic viability of business."

For years, Donahue noted, conservative economists have been attempting to calculate the dollar-cost of compliance with OSHA regulations.



"THE CONCEPT that costs and benefits can be totally expressed in dollar terms has an intrinsic appeal because of its apparent common sense approach, like shopping around for the best bargains in grocery stores," he said.

Branding this a simplistic approach, Donahue pointed out that no one so far has been able to attach a dollar value to the human life. Yet, he noted, the Administration is subjecting a number of OSHA standards and regulations to cost-benefit analysis.

Under this approach it has withdrawn a proposed rule on identification of chemical hazards, postponed the effective date of a hearing-conservation regulation, cancelled proposed hearings on a conveyor standard, asked the Supreme Court to set aside action on the cotton dust and lead standards, and has withdrawn proposed amendments to OSHA's cancer policy.

"WHILE WE can't offer an upbeat, optimistic forecast for the future success of safety and health efforts," Donahue said, "neither will we raise a flag of surrender to economists who evangelize the past as the future.

"We refuse to deal in terms of so-called 'political realities' because the only reality we know is the lives and health of our members," Donahue told the conference participants.

OUTGOING OFFICERS of the AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurers' Conference—Eugene Glover of the Machinists, left, and David S. Turner of the Sheet Metal Workers—are congratulated by Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at the annual meeting in Baltimore. For the past three years, Glover had been serving as conference chairman and Turner as treasurer. The new top officers of the conference are Chairman Louis B. Knecht of the Communications Workers, Vice Chairman Frank S. McKee of the Steelworkers and Treas. Charles F. Moran of the Boilermakers.

Unions Seek Full Funding For Rail Safety Inspections

Railroad unions have asked Congress to reject a Reagan Administration attempt to save money by reducing the size of the federal safety program in the industry for fiscal 1982.

J. R. Snyder, safety committee chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association, told a House Appropriations subcommittee that, while recognizing the great pressure upon Congress to cut funds, "rail labor will not sit idly while rail safety is in the process of being downgraded."

THE FEDERAL Railroad Administration (FRA), which implements federal rail safety policy, has asked Congress to reduce the number of federal rail inspectors by 41 positions. In addition, the FRA is requesting the same amount of money as last year—$1.8 million—for travel time for inspectors.

Snyder, who is legislative director for the United Transportation Union, told the panel that "there are absolutely no positive aspects to the Administration's rail safety program" for fiscal 1982. He said the reductions requested by the Administration will endanger the lives and safety of workers and increase the danger to the public through the possibility of increased rail accidents.

Snyder pointed out that as of Apr. 1. 1981, the FRA employed only 228 rail inspectors to inspect approximately 309,000 miles of track, 28,400 locomotives, 1.7 million freight cars and 125,000 miles of signal systems.

CITING THE 1980 record of 97 deaths, 1,209 collisions and 6,468 derailments, Snyder questioned the effectiveness of the current federal rail safety enforcement capability. He said the "most critical need is for enough FRA inspectors to enforce adequately the existing federal safety rules and regulatons."

Rail labor has estimated that the cost of 50 additional inspectors, including salary and travel time expenses, would be $2.3 million. Snyder compared this figure with the $15 million collected in fines last year by safety inspectors and the $270 million in property damage caused by rail accidents.

Concerning the travel time appropriations, Snyder said FRA has underestimated the amount needed year after year. If the same amount of money is provided for travel expenses this year as last, Snyder said, rail inspectors would only be able to travel 13 days per month.

Postal Unions Press Bolger To Begin Talks on Contract

The heads of two unions that together represent about 500,000 of the nearly 600,000 Postal Service employees called on Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger to accept the decision of a National Labor Relations Board regional director and begin negotiations on a new contract.

"We are ready, willing, and able to meet with the Postal Service, either formally or informally," Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto and Postal Workers President Moe Biller said in a letter to USPS chief negotiator Joseph F. Morris.

"INDEED, YOU will recall that we had scheduled collective bargaining to begin Apr. 22, after a series of informal meetings with you, and it was only the unilateral refusal of the Postal Service to attend the scheduled bargaining session that led to the present, unfortunate situation," they observed.

Separate talks also had been scheduled last month by the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, which represent the balance of the Postal Service workers covered by union contracts. Bolger boycotted the April meetings, however, calling the structure under which the unions bargain independently of each other "unworkable."

Earlier, on Apr. 17, Bolger petitioned the NLRB to redefine the bargaining unit into a single unit. That petition was rejected on Apr. 30 by the NLRB regional director in Baltimore, who gave USPS until May 13 to appeal the decision. The Postal Service later was given a five-day extension of the deadline, and Bolger said he would use the added time to seek an informal solution to the representation problem.

BUT BILLER and Sombrotto told the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee that the problem is of Bolger's own making and that their unions would meet with the USPS only to begin negotiations on a new contract.

The two smaller unions—the Mail Handlers and the Rural Letter Carriers—have said they would coordinate their bargaining with APWU and NALC but want a separate contract.

Current three-year pacts with the USPS expire on July 20. The talks constitute the largest labor-management negotiations this year in terms of workers represented.

Donovan Sweatshop Raids Called 'Phony Theatrics'

The chairman of a House subcommittee has accused Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan of staging "phony theatrical stunts" to divert attention from Administration moves to undermine worker protections.

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) contrasted what he termed the "high-publicity" participation by Donovan in raids on two garment industry sweatshops that were violating the wage-hour law with the department's subsequent proposal to lift its long-standing ban on industrial homework.

The regulatory change would allow manufacturers in various apparel-related industries to farm out work to be performed in a worker's home instead of in a factory or other central workplace that would be subject to regular inspections.

Miller said his Subcommittee on Labor Standards of the House Education & Labor Committee will start hearings on the Administration's regulatory actions May 19.

The proposed change would breed new sweatshops, Miller charged. He told his colleagues in the House that he intends to challenge any such move as "a clear abandonment of the Labor Dept.'s mandate to improve the working conditions of American working men and women."

Reagan's Budget Proposals Sail Through Senate

Funds for scores of other federal programs would be lumped together in "block grants" to the states. But invariably, the total funds for block grants would be substantially less than the earmarked federal funds they are to replace.

Before the Senate vote, the AFL-CIO wrote each senator protesting that the spending reductions that would be imposed by the budget resolution would do "irreparable harm" to the nation.

But the only modification made during four days of debate was an amendment approved by the Republican leadership to allow military and federal government retirees to get a scheduled cost-of-living raise.

WITH A SOLID Republican majority in the Senate, the outcome of the budget vote was never in doubt. The only surprise was the magnitude of Democratic support. On final passage, 28 Democrats voted for the Republican budget and only 18 opposed it.

The previous week, the Democratic majority in the House crumbled with 63 defections to the Reagan camp. (Rollcall on Page 6)

The most controversial portion of the budget resolution, in terms of congressional sentiment, deals with revenue estimates which are based on an assumption that a tax cut of the magnitude proposed by the Administration will be enacted this year.

Ironically, while the Senate was adopting a budget forecasting a deficit of more than $50 billion in the next fiscal year, a Senate subcommittee endorsed a proposed constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget except in time of war.

Social Security Cuts Stir Wide Protest

Senate Vote Deals Rebuff To President

By James M. Shevis

A storm of outrage over the Administration's proposals to slash social security benefits swept the nation and organized labor mounted a major drive to head off the cuts.

The Reagan plan, which has drawn a heavy flow of protest mail to Capitol Hill and the White House since it was unveiled May 13, would drastically curtail benefits for all workers who choose to retire at 62 instead of 65, impose severe new restrictions on disability retirement, and change the benefit formula to reduce payments to future retirees of all ages.

SO STRONG was the grass-roots resentment that the Senate unanimously adopted a resolution promising not to make any "precipitous or unfair" reductions in early retirement benefits. Only by a single vote did the Republican-controlled Senate stop a Democratic-sponsored resolution attacking the Administration plan as a "breach of faith."

At the White House, Acting Press Secretary Larry Speakes told reporters that the Administration is "certainly willing" to discuss changes in its proposal.

When the Administration plans were unveiled, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledged that unions "will do everything we can to prevent their enactment."

AUTO WORKERS President Douglas Fraser said in a Detroit speech the UAW would conduct the largest lobbying campaign in its history to fight the Administration's proposals. Union members will travel to Washington, and camp out on the doorsteps of lawmakers when the social security cuts come up for consideration in Congress, he said.

"I don't care if it takes weeks. I don't care if it takes months," Fraser declared. "We're going to stay there until this atrocious legislation is defeated.

"It's really changing the rules in the middle of the game. It's really double-crossing the people."

ON CAPITOL HILL, Senate Democrats caucused and unanimously adopted a resolution condemning the proposed reductions as "precipitous and severe," and constituting "a breach of faith with those aging Americans who have contributed to the social security system and have planned for their retirement upon the promise of a specific level of social security income."

Senate Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) declared: "We're going to oppose this proposal by the President to the last ditch, and we'll use every rule in the Senate book to see that it doesn't become law."

Labor's Tax Alternative Tied to Aid for Workers

LABOR AND ART blend in the original, limited-edition lithograph created by internationally acclaimed American artist Robert Rauschenberg for the AFL-CIO's centennial celebration. Rauschenberg, who signed and numbered all 300 prints of the work, presents the first to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at the premier showing of the lithograph at federation headquarters. (Story, Page 2.)

Kirkland Hits Reagan Plan As Unfair

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pressed Senate tax-writers to take a fresh look at labor's proposal to link business assistance to the nation's reindustrialization goals and to use a payroll tax credit to alleviate inflation's burden on America's workers.

Kirkland went before the Republican-led, conservative-dominated Senate Finance Committee to challenge the Reagan Administration's tax proposals as unfair, inflationary and wasteful.

HE SCOFFED at the "supply-side" notion that giving substantially bigger tax savings to the wealthy will send them rushing to invest in new plant and equipment.

And he protested business tax cuts that would heap unneeded windfalls on corporations with the highest earnings, reward companies for purchasing equipment abroad and further shift the tax burden from corporations to individuals.

Kirkland outlined the labor-supported alternative, which has been introduced in the House by two members of the Ways & Means Committee—Frank J. Guarini (D-N.J.) and William M. Brodhead (D-Mich.).

IT WOULD give every wage and salary earner a tax refund equal to 20 percent of social security payroll deductions. For this year, the maximum tax reduction would be $395 for a one-earner household and $790 for a two-worker family.

Unions, Employers Blast Bid to Revive Homework

Union and employer witnesses told a House Labor Standards subcommittee that there is no conceivable justification for the Administration's plan to revoke long-standing regulations that prohibit industrial homework.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed that the ban on farming out work was imposed years ago because it proved impossible to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act in "kitchen sweatshops." Yet the Labor Dept.'s "sole justification" for its proposal to repeal the ban is that the deregulation wouldn't have any "significant economic impact," Denison noted.

Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin said he found it "simply incredible" that any Secretary of Labor would propose such a backward step.

He termed industrial homework the "worst form" of sweatshop the garment industry ever experienced.

An employer spokesman agreed. Kurt Barnard, executive director of the Federation of Apparel Manufacturers, said the Labor Dept.'s proposed action would mean "disaster" for fair employers.

IT WOULD lead to "proliferation of at-home sweatshops" and "foster the exploitation of unregistered aliens," he warned.

The costume jewelry industry is also one of those where industrial homework was banned because of flagrant abuses, and union representatives warned that conditions are ripe for a revival of social evils if the Labor Dept. goes through with its deregulations.

Leon Swerdlove, director of the Jewelry Workers Division of the Service Employees, and Local 1-J President Joseph Tarantola said deregulation would have "a devastating impact on the wages, hours and working conditions of jewelry workers."

It is difficult enough now to enforce

Labor Dept. Weighs Move To Trim Pay Protections

By David L. Perlman

The Labor Dept. is considering regulatory changes that would shrink the prevailing wage protections of the Davis-Bacon Act, cut back coverage of the Service Contract Act and lessen affirmative action obligations of federal contractors.

All three programs are being scrutinized under the Reagan Administration's cost-benefit test for government regulations, Labor Dept. Solicitor T. Timothy Ryan, Jr., told reporters at a news briefing.

MODIFICATIONS in existing regulations had been proposed by the Carter Administration before it left office, but Ryan made clear that the revisions being drafted by the Labor Dept. go much deeper than consideration of the earlier proposals.

That's especially true of the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires construction contractors to pay workers on federally-funded projects no less than local prevailing rates of pay and fringe benefits.

Ryan's list of "major issues under review" by the Labor Dept. covers virtually all the complaints that open-shop contractors have made.

A SPECIAL target is the so-called 30 percent rule, which would have been unchanged in the Carter proposals. Under present regulations, the prevailing wage is the rate received by the largest number of workers in the job classification being surveyed, provided they constitute at least 30 percent of all the workers in that classification.

Reagan's Budget Cuts Get Final Congress Okay

Congress gave final approval to the drastic budget cuts demanded by President Reagan, and its committees began chopping up federal programs in order to hold spending under the new budget ceilings.

In the House Ways & Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee, the unemployed were among the first victims.

BOTH PANELS agreed to end the national extended unemployment benefits program that is triggered on by recession-level jobless rates. They also changed the formula for triggering state extended benefits entitlements, and sharply cut back jobless benefits for persons leaving military service.

The trade adjustment assistance program would be reduced to a short-term extension of regular unemployment benefits with a job training entitlement.

Budget Cuts Get Approval Of Congress

After the House committee agreed to cut the $1.7 billion cost of the present program to $364 million for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, Rep. Sam Gibbons (D-Fla.) said the effect was so close to a "sunset" provision ending a program that "you won't be able to tell when the sun goes over the horizon."

THE HOUSE committee went on to chop $850 million out of the low-income energy assistance program, reduce welfare payments for families with dependent children by $760 million—which was less than the Senate committee had slashed—and cut $2.7 billion in social security payments through phasing out college student benefits as the Administration had sought and deferring half of the July 1982 cost-of-living adjustment until October.

In all, the Ways & Means Committee chopped $9.1 billion from programs in its jurisdiction and instructed its staff to come up with additional suggestions.

AN EVEN more painful task of program-slashing faces the more liberal House Education & Labor Committee and the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, now under Republican control.

House Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) made no secret of his distaste for the reconciliation instructions that would force the destruction of programs the committee has initiated and considers still needed. His committee's reconciliation instructions are to achieve more than $10 billion in spending cuts.

The budget resolution directs committees to report their legislative changes to the House and Senate Budget Committees by June 12. The Budget Committee of each body will then bring to the floor a single bill that is supposed to achieve the budget targets. It can write additional cuts into the reconciliation bill if a legislative committee fails to meet its quota.

OTHER COMMITTEES are also faced with multibillion-dollar spending cuts, threatening to wipe out the entire Economic Development Administration, cut back sharply on various forms of public works, slash food stamp entitlements, reduce rail subsidies and shrink government services generally.

The House-Senate conference agreement that included the reconciliation instructions cleared the House by a 244-155 vote and passed the Senate, 76-20.

New Slide Show, Graphics Focus on Labor's Centennial

The AFL-CIO has added an educational slide show, a portable historical display and a reproduction of original art to the materials available for use during the celebration of organized labor's centennial year.

Previewed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its spring meeting in Baltimore, the slide show, titled "Achievement and Challenge," focuses on labor's growth over the past 100 years. It contains a built-in soundtrack with special music and a professional narrator.

The 11-minute show, which involves the use of two projectors, 4-track tape equipment, stereo speakers and a professional control deck, has been converted into ¾-inch videocassette form and 16 mm motion and local unions, central bodies, schools and others. Available now, the purchase price for the videocassette is $30; for the picture film to meet the needs of national film, $65.

Also in production, for delivery in June, is a film strip version of the slide show. The price for the strip with accompanying soundtrack will be approximately $25.

All versions will be available for rental through the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

ALSO SHOWN at the council meeting was a set of three large historical panels suitable for display in union halls, at meetings, in schools and in public libraries.

Through pictures symbolic of the activities and people of organized labor since 1881, brief explanatory text and captions, the panels tell the story of labor's struggle and service to union members and to the entire American public. Distribution will begin in June.

The council viewed for the first time artist Robert Rauschenberg's new work, a lithograph titled "AFL-CIO Centennial Commemorative Artwork."

CREATED FROM a montage of photographs and graphic materials drawn from labor history, the 25-by-38-inch print was produced from nine plates under the personal supervision of the artist at Prolith International, a leading reproducer of art in the Washington metropolitan area, with the cooperation of the Graphic Arts International Union.

The edition of 300 copies of the artwork was signed and numbered by the artist. The print is being readied now for reproduction in quantity and will be available in June.

Scheduled for completion around July 1 is the centennial documentary film, a 27-minute motion picture to be called "A Time of Challenge."

"A Short History of American Labor," the 36-page brochure issued in February, quickly went out of print due to demand. It has been reprinted in quantity and is once again available at the listed price of $1.

THE CENTENNIAL poster featuring Samuel Gompers' answer to the question, "What does labor want?" is also available through the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, in addition to reprints of articles and features from the American Federationist and the centennial bumper sticker.

Order blanks for these materials are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 - 16th St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Hillman Awards Cite Outstanding Work in Media

New York—Penny Lernoux, a reporter and Latin American affairs expert, received one of four Sidney Hillman Foundation awards in communications at a luncheon ceremony here honoring outstanding achievements in 1980 in the fields of newspaper reporting, radio and television documentaries, magazine articles, and books.

Lernoux's award was for her book, "Cry of the People," a study of the struggle for human rights in Latin America. Other winners at the 31st annual awards presentation were:

- The Miami Herald, for an investigative series of articles titled "Police Brutality" that dealt with tensions in Miami over racial problems.
- Bill Moyers' Journal, for a television documentary examining the influence of the New Right in national politics. Moyers won a similar award in 1977.
- The MacNeil-Lehrer Report, which was given a special award for continued excellence in TV journalism.

The winners each received scrolls and $750 checks.

THE AWARDS are a memorial to Sidney Hillman, first president of the original Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, which merged in 1976 with the Textile Workers Union of America to form the Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers. They were established to recognize those in the media who have the courage to report on any subject, no matter how controversial, in the hope of improving society as a whole.

Judges for the 1980 awards were TV commentator Edwards P. Morgan, author and lecturer Harrison E. Salisbury, and columnist and television commentator Carl T. Rowan.

OPIC Renewal Fought on Jobs Export Issue

The AFL-CIO urged Congress not to extend the life of the Overseas Private Investment Corp. (OPIC), which insures U.S. investors in 80 developing nations against losses from expropriation, war, revolution and blocked currency.

In practice, OPIC has encouraged the export of U.S. capital, jobs and technology, AFL-CIO Economist Elizabeth R. Jager told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee.

She asked rejection of a bill to extend OPIC's authorization an additional four years. The program encourages firms to invest abroad rather than in the United States. Its extension "would have the taxpayers continue to subsidize industry abroad, even those operations which produce job-destroying imports," she stressed.

Jager said congressional attempts to correct abuses in OPIC's operations have not been successful and the program should be terminated "as soon as possible."

OPIC's 1980 annual report, she noted, shows that the chief beneficiaries of its program were the same "giant firms and banks that have always benefited from them."

Illinois Legislature Swamps 'Right-to-Work' Proposal

Springfield, Ill.—The Illinois House of Representatives voted 138 to 25 to kill a so-called right-to-work bill, dealing supporters of the anti-worker measure their eighth defeat this year.

State AFL-CIO President Robert G. Gibson applauded the house action, declaring that "these 138 members weren't fooled by the rhetoric. Right-to-work-for-less proposals have never guaranteed any worker a right to a job. Rather they are intended to destroy the effectiveness of the labor union movement in Illinois."

Gibson added that the 25 votes in favor of "right-to-work," all cast by Republicans, were fewer than the number of sponsors listed on the bill.

When the measure was reported out of the Republican-dominated House Labor Committee, it marked the first time such a bill had reached the floor of the House in Illinois legislative history, Gibson said.

The vote against the compulsory open shop, Gibson said, "puts this phony issue behind us." He said Illinois labor will now concentrate its legislative efforts to seek defeat of a series of anti-worker proposals sent to the House floor by the same Labor Committee.

Those measures include bills that would slash unemployment compensation by 40 percent, drastically cut workers' compensation, repeal certain safety laws covering work on hazardous construction sites, and cut wages paid on public construction projects.

Bills to outlaw union shop contracts have been defeated since the first of the year by state legislatures in New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, Idaho, West Virginia and Maryland, as well as Illinois. A New Mexico measure was killed by the governor's veto.

the laws, they noted. In Rhode Island, where a large percentage of costume jewelry manufacture is concentrated, "most of the manufacturing is performed by small job shops." Most are unorganized, employing "large numbers of aliens and minorities, including undocumented workers." Already, illegal homework operations exist where families work until late at night "and truant officers in the state complain that children are being kept out of school to perform the work."

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan declined an invitation to testify before the subcommittee, but Deputy Under Sec. of Labor Robert B. Collyer said the department would be better able to protect workers by repealing the ban on industrial homework and mounting a "strong enforcement effort."

Subcommittee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) scoffed at the assertion and noted that the Reagan Administration budget required a substantial cutback in enforcement staff for the Fair Labor Standards Act.

IN A SPEECH to business leaders later that day, Donovan said he will press for stiffer penalties for repeated violators of the Fair Labor Standards Act as part of a campaign against sweatshop operations.

Donovan said the combination of measures would result in "a regulatory framework that makes sense, penalizing the exploitation of workers, wherever it exists, but not penalizing work."

Denison, testifying for the AFL-CIO, challenged the Secretary of Labor's view that allowing homework in the industries where it has been prohibited would "open up job opportunities."

In practice, he warned, it would destroy jobs the economy needs, and the replacement "opportunities" are "an unacceptable tradeoff."

CONVENTIONS

The Carpenters' 1981 convention in Chicago will open Aug. 31 rather than Sept. 4 as previously listed.

The Public Employee Dept. will hold its 1981 convention June 11-12 in Washington, D.C.

THE REGULATIONS the Administration proposes to revoke, Denison noted, allow homework in seven specified industries to be performed "only by persons unable to adjust to factory work because of age or physical or mental disability, or by persons who must remain at home to care for an invalid." The covered industries are jewelry manufacturing, gloves and mittens, knitted outerwear, button and buckle manufacturing, women's apparel, handkerchief manufacturing and embroideries.

Chaikin told the subcommittee that industrial homework gave employers a means of violating labor standards laws "with total impunity."

When laws made child labor illegal, he testified, employers shifted to homework for "obvious" reason. "When an employer farmed out work to an adult worker to be taken home to be finished, the employer could readily disclaim responsibility if the woman who took the work home had her children work on the garments."

CHAIKIN NOTED also that when factory laws compelled employers to meet standards for fire prevention and sanitation, many simply evaded the responsibility by farming out work to be done in tenement "rat holes and fire traps."

A South Carolina dress manufacturer, Jack Davis, said legitimate business operations would be undercut by outfits using homeworkers.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said he supported an exemption that would allow a cottage knitting operation in rural Vermont to continue. But he said the problem could have been dealt with by the Labor Dept. through more "carefully crafted" changes instead of repeal of the entire homework ban.

SEN. DANIEL Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.) protested that the Labor Dept. was proposing to turn back the clock to evils that "we thought had disappeared like tuberculosis."

And for the National Consumers League, Ruth Jordan charged that the Labor Dept. is evading its obligation to maintain the integrity of the Fair Labor Standards Act by its proposal to legalize homework.

SWEATSHOP ERA would be brought back by a Labor Dept. plan to end the ban on industrial homework, Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin warned at House hearings. At left is ILGWU Counsel Max Zimny.

Court Allows Pension Offset For Workers' Compensation

The Supreme Court has upheld the legality of provisions in private pension plans that reduce a retiree's benefits by the amount of a state worker's compensation award for job-related injuries.

In an 8-to-0 decision, the court ruled that Congress contemplated and approved such "offset" provisions when it enacted the 1974 Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) regulating private pension plans.

THE OPINION by Justice Thurgood Marshall strikes down parts of a 1977 New Jersey law prohibiting pension plans from deducting injury or disability awards from retirement benefits. Justice William J. Brennan took no part in the decision.

The ruling stems from employee challenges to pension plans maintained by General Motors Corp. and Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc. Many pension plans contain provisions similar to those challenged.

The suit against GM was filed in 1977 by two workers in behalf of a class of retired employees who were receiving pensions under the GM plan when they collected workers' compensation benefits. One worker received some $2,500 and the other $2,300. The full amount of the awards was then deducted by the employer from their pension benefits.

SIX OTHER retirees filed a similar class action early in 1978 against Raybestos-Manhattan, when similar deductions were made from their pension benefits. Both lawsuits alleged violations of New Jersey state law.

The employers removed the suits to federal district courts where judges in both cases held that the pension offset provisions violated New Jersey law, and that Congress had not intended ERISA to preempt such state laws. They also held that the offsets were barred by Section 203(a) of ERISA prohibiting forfeiture of vested pension rights. Section 203 states that "each pension plan shall provide that an employee's right to his normal retirement benefits is nonforfeitable upon the attainment of normal retirement age."

The 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals reversed both findings on Feb. 15, 1980, and the Supreme Court granted review of the matter last November.

MARSHALL EXPLAINED in his opinion that the retirees' argument based on Section 203 ignores the fact that except for certain restrictions imposed by ERISA, private parties are free to define the content of the pension benefits that, once vested, cannot be forefeited.

Prior to 1977, New Jersey had approved workers' compensation offsets in collectively bargained pension agreements. In that year, the state legislature amended the New Jersey Workers' Compensation Act to outlaw such offsets.

Labor's Tax Alternative Tied to Aid for Workers

Employers would be given a 5 percent tax credit on their share of the payroll tax.

Business assistance would be channeled through a tripartite board to the goal of "revitalization and rehabilitation of the nation's basic industries and economically distressed areas," Kirkland said.

"The alternative we support provides a greater share of tax relief to those low and middle-income families who need help now," Kirkland told the committee.

"IT PROVIDES tax relief for smaller, more labor-intensive companies ignored by the Reagan proposal. And it targets other business tax incentives to those areas and industries, new and old, that most need help."

Even members of Congress who have gone along with the Administration's spending cut demands have questioned the President's call for a three-year series of tax cuts, mounting to 30 percent.

The AFL-CIO shares that concern "about the consequences of locking the economy into a three-year tax cut," Kirkland said. Any further reductions, he urged, "should be based on experience, not guesswork."

SERVICE EMPLOYEES President John J. Sweeney also testified before the Senate panel in opposition to the Administration tax bill.

"The President's program will not provide real tax relief for the overwhelming majority of service workers," Sweeney said. "In fact, most of our members will be paying a larger share of their income in taxes under the plan because of inflation and increased payroll taxes."

But the U.S. Chamber of Commerce testified that it "strongly supports" the Administration tax proposal.

TAX CUTS proposed by the Reagan Administration are tilted toward the wealthy and would chiefly benefit businesses that are already most profitable, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testified. With him at Senate Finance Committee hearings are Research Director Rudy Oswald, left, and Legislative Director Ray Denison.

Media Restraint Asked on Early Voting Projection

The AFL-CIO has joined with the League of Women Voters and other concerned organizations in a letter urging radio and television networks and wire services not to project the winner of the presidential election while polls are still open on the West Coast.

In last November's election, many voters didn't bother to go to the polls because projections based on results from states in earlier time zones pointed to a big Reagan victory.

While the falloff in late voting did not affect the presidential outcome, it probably influenced the results of several close contests for Congress and for state or local offices.

THE LETTER to the news media stressed that voluntary restraint in projecting early returns would not infringe on freedom of the press.

"We do not believe that any news agency should refrain from full and fair reporting of actual and final counts when they become available," the letter specified. "But a projection, no matter how it is derived, is not the same as the actual results and can have the effect of influencing those results."

The organizations joining in the request urged that there should be "one night every four years when the people should be allowed their full and fair opportunity to speak, when their voice should be heard and their story should be told as it unfolds."

A Facade of Equity

THE ADMINISTRATION tax program is presented with a facade of "equity" for individuals and "neutrality" for corporations. It is neither.

The bulk of the benefits of the individual tax cut go to those individuals in the highest income brackets—nearly 30 percent to the top 5 percent. By contrast, the program we support would give 60 percent of the benefit to the vast majority of taxpayers who earn less than $30,000 a year.

It is neither equitable nor fair for the government to grant almost $17,000 in tax cuts over the next three years to an individual earning $100,000 a year, while those earning the median family annual income of $20,000 receive less than $1,500.

BY THE SAME TOKEN, those corporations with the highest earnings—oil companies, the communications industry and other capital-intensive firms—would gain the lion's share of the business tax cuts. Those industries facing the most critical needs—such as auto and steel—would get little benefit.

With persistent high unemployment, the nation needs jobs. Yet the Administration proposal concentrates its benefits on larger, more prosperous, capital-intensive firms with little potential to increase employment.

It seems to us a more prudent use of tax dollars to encourage investments that will increase employment opportunities, especially in hard-pressed urban areas. The 10-5-3 depreciation allowance speed-up is not a program to encourage investment; it is a program to shift the tax burden from corporations onto the backs of individuals.

Given the current state of the American economy, we see absolutely no reason why the government should reward any company for purchasing equipment from abroad. Speeding up depreciation allowances on Datsuns would only speed up the deterioration of the American automobile industry.

Because we are also concerned about the consequences of locking the economy into a three-year tax cut, the AFL-CIO supports a one-year tax cut. Any further changes should be based on experience, not guesswork.

THE ALTERNATIVE we support provides a greater share of tax relief to those low and middle-income families who need help now. It provides tax relief for smaller, more labor-intensive companies ignored by the Reagan proposal. And it targets other business tax incentives to those areas and industries, new and old, that most need help.

This alternative recognizes that tax burdens are too high for many, but not all individuals; that some industries need tax relief, but not all.

Most importantly, it also avoids the economic peril that could result from shackling the country to one set economic approach that, at best, is highly questionable.

Shifting the Burden

Corporate Share of Tax Load Shows Steady Drop Since '58

By Gus Tyler

NOW LISTEN, all ye budget balancers, there really is a very simple way to do it. Just get corporations to pay their "proper share" and we could balance the budget and restore all those unkindly cuts.

What's a "proper share," you ask. Just have the corporations carry the same share of federal taxes that they did in 1958 and all will be in balance.

The proof can be found in the application of elementary arithmetic. Just try it:

IN 1958, total receipts of the federal government were $78 billion of which about $18 billion were from taxes on corporate profits. That means that corporations were then carrying about 23 percent of the tax load and, if you please, doing very nicely with after-tax profits.

But, as always, corporations complained that they were being taxed to death and that they needed relief in the form of this kind and that kind of shelter. As a consequence, corporations began to carry an ever lesser part of the load.

By 1970, corporations were carrying about 17 percent of the tax burden; by 1980, the corporate share had fallen to a mere 13.3 percent. By 1982, it is projected that corporations will pick up only 10.8 percent of the federal tax total—which is less than half the share they carried in 1958.

NOW LET'S DO our elementary calculations on what would happen if corporations in 1981 were to carry their "proper share," using the year 1958 as a modest measure of "propriety."

The estimated total tax receipts for 1981 are $614 billion. Corporations are expected to pay $67.9 billion, a rate equal to 11 percent.

But if the corporations paid at the 1958 rate of 23.3 percent, they would pay in $143 billion instead of a pallid $67.9 billion.

THAT MEANS, if you simply subtract what they will pay in from what they should be paying in, Uncle Sam would end up $75 billion richer.

That $75 billion would easily cover the deficit and would leave almost $30 billion to restore some of those vital services that the Administration wants to chop down.

But instead of raising the corporate share from 13 percent in 1980 back up to the good old 23 percent that prevailed in 1958, it is proposed to lower the corporate portion from 13 to 11 to 10 percent.

OBVIOUSLY, the budget is going to be unbalanced if the corporations that once carried one-quarter of the responsibility are now carrying only one-tenth and are still pushing to be excused altogether from carrying any of the costs.

The budget is unbalanced because the corporations have unbalanced it by excusing themselves from the obligation of paying their "proper share" of the nation's costs.

White Collar Women Battle for Full Rights

Women are changing the face of the workforce in the United States. The old picture of the average woman working only until she gets married doesn't hold true today.

The changes resulting from the tremendous number of women entering and re-entering the workforce are affecting how "equal employment opportunity" is defined—by the government, unions and employers.

This is especially true for women in white collar jobs.

The "prestige" of a white collar job is no longer sufficient. What matters is that women's jobs are recognized for their value and worth to the employer and the community, that non-glamorous health hazards such as office equipment fumes and stress are recognized for the contributions they are making to illness among white collar women, that responsibility for families be shared, and that convenient, quality child care be available.

What we must continue to fight for, through our unions and in our governments, is elimination of continuing discrimination in our pay, our advancement opportunities, our benefits, and in the recognition of our contributions to our nations' economies.

—AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce D. Miller in welcome to delegates to the World Women's Conference, Washington, D.C., May 13, 1981.

Turning Back the Clock

Homework Lets Employer Flout Labor Standards with Impunity

The following is excerpted from testimony by President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers at a House Labor Standards subcommittee hearing, May 19, 1981.

INDUSTRIAL HOMEWORK has always been a way to violate the law with nearly total impunity. For instance, when laws were passed prohibiting industrial employment of children below a certain age, employers shifted to homework.

The reason was obvious. If children of illegal age were employed in the factory, either a government inspector or the union or some worker could lodge a complaint. But when an employer farmed out work to an adult worker to be taken home to be finished, the employer could readily disclaim responsibility if the woman who took the work home had her children work on the garments. And that is precisely what happened.

As that great American poet Edwin Markham wrote in 1907—when homework was legal—"The children are called in from play to drive and drudge beside their elders. The load falls upon the ones least able to bear it—upon the backs of the little children at the base of the labor pyramid."

AND WHO IS IT that calls the children "in from play?" It is the parent, of course—not the employer. Will this parent then turn herself in for violating the law by employing children?

Another example. Various states passed factory laws, especially after the gruesome Triangle Fire in our industry. The object was to reduce the danger of fire and unsanitary conditions. To evade those laws, employers turned to homework. If the work was done—as it was—in filthy kitchens, in rat holes, in firetraps, the employer could disclaim all responsibility. Are we to expect that the worker at home would register a complaint about her work environment when her work site is her home?

So it went. A law was passed to counter abuses in the factory and the reflexive action of many employers was to use industrial homework as a way to evade the law.

TO ARGUE—as the Secretary of Labor does—that legalization of homework would encourage enforcement of the law is to fly in the face of all experience and to reject the conclusions of common sense.

This is particularly true in the light of what happened during the period of the National Recovery Act when a massive effort was made to establish standards by codes for separate industries. The NRA codes sought to establish standards by codes for separate industries. The NRA codes sought to establish standards affecting wages, hours, and child labor. Most codes in an industry where homework was widespread banned it because it was widely understood that if homework were to be permitted and remain unregulated, it would not be possible to maintain the proper labor standards.

The Bureau of Women & Children of the Pennsylvania Dept. of Labor conducted an exhaustive study that concluded: "No matter how stringent the regulations, how honest the investigators, the sweatshop conditions will continue to exist until homework is abolished."

The Women's Bureau did a study in Rhode Island, reaching the same conclusion: "The prevention of child labor is practically impossible under a system of industrial homework. It is a temptation in families that eke out their existence to increase their pitifully small earnings with the aid of even very small children."

IT IS important to note the two reasons why the National Recovery Administration concluded that it was necessary to abolish homework. First, homework made it impossible to enforce the industrial codes regulating hours, wages and child labor. Second, homework had disastrous "competitive effects."

Employers using homeworkers paid less. They were able to undercut legitimate employers. In a kind of industrial Gresham's Law where bad money drives out good money, bad employers drove out good employers.

That's why good employers—and, by that I mean employers who lived within the law—joined readily in the move to abolish homework.

Homework is a simple way to violate the law without fear of punishment: no minimum wage, no overtime, no limit on hours, no health and safety measures, no taxes. To legalize such homework is to multiply violations.

THE WEIGHT of accumulated experience and the application of simple common sense make perfectly clear that homework is an evil that can not be "regulated" and that most certainly can not be cured by complaints from workers caught in the system.

The reasons why homework must be restricted are as valid today as they ever were. In fact, in two respects they are even more valid. First, there is a huge body of illegal aliens who are the natural prey for such a system. Second, the cash economy is widespread today and payment off-the-books is a common practice. These two facts make homework more dangerous and difficult to regulate than ever before.

All of the evidence—past and present—demonstrates the overwhelming need to maintain homework restrictions. Indeed, never has the need been so urgent.

Major Cities Hit

Health Funds Slash Threatens Hospital Closings, Job Losses

THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION's severe cutback in funds for health care programs will affect large numbers of Americans who depend on medical and hospital services, Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz of the Service Employees warned in a network radio interview.

Cordtz said the adverse impact of these reductions has already hit some of the nation's major cities, particularly facilities that handle emergency cases and serve the elderly, poverty-level and low-income families.

The Reagan budget will not only force many hospitals, clinics and long-term facilities to shut down, he said, but will reduce the number of doctors, nurses and other medical and health personnel needed to staff and operate those that remain.

Cordtz was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, the AFL-CIO public affairs program broadcast weekly by Mutual radio.

Cordtz said that the health care cutbacks will cause "more than just a ripple" throughout the economy. He noted that hundreds of thousands of jobs are directly or indirectly involved in the health care industry. He cited the impact in Michigan—a high-unemployment state—where four institutions have already shut down their nursing programs, and health care professionals predict that within two years nearly half of the 88 certified hospitals in the greater Detroit area will have closed their doors.

THE PROJECTED layoffs will fall heavily on some of the nation's lowest-paid workers, Cordtz stressed. He said that wages in the health care industry are far below the national average. Convalescent home workers, for example, earn only $6,000 to $6,700 a year, which is less than the government itself says is needed for survival-level living, Cordtz pointed out.

He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Douglas Harbrecht of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Calvin Zon of Press Associates, Inc.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE UNITED STATES has nearly 8 million people actively seeking work and unable to find it. While the underlying economy is strong, high interest rates and reduced federal spending probably will add to the unemployment rolls in the period ahead.

Against this background, the Reagan Administration is seriously considering a plan to import hundreds of thousands of Mexican nationals to work in America's factories, mills, stores and offices.

These new jobseekers would be called, in the euphemism of the times, "guestworkers."

THE AIM OF the White House is not to "soak up" the illegal or undocumented workers already in this country who are variously estimated to total 2 to 12 million. Rather, it is to develop a new program as part of a "North American Accord" to improve relations with Mexico. It also may give President Reagan a card to play when he discusses Mexican oil, gas and other matters when he meets with Mexico's president in June.

If domestic unemployment is not enough to dissuade the Administration, then it might learn something from the experience of western Europe.

As Europe recovered from World War II and unemployment was near zero, many countries began importing foreign or "guest" workers for lower-paid menial jobs, ostensibly on a temporary basis.

THE EUROPEAN migration grew to a total of some 30 million people. The members of the Common Market were the chief receivers, except for Ireland and Italy. The chief labor-supplying nations were Ireland and Italy, along with Portugal, Spain, Finland, Greece, Turkey and Yugoslavia. Algeria, Sudan and Morocco became labor exporters in the 1970s.

The recruiting of "guest" workers stopped with the 1973-74 energy crisis and rising unemployment. The problem then became one of trying to persuade the "guests" to go home while integrating those who had settled.

If the lessons of Europe are too remote, there are experiences closer to home.

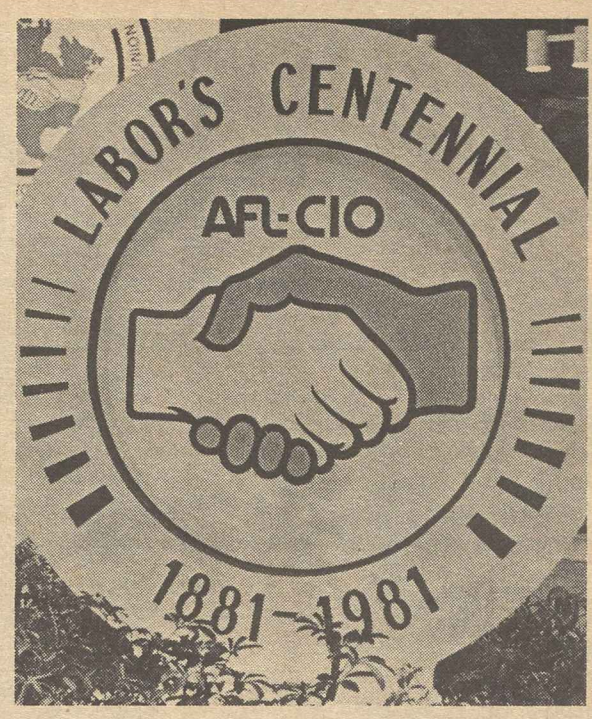
A task force of the National Committee for Full Employment has urged the Reagan Administration not to repeat the "disasters" of past programs which exploited Mexican workers.

The bracero program that operated from 1942 to 1963 brought hundreds of thousands of campesinos to work for U.S. agribusiness, the task force recalled, and it did not help U.S.-Mexican relations.

Ernesto Galarza, in his classic "Merchants of Labor," examined in fine detail how an efficient system of administered migration was developed by the United States and Mexico to supply labor to agribusiness. The Mexicans were docile, cheap and captive. Americans lost job opportunities, and farm labor unions were kept weak. There was corruption and collusion between growers and officials. It was a big success, but not worthy of a great democracy.

IN THE 1950s, when Congress periodically considered what could be done about the bracero problem, Galarza proposed an ambitious bi-national Rio Grande Valley development program to absorb Mexico's unemployed and build harmony between the two nations. That was never done and the United States remains the "safety valve" for job-hungry Mexicans.

Today, members of the Full Employment Committee's Task Force are urging the Reagan Administration to act constructively on the "undocumented" worker problem instead of pursuing the "guestworker" plan. They would offer a two-layered amnesty plan: "green card" or commuter status for the more senior undocumented workers and H-2 or temporary job status for others.



It is to be hoped that President Reagan will choose to work on the problem at hand rather than create new ones.

HEALTH CARE CUTBACKS in the Reagan budget will leave large numbers of Americans without full-range medical and hospital services, Service Employees Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz, center, warned on Labor News Conference. Reporters questioning him were Calvin Zon, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Douglas Harbrecht of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

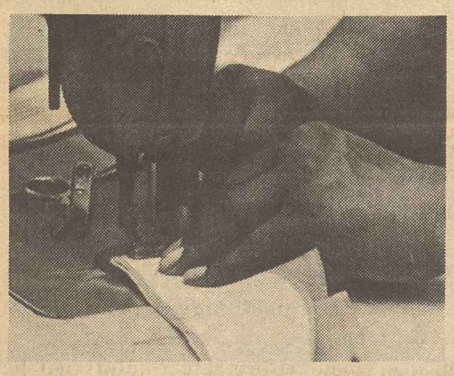
Union-Industries Show a Hit

A close-up look at union members' skills in action, and how products are made and services delivered, attracted some 200,000 visitors to the 36th AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show in Baltimore.

The show, produced in a different city each year by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., is the only labor-management exposition of its kind in the United States.

It is labor relations in action as visitors see the benefits to business and workers of the good labor-management relations that are the rule in the American system of collective bargaining.



And they have fun in the process, with prizes and souvenirs to take home.

Skills in action are a highlight of show for some 200,000 visitors.

Storm Grows Over Social Security Cuts

Senate Democratic Whip Alan Cranston of California said the vote on the caucus resolution marked the first time since Reagan took office that the Democrats, now in the minority in the Senate, have spoken with one voice.

EARLIER, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill (D-Mass.) pledged he would fight the proposed social security cuts "every inch of the way . . . and I hope that will be the position of every member of my party."

O'Neill told reporters that telephones were "ringing off the hook" in congressional offices since the Reagan program was announced, adding that "people are enraged the President has broken his campaign pledge on social security."

Leaders of Save Our Security, a coalition of 83 groups representing the elderly and union members, held an emergency meeting in Washington to map a major drive against the Reagan cuts. The coalition, which successfully opposed the Carter Administration's recommendations on social security two years ago, is headed by Wilbur J. Cohen, who was Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare in the Johnson Administration, and Robert M. Ball, former Social Security Commissioner under three Presidents.

COHEN TOLD a New York Times interviewer that four of the Reagan proposals would reduce social security benefits by a total of $81.9 billion over the next five years if they were approved by Congress. He called the President's program "a calamity, a tragedy, and a catastrophe," which would "destroy people's confidence in the institution of social security," and make workers question whether they should continue to contribute to the social security fund.

The Reagan proposal that provoked the greatest outrage—the cut in early-retirement benefits—would reduce monthly payments for a person retiring at age 62 to 55 percent of full benefits instead of 80 percent as provided by current law. For a worker eligible for full retirement benefits choosing to retire at age 62 in January 1982 that would mean a monthly benefit of only $310.50 compared with $469.60 under current law. By January 1987, the figure would be $430 a month compared with $755.60.

But Senate Finance Committee Chairman Bob Dole (R-Kan.) said his talks with congressional collegues showed that Congress was "probably not going to do very much soon as far as early retirees are concerned. . . . Those who will turn 62 in the next few years probably won't have very much to worry about."

ON THE television program, "Face the Nation," Dole also expressed surprise and dismay at the timing of the social security proposals. "We've got all we can do right now dealing with the budget and taxes," he said. "We ought to clear the deck before we bite the bullet on social security."

On the House side, Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) opened hearings on the proposed reductions before the House Committee on Aging, which he chairs.

Maryland House Seat To Remain Democratic

A labor-supported Democrat, Steny H. Hoyer, was elected to the House from Maryland's 5th Congressional District despite a strong Administration effort for his opponent.

Hoyer received 55.1 percent of the vote to defeat Audrey Scott in the district that Democrat Gladys Noon Spellman represented since 1975. She has been hospitalized in a semi-coma since last October, and her seat was declared vacant.

The district, primarily a suburb of Washington, D.C., has a Democratic registration majority. But Vice President Bush campaigned for the Republican candidate and President Reagan sent a letter on her behalf.

EQUAL JOB OPPORTUNITIES and appropriate wages are goals shared by women workers around the world who are turning in growing numbers to trade unions to achieve them, Food & Commercial Workers' President William H. Wynn tells delegates to the World Women's Conference. The meeting was sponsored by the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional & Technical Employees (FIET) in Washington, D.C. Also shown are FIET President Gunther Stephan; General Sec. Heribert Maier and UFCW Vice President Norma Steill.

Women's Conference Keyed to Job Issues

One of the most important challenges facing labor is the fight for equal opportunity and equal treatment for women white-collar workers.

This was the message that President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers carried to some 250 delegates to the second World Women's Conference in Washington.

IT ALSO formed the theme of the three-day conference, which was hosted by the UFCW and sponsored by the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional & Technical Employees (FIET). More than 7 million white collar workers throughout the non-Communist world belong to FIET, which has headquarters in Geneva. Three million of those members —about 43 percent—are women.

From the rapid increase in the number of women in the U.S. workforce over the last three decades—from about 18 million in 1950 to more than 40 million in 1979—"it would appear that American women have, at long last, gained equal access to the educational, economic, social and political rewards of our society," Wynn observed.

But while women are working, he said, a high proportion of them are still working in jobs "which have been aptly described as 'the women's ghetto.'"

EVEN THOUGH some women have made inroads into traditionally male vocations and higher wage brackets, Wynn pointed out that the overall average of women's salaries in the United States is only 59.1 percent of men's wages.

Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, told the delegates that the difference in women's and men's pay levels is due mainly to occupational segregation.

Although women have "cracked the door" in almost all occupations, Miller noted that more than half of all working women hold white collar jobs and, out of these, over half are in low-paying clerical positions.

MILLER SAID the United States is ahead in policies and programs which promote equality in the workplace even though European countries have more laws guaranteeing equal opportunity and protection for women. She cited Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, federal employment and training programs, Title IX, and the Women's Educational Equity Act as contributing to advances made by American women.

However, Miller said "continued support for these efforts under the present Administration does not look hopeful."

In addition, she said, gains made through these efforts are "unfortunately, not enough."

She emphasized, as did other speakers at the opening session, that organizing women white collar workers could provide the impetus for achieving equal status in the workforce. Through negotiated wage increases and benefits, traditionally female jobs can be upgraded to the point of making them more attractive to men, Miller pointed out, encouraging them to move into these occupations and ease occupational segregation.

ANOTHER BENEFIT of organizing women, Miller said, is in the area of pay equity—equal pay for work of comparable value. Union strategies to achieve pay equity for members include studies of job classifications and wage rates, negotiated upgrading of traditional female jobs, grievance and arbitration procedures and court suits, she said. (PAI)

New Rule Changes Weighed Cutting Worker Protections

Open-shop contractors have complained that this sometimes forces them to pay higher union wages and fringe benefits to non-union workers.

Ryan said the regulation and its administration will be scrutinized "to assess whether the rules' benefits exceed their costs and whether the wage determinations issued under current practice accurately reflect locally prevailing wages."

HE SAID the department is also considering contracting out the gathering of prevailing wage data to a private organization instead of using Labor Dept. employees.

Other issues being considered include whether to permit increased use of helpers and trainees at lower wage rates on federal construction contracts, and possible elimination of the requirement that contractors submit weekly payroll records for checking of wage rates.

Ryan indicated that the Labor Dept. is in the final stages of making its decisions on regulatory changes. They will then be submitted for review to the Office of Management & Budget and officially proposed before the end of June. Interested parties will then have an opportunity to comment before the regulations are made final.

He said that earlier this month Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan had met "with affected interest groups to inform them of the department's general notions about possible ways to improve the rules and to permit them to ask questions concerning the department's approach."

THE LABOR DEPT. fact sheet on changes it is considering in the Service Contract Act regulations deals largely with jurisdiction of the law, which sets wage standards for contractors providing services to government agencies.

The new Administration is questioning whether to cover, as the Carter Administration intended, contracts for automated data processings and other "high technology" equipment, timber sales and removals, research and development, equipment overhaul and modification.

It also will look into the issue of coverage of a part of a contract that involves services, even if that is not the principal purpose of the contract. And it will consider changes in the wage-determination procedures.

The Carter Administration had proposed tightening some of the regulations involving affirmative action programs coming under the Office of Federal Contract Compliance.

THE REAGAN Administration is considering changes to loosen the regulations, including exemption of more small contractors.

Among the points being considered, Ryan indicated, are:

- Whether back pay is an appropriate remedy for violations.
- How to address sex discrimination in the workplace.
- Whether to specify numerical goals for minority and female participation in construction, whether non-federal construction work of covered contractors should be exempted, and whether contractors should be required to develop affirmative action plans for their non-construction employees.

Ryan was asked how the Reagan Administration proposed to apply a cost-benefit test to the value of affirmative action programs in eliminating the effects of past discrimination.

He responded that this could be done.

Prime Lending Rate Back Up to 20%

Most major banks lifted their prime lending rate another half-point to 20 percent, the fifth increase in the rate in about five weeks.

The key lending rate, the charge posted by banks on loans to their best corporate customers, is now at its highest level since Jan. 5. At that time, the rate was beginning to decline from December's record 21.5 percent. The rate continued to fall until it bottomed out at 17 percent last month before turning upward again.

The higher prime rate will inevitably mean higher interest rates on all borrowing, thus pushing up the cost of housing, autos and other consumer purchases.

Despite Fund Cutback

HRDI to Press Training, Job Placement Activities

The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute will carry on its job training and placement activities for disadvantaged workers on a national scale, but sharp cuts in federal funds that its programs depend on mean HRDI must tighten up its staff and activities for the rest of 1981.

That appraisal of the status and future of the AFL-CIO's employment and training arm was made at special meetings of HRDI's executive staff and trustees following notification from the Labor Dept. that the institute's contract for programs under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Administration would be cut by some 37 percent.

HRDI "FULLY intends to carry out its mandate from the AFL-CIO to assist the unemployed and disadvantaged to obtain training and jobs," HRDI President Alan Kistler reported to the board. He said the stiff cut in CETA grant funds means HRDI must reduce its staff and curtail its programs so that remaining funds can be used to continue services on a national scale until the end of fiscal 1981 on Oct. 1.

Among those national activities, Kistler said, will be efforts to find private sector jobs for many of the 340,000 CETA public service employees about to be displaced by the dropping of that program.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who serves as chairman of the 23-member board, praised HRDI's successful training, placement and job-creating record in its 13-year history.

KIRKLAND emphasized that the nature of federally supported employment and training policies is unclear after CETA expires in 1982, but it is likely there will be "significant revisions" in the system.

The AFL-CIO, with other concerned organizations, "will fight for a continuation of a national policy that would afford the most disadvantaged workers within our society the opportunity to obtain meaningful employment," Kirkland said. Whatever new policies are set, he said, "the labor movement must continue to be an active partner and participant."

He stressed that with assistance from HRDI, the federation will be active in developing proposals for future employment and training policy.

THE CUTS in the federal budget will mean that as of May 22, HRDI will close 25 of its 58 area offices, discontinue its veterans' assistance program, and close five of its nine handicapped placement offices. In addition, all 17 field associate representative positions will be cut along with 10 national office staff positions for a total of 89 jobs eliminated. Nine of HRDI's 25 targeted outreach programs, sponsored by local building trades councils, will be ended by June 30.

Executive Director Michael M. Arnold explained to the board that the decisions on the closings took into account local community needs, past performance, seniority, and HRDI's structural needs to maintain a national presence and program.

He said HRDI is working with state and local central bodies and building trades councils in the areas where its offices will close to help find local funding to keep the training and employment program going.

Efforts are also under way to find employment for HRDI employees whose jobs have been eliminated. Arnold stressed that these workers are experienced employment and training experts whose skills are valuable to the labor movement.

'Reforms' Seen Adding to Delay In Rule-Setting

Regulatory "reform" bills being considered by House and Senate subcommittees would complicate rather than simplify government rule-setting, the AFL-CIO protested.

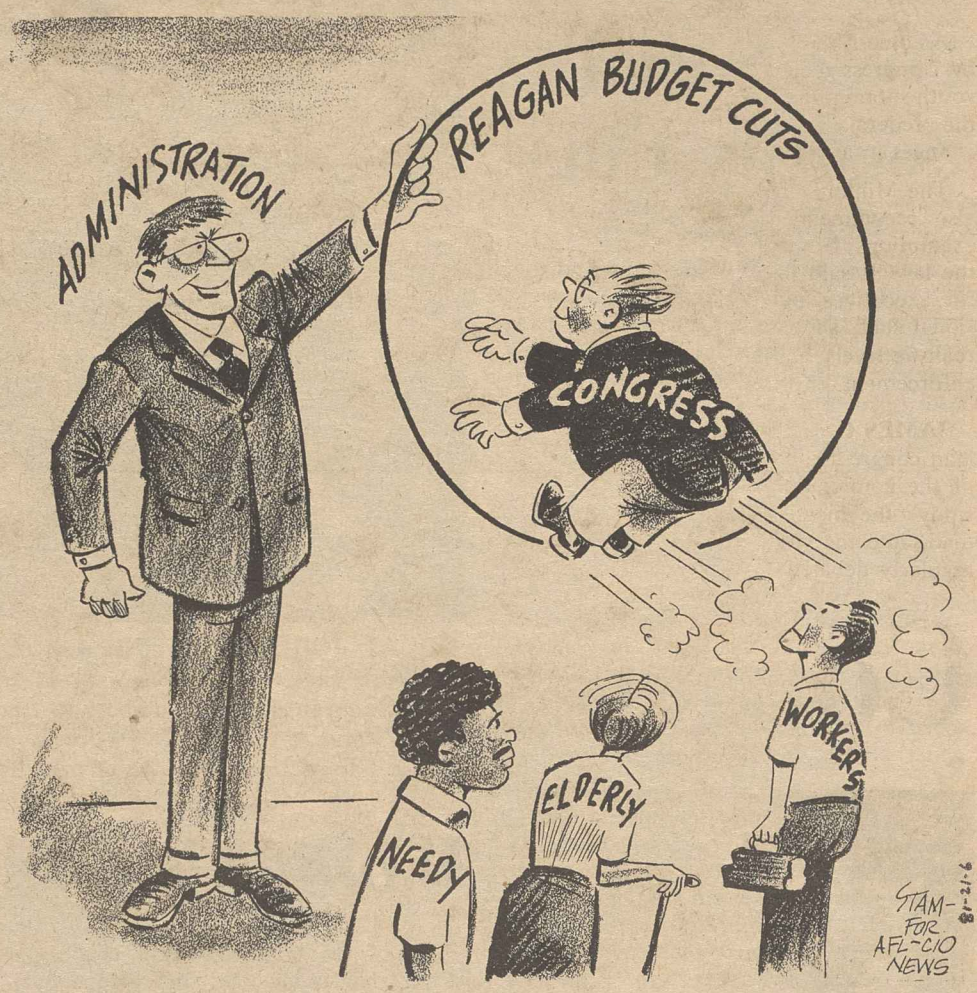
Labor would support legislation that would "cut red tape, weed out useless or duplicative regulations and improve the responsiveness of regulators to matters that affect workers," Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe testified.

BUT MARLOWE told Judiciary subcommittees of both the House and Senate that the similar bills that are before them would result in "more complexity, more delay and more expense for the government and the participating parties." The bills are sponsored by the chairmen of the subcommittees considering them — Sen. Paul Laxalt (R-Nev.) and Rep. George E. Danielson (D-Calif.).

Marlowe objected to imposition of a "cost-effectiveness" standard for government regulations, even if couched as a recommendation rather than a mandate.

Despite the fact that the Reagan Administration has mandated a cost-benefit test of regulations, he said, there is no "universal calculus" for computing a dollar benefit on health, safety and environmental protections.

AS FOR judicial review features in the pending bills, Marlowe said courts already have adequate powers to deal with regulatory abuses, and enlargement of their role would not be justified or desirable.



The House version would also allow Congress to overturn a regulation, subject to presidential veto.

This would result in an additional delay of at least 60 days before a regulation could take effect, Marlowe protested.

'Alley Oop!'

Gain in Economic Growth Fails to Dent Joblessness

The nation's economy grew at a surprisingly strong 8.4 percent annual rate after inflation in the first three months of 1981, the Commerce Dept. said in a revised estimate of first-quarter "real" gross national product.

But AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald pointed out that workers did not benefit much from the expansion.

"THE GROWTH of the economy during the first quarter was unusually robust, but did not result in any reduction in unemployment," Oswald observed. During the period, the nation's jobless rate remained high at either 7.3 or 7.4 percent.

"Wages and salaries for all employees increased by 3.2 percent during the first quarter, while corporate profits rose by 10.5 percent, reflecting the profit gains attained in current production with adjustments for inventory and depreciation charges," Oswald added.

In addition, the new government report contained figures showing that inflation is still in the double-digit range, and was particularly influenced last quarter by the Administration's sudden decontrol of domestic oil prices.

"The rapid growth of the first quarter is not expected to continue," Oswald said, "and the economy may well turn down in the near future."

THE GOVERNMENT originally reported the first quarter gain in real GNP —the value of the total output of the nation's goods and services after adjustment for inflation—at 6.5 percent. That was on Apr. 20 before all the data for the quarter were available. The new figure, based on more complete information, showed increases in a number of categories, including the value of inventories and net exports.

After adjustment for inflation, GNP rose to a seasonally adjusted $1.516 trillion annual rate in the first quarter from a $1.486 trillion pace in last year's fourth quarter, the new Commerce Dept. report said.

Real GNP last year increased at a 3.1 percent rate in the first quarter, then plunged at a 9.9 percent clip in the second quarter, rose at a 2.4 percent rate in the third quarter, and increased 3.8 percent in the final quarter.

THE REVISED figure of 8.4 percent was the biggest gain since the 9 percent increase recorded in the second quarter of 1978. The revision was the largest on record.

The report also said that prices during the first three months of the year, as measured by the GNP's "implicit price deflator," went up at a 10 percent annual rate, rather than the 7.8 percent pace reported last month. Most of the inflation adjustment reflected revisions in energy prices, the Commerce Dept. said.

In its report on profits, the department said that after-tax corporate earnings increased 2.4 percent during the first quarter to a seasonally adjusted $168.3-billion annual rate. Before taxes, profits rose 3.7 percent to an adjusted $258.1-billion annual rate.

PROFITS FROM current production, adjusted for the effect of inflation on inventory and capital values, rose 10.5 percent to an adjusted annual rate of $202.6 billion, the biggest gain since the 13.2 percent increase in the second quarter of 1978, the report said.

Analysts inside and outside the government believe that GNP figures for the current April-June quarter will be well below those for the first quarter, and some are predicting an actual decline in inflation-adjusted output.

VICE PRESIDENT George Bush is welcomed to the AFL-CIO headquarters by Federation President Lane Kirkland. Bush met with Kirkland and AFL-CIO Vice Presidents John H. Lyons, Sol C. Chaikin, Kenneth T. Blaylock and John J. Sweeney to discuss lines of communication between the Administration and the trade union movement.

3-Year Study Rejects Youth Subminimum Wage

A blue-ribbon commission established by Congress took a strong stand against a youth subminimum wage and proposed that the federal wage floor be indexed to changes in average hourly earnings.

The Minimum Wage Study Commission also recommended ending most existing exemptions from overtime provisions of the law. It said the salary exemption tests for executives, administrative and professional staffs should be set at higher, more realistic levels, and it urged better-targeted enforcement efforts.

JAMES G. O'HARA, the former Michigan congressman who served as chairman of the commission, termed the three-year study "the most exhaustive inquiry" ever made into the controversial issues that are regularly debated whenever Congress considers changes in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

On the perennial proposal for a lower wage for teenagers covered by the law, O'Hara said an age differential of any sort clearly conflicts "with the basic purpose of the Act and the requirements of social justice."

Six of the eight commission members took a strong stand against a youth subminimum wage, and only one endorsed the concept.

THE MAJORITY included O'Hara; William D. Byrum, a commercial farmer; Jay Foreman, vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers; Clara Schloss, minimum wage consultant to the AFL-CIO; Phyllis Wallace, professor at the Sloan School of Management of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Sandra Willett, executive vice president of the National Consumers League. The lone dissenter on that issue was S. Warne Robinson, board chairman of G. C. Murphy Co.

Commission member Michael Wachter, a University of Pennsylvania economics professor, said he does not support a na-

POLISH TRADE UNION leader Mieczyslaw Gil presents a book on last summer's Gdansk strike in Poland to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in recognition of the federation's support of the Polish independent labor movement, Solidarity. Gil and three other Solidarity representatives were in the United States as observers at the 25th triennial World Congress of the International Metalworkers' Federation. Also shown are IMF Gen. Sec. Herman Rebhan, second from left, and President Eugen Loderer.

IMF's World Congress Salutes Polish Workers

By James M. Shevis

The 25th World Congress of the International Metalworkers' Federation, embracing nearly 14 million free trade unionists, saluted the workers of Poland for their historic achievement in forming the independent labor movement, Solidarity, and pledged continuing support to the fledgling organization.

Held outside Europe for the first time in the 88-year history of the Geneva-based labor secretariat, the congress unanimously approved a resolution expressing "deep admiration" for the Polish workers who defied the Polish Communist Party and struck over rising prices at great personal risk last summer.

"WE WELCOME the creation of independent, democratically accountable and democratically controllable trade unionism in Poland as a major development for the working people of Poland and Polish society and a sign of hope to workers all over the world," the resolution declared. "We are ready to help them in whatever manner they deem most appropriate."

At a press conference, four members of Solidarity who were granted visas to attend the week-long IMF conference in Washington as observers stressed that the greatest need of the Polish workers at this time is for moral support from the West—particularly Western labor unions.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland, lauding the Polish workers for their achievements since last year's wave of strikes rolled over Poland, spoke of the unjust criticism heaped upon the American labor movement for its aid to Solidarity, and assured the Poles that "we intend to continue our support as long as our fellow trade unionists in Poland need and desire it."

Like the IMF, Kirkland observed, the AFL-CIO has been accused of interfering in the internal affairs of Poland because of

Bars 'Compromise' Cuts In Social Security Benefits

By David L. Perlman

A coalition representing tens of millions of Americans threatened by the Reagan Administration's attack on social security served notice that it will resist any congressional "compromise" that involves cutting back on promised benefits.

Two former social security commissioners—Robert M. Ball and William Driver—joined leaders of union, senior citizen, religious and consumer groups at a news conference called by the Save Our Security coalition.

BALL, WHO headed the Social Security Administration under Presidents Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon, stressed that the temporary imbalance in the funding mechanism can be overcome without reducing either present or future benefits.

He suggested that the real danger of the "horrendous" Administration proposals is that relief over their rejection might lessen public opposition to other substantial but less drastic cutbacks.

Driver, who recently retired as commissioner, charged the Reagan Administration with trying to hammer a wedge between active workers still contributing to the system and persons receiving retirement or disability benefits. The SOS coalition, he stressed, includes about equal numbers of contributors and beneficiaries in the 35 million to 40 million people its 90 affiliated organizations represent.

AFL-CIO VICE PRESIDENT Jerry Wurf, who represented the federation as well as the State, County & Municipal Employees, told the news conference that labor considers social security "a solemn contractual obligation."

Wurf sharply challenged President Reagan's contention that the nation can't afford to live up to its social security obligations. At the same time Reagan is calling for severe benefit cuts, Wurf noted, "he proposes to give away $54 billion next year mainly to the wealthy and the big corporations through the Kemp-Roth tax proposals and business tax breaks."

Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, whose union has launched a national advertising campaign against the Administration proposal, termed social security "the bedrock on which the well-being of virtually every worker and retiree depends."

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR William R. Hutton of the National Council of Senior Citizens joined in warning against being taken in by the Administration's declaration that it is willing to discuss a "compromise" of its original proposal.

"Compromise to the Administration means cutting social security benefits anyway," he warned. "If we give a hand, we'll lose the whole arm—piece by piece."

Former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Wilbur Cohen helped put the coalition together from a framework established during the Carter Administration when several less drastic proposals were rejected by Congress. The various affiliates are taking independent actions to further the common goal. The Senior Citizens, for example, are bringing thousands of members from all parts of the country to Washington for a July 20-22 legislative conference.

NCSC PRESIDENT Jacob Clayman said his organization considers the social security issue "the most important battle of the century."

Ball testified on behalf of the coalition before the House Select Committee on Aging, headed by Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.).

He termed the social security system "a compact between the contributing worker, his employer and the government," with

Real Earnings Down for 5th Month

Consumer prices rose a modest four-tenths of 1 percent last month, or at an annual rate of just under 5 percent, but workers' buying power fell again for the fifth straight month.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the real spendable pay of production and non-supervisory workers declined by a seasonally adjusted one-tenth of 1 percent in April. Real spendable pay — wages minus taxes adjusted for the impact of inflation—now stands 2.5 percent below what it was a year earlier.

FEW ANALYSTS expect the price moderation reflected in the government's April consumer price index to continue. Food prices, which remained at a standstill last month, are generally projected to accelerate in the third quarter of the year, and the recent upturn in interest rates is also likely to further aggravate consumer price increases.

Major banks around the country lifted their prime rate to 20.5 percent from 20 percent, the second boost in the key lending rate in a week. The prime—the interest rate banks charge their best corporate customers—influences other rates, including mortgage interest and other consumer borrowing costs.

The April rise in the CPI brought the index 10 percent above what it was a year earlier.

Besides the stability of food prices, other factors in the abatement in the CPI climb were a rise of only one-tenth of 1 percent in energy prices and a modest pickup in homeownership costs to six-tenths of 1 percent.

Over the year, food prices in April were up 9.4 percent, energy 14 percent, and homeownership costs 10 percent.

BLS said that while the average earnings of all workers in private non-farm jobs last month were $251.34 a week in current dollars, a worker earning the average who had a non-working spouse and two children, brought home "real" weekly pay adjusted for inflation of only $94.24, a 9-cent drop from the previous month.

GASOLINE PRICES fell 1.4 percent in April, and heating oil dropped four-tenths of 1 percent. Gas and electricity were up 1.2 percent, however. Over the year, gasoline prices were up 11.8 percent, fuel oil 24.5 percent, and gas and electricity 14.6 percent.

Home purchase prices dropped by two-tenths of 1 percent, but mortgage interest rates rose 1.7 percent. Rents advanced six-tenths of 1 percent.

JAPANESE AND AMERICAN labor officials gather at AFL-CIO headquarters for the signing of a joint statement on issues of mutual interest. President Lane Kirkland signs for the federation while President Tadanobu Usami signs for the Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI). Representatives of the two federations will meet in Tokyo next year.

Japanese Unions, AFL-CIO Concur on U.S. Job Needs

Representatives of the AFL-CIO and the Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI) agreed that a solution to the serious unemployment situation in the United States—particularly in the automobile industry—should be given the highest priority.

In a joint statement signed by the two labor organizations in Washington following their 13th annual conference, DOMEI expressed appreciation for the voluntary restraints on exports by the Japanese auto industry. For its part, the AFL-CIO viewed the action as "a modest but positive first step," saying that much more needs to be done in the United States to alleviate Detroit's high joblessness.

SPECIFICALLY, the AFL-CIO said that Japanese car producers should build plants and produce vehicles in the United States.

Both organizations recognized that free and fair international trade contributes to economic growth and creates employment which in turn improve the standard of living of workers.

Other mutual trade problems discussed at the four-day meeting included fishery rights, aviation agreements, and the production and export of auto parts, electronics, lumber, and other goods.

Delegates to the meeting took special note of the problems related to American and Japanese companies operating in each other's country, noting that certain Japanese firms operating in the United States are resorting to anti-union tactics.

THE TWO organizations reaffirmed their determination to press these companies to respect workers' fundamental rights to form trade unions and engage in union activities.

In other areas, the labor representatives expressed admiration for the struggle of Polish workers to assert their rights to form free unions under Convention 87 of the International Labor Organization. They also expressed concern over the moves of various Asian governments to restrict trade union participation in international labor organizations.

DOMEI said it welcomed the prospect of the return of the AFL-CIO to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, saying it would strengthen the cause of free trade unionism throughout the world.

ALSO, THE two groups agreed to present the statement on trade unions issued by the Trade Union Advisory Committee of the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development to the heads of state in their respective countries prior to the OECD summit meeting in Ottawa, and to make that statement public. They further endorse a post-summit TUAC meeting.

The two federations agreed to hold the next regular meeting of their representatives in Tokyo in 1982.

Following the signing of the joint statement, DOMEI President Tadanobu Usami announced that the Japanese labor federation would contribute $3,000 to a scholarship fund established early this year for the son of Michael Hammer, staff representative of the American Institute for Free Labor Development killed in El Salvador.

REPRESENTING the AFL-CIO at the conference were President Lane Kirkland and Vice Presidents Murray H. Finley, Charles H. Pillard and William H. Wynn; International Affairs Director Ernest S. Lee; Research Director Rudy Oswald; Dale Good, assistant to the AFL-CIO President; Economist Elizabeth Jager; International Affairs Rep. James N. Ellenberger; Executive Director Morris Paladino of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, and George Poulin, Vice President of the Machinists.

NLRB Orders Runaway Firm to Honor Contracts

Marine Optical, Inc., target of an AFL-CIO-backed consumer boycott, must honor its union contracts and bargain with its employees, the National Labor Relations Board has ordered.

The NLRB upheld the January decision of an administrative law judge that the runaway Massachusetts company was guilty of unfair labor practices in 1979 when it shifted its operations from one plant to another 17 miles away, welched on its existing three-year contract with Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Local 408 and refused to negotiate with the union despite a 25-year bargaining relationship.

The order also calls for reimbursement of lost pay and benefits to all affected workers plus interest over the period since the company's move.

The eyeglass-frame manufacturer violated the National Labor Relations Act, the board ruled, when it refused to live up to the terms of its 1977-80 contract with the optical workers' local, unilaterally changing wages and working conditions and refusing to negotiate a new agreement.

The decision affirms the IUE's position that it never lost representation rights for the company's workers. Many workers had relocated at the new facility and were performing "the same work for the same company," the IUE pointed out.

Robert Searby Named to International Labor Post

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan named Robert W. Searby, 34, a former management consultant, as deputy under secretary of labor for international affairs.

Searby, a native of New York, will head the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of International Labor Affairs. The bureau assists in formulating international economic and trade policies affecting American workers. It also administers the trade adjustment assistance program under the 1974 Trade Act, which provides special benefits for workers adversely affected by import competition.

AIFLD Board Drafts Program, Elects Officers

The board of directors of the American Institute for Free Labor Development approved the institute's 1981-82 program and elected officers at its annual meeting.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland continues as president of the organization, the federation's foreign-service arm in Latin America and the Caribbean area. Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts was re-elected secretary-treasurer, and Plumbers & Pipe Fitters President Martin J. Ward was chosen vice president.

THE BOARD changed its bylaws to restructure the organization's governing body. The change reduced the size of the board from 34 to 25 members, eliminating the positions of chairman and vice chairman, and stipulated that the board be composed of only U.S. and Latin American trade union representatives.

Those from the business community who had previously served on the board received the AFL-CIO's thanks, and outgoing Chairman J. Peter Grace said that they would continue to perform in a "friendly and supportive capacity."

New members of the board are Teachers President Albert Shanker and Food & Commercial Workers President William Wynn. William C. Doherty, Jr., was re-elected AIFLD executive director.

THE DIRECTORS unanimously approved a resolution expressing AIFLD's "shock and sorrow" over the deaths of staff members Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman in El Salvador last January. The two AIFLD representatives were gunned down in San Salvador where they had been assigned to assist in El Salvador's land redistribution program.

Regardless of what follows in El Salvador, the resolution said, "Mike's and Mark's real work, which is invested in the soul of the people they loved and helped, will endure."

Labor Press Threatened by Postage Costs

The prospect of "sudden death" faces many labor newspapers if Congress does not continue the stretch-out of postal rate increases for non-profit publications.

That warning was sounded by President James M. Cesnik of the International Labor Press Association in testimony on the Reagan Administration's budget proposals before the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

CESNIK TOLD the committee that the postage paid by labor papers will more than double on Oct. 1 if Congress agrees with the Administration's plans. That proposal would end the subsidies that support step-by-step postage increases for non-profit publications over a seven-year period. An end to the phasing will mean "unbearable" rate hikes for labor publications, Cesnik said.

Current law allows Congress to appropriate funds to cover "revenue foregone" by the U.S. Postal Service for the period of the phasing.

Cesnik, who is editor of the Guild Reporter published by the Newspaper Guild, pointed out that rates for second-class non-profit publications have already increased about 1,800 percent since 1971, the largest percentage increase for any class of mail.

MANY LABOR publications have been forced to cut back sharply on frequency or cease publishing altogether, Cesnik noted, and this has meant a loss in volume to the Postal Service of some 65 million pieces of mail a year. About 100 million more pieces could drop out of the system if the rates force more unions to cut back their journals, he estimated.

Publications searching for ways to stay afloat may also turn from second class to currently cheaper third-class rates, Cesnik said. Although delivery standards for both classes are identical, third class is more likely to be diverted or delayed, he noted.

If the second class non-profit classification is destroyed, Cesnik said, "the class of mail Congress established for the free flow of information so vital to our democracy will be beyond the financial means of non-profit publishers."

THE ILPA HAS represented the labor press in many proceedings before the Postal Rate Commission and the Commission on the Postal Service, but these cases represent a financial drain of "immense proporations" on the limited resources of the association, Cesnik told the committee.

The ILPA, whose members are publications of AFL-CIO and Canadian Labor Congress organizations, was successful earlier this year in persuading the Postal Rate Commission to extend pre-sort discounts to non-profit mailers for the first time.

Top Company Executives Average 13.8% Pay Boost

Good times. Bad times. Bigwig businessmen seem to take home big pay regardless of the state of the economy.

A Business Week magazine survey of 508 executives at 252 companies showed that total executive compensation last year rose 13.7 percent, with salary increases alone averaging 13.8 percent.

Compensation tended to increase whether or not company performance was good, the study showed. Firms whose profits were down boosted executive compensation an average of 6.5 percent, while in companies with profit gains total compensation for executives increased an average of 17.3 percent.

Of the 25 highest paid executives, none earned less than $1,455,000 in 1980, and six received more than $3 million each.

Eleven of the top 25 executives on the 1980 list were with oil or oil-related companies. The majority of the earnings were, as last year, derived from stock options.

Due to the flat market of recent years, however, companies are coming up with different plans to entice top executives and concentrate on long-range benefits such as bonuses and restricted stock plans based on internal objectives and employment time, the magazine pointed out.

tional youth subminimum but would allow "local experimentation."

The commission was mandated by Congress in 1977, when the wage-hour law was last amended. Two members were appointed by each of four Cabinet members: the Secretaries of Health & Human Services, Labor, Commerce and Agriculture.

Advocates of a youth subminimum wage have contended that such a step would reduce the high rate of teenage unemployment, but the commission said any such impact would be small and would be balanced out by a more damaging increase in adult unemployment.

WITH THE passing of the "baby boom" generation into adulthood, teenage unemployment is likely to lessen in any event, the panel noted.

Further, the commission stressed, a youth differential would violate the principle of equal pay for equal work.

"If suggestions were made that the very real employment problems of women or members of minority groups should be 'solved' by paying them less for their labor, such a proposal would be rejected out of hand as fundamentally unjust. We can see no difference in principle between such proposals and those based on age," the commission declared.

The report noted the serious erosion of minimum wage standards by double-digit inflation and the economic problems when Congress tries to catch up through amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

AFTER CONSIDERING a number of studies of various types of indexing, the commission's conclusion was that the minimum wage should be linked to average hourly earnings in the private economy and adjusted each year on the basis of the previous year's overall rate of change in the index. It recommended an index that would include farm wages.

The commission found that "regular and predictable increases in the miuimum wage would be non-inflationary and would be easier for business to adjust to than the irregular increases of the present system."

Statistically, the commission found that some 10.6 million workers had jobs at or below the minimum wage level last year, and 69 percent of them were not teenagers.

IT FOUND that 18 percent of female workers did not get paid more than the minimum wage, compared to 8 percent of all males. For blacks, 18 percent were at or below the minimum wage compared with 11 percent of white workers. By region, the South had the highest rate of low-paid workers, 15 percent.

The commission recommended ending or phasing out exemptions for various groups, including cotton gin and sugar processing establishments, employees of small town radio and television stations, low-circulation newspapers and motion picture theaters, and of national park concessions.

It took note of the fact that the salary test for exemption of executives and administrators from overtime pay requirements is an unrealistically low $155 a week. A long-delayed adjustment to raise the cutoff to $225 a week was proposed by the Carter Administration but blocked by the Reagan Administration last February. The commission said the overtime exemption salary test for managers should be raised to its earlier ratio of about twice the minimum wage, which currently would put it at $268 a week.

The commission noted that compliance with the wage-hour law has been weakest in retail trades and services, accounting for almost two-thirds of all illegal minimum wage and overtime underpayments.

It termed the overall level of noncompliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act unacceptably high and recommended that Congress stiffen the penalties for violations and allow class action suits by workers who have been shortchanged.

Surge in TV Imports Poses New Threat to Output, Jobs

A steep rise in Japanese television set imports during the first quarter of 1981 is posing a new threat to domestic TV makers and workers, a union-industry coalition warned in a brief filed with the International Trade Commission.

The Committee to Preserve American Color Television (COMPACT) cited Commerce Dept. data showing that completed TV sets from Japan flowed into the United States at an annual rate of 960,000 units, an increase of nearly 170 percent from the first three months of 1980.

AT THE SAME time, picture tube imports from Japan jumped 120 percent over the year-ago quarter, COMPACT pointed out.

The coalition also charged in a letter to U.S. Trade Rep. William E. Brock that the new surge in shipments from Japan violates an "informal understanding" that the imports would be held to 400,000 units a year.

That understanding was negotiated last year when the United States allowed an orderly marketing agreement (OMA) with Japan to expire.

"WE ARE concerned that the Japanese are not living up to the understanding which was reached last summer," the coalition said in its letter to Brock. "This is particularly important since the Korean and Taiwanese OMAs were based in part upon their expectations as to Japanese imports."

The original OMA with Japan was negotiated by the Carter Administration in 1977 when import penetration in the U.S. color TV market approached 50 percent, causing a series of plant closings and extensive layoffs. Subsequent surges in imports from Korea and Taiwan resulted in OMAs with those two countries last year.

COMPACT, which is composed of 11 labor organizations and four U.S. television set and component makers, contends that the OMAs would not have been necessary had government enforced the 1971 dumping finding that Japanese sets were being sold in the United States well below their price in Japan.

THE U.S. Customs Service estimated in 1978 that dumping duties owed by Japanese manufacturers and their American importers then totalled $400 million and COMPACT says these have since risen to $600 million.

But only a fraction of the duties have been collected, and the Commerce Dept. sought in April 1980 to wipe out more than 80 percent of the fines with a $68 million settlement. Two court injunctions blocked the Commerce Dept.'s proposal.

The Trade Commission is expected to rule by June 21 on a petition by Japanese TV makers to set aside the 1971 dumping finding.

COMPACT members include the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Allied Industrial Workers, Communications Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Furniture Workers, Glass Bottle Blowers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Machinists, Steelworkers and the unaffiliated Radionic Workers, along with Corning Glass Works, Owens-Illinois, Inc., Sprague Electric Co. and Wells-Gardner Electronics Corp.

Right to Franchise Agents Upheld for Actors' Equity

The Supreme Court has unanimously upheld the right of Actors' Equity to require that theatrical agents representing Equity members must be franchised by the union.

Equity's franchising system, dating back to 1928, requires agents who seek to represent its members to agree to limit their commissions to specified levels.

One important requirement is that an agent's commission can't reduce the actor's net salary below Equity's negotiated minimum scale.

A GROUP OF dissident agents challenged the franchising system in court as a violation of federal antitrust laws, but lost both in federal district court and in the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

The AFL-CIO supported the union's position before the Supreme Court, arguing that the conduct being challenged is a legitimate exercise of union discipline intended to prevent a form of wage undercutting.

The Supreme Court agreed. The decision by Justice Potter Stewart noted: "The peculiar structure of the legitimate theater industry, where work is intermittent, where it is customary if not essential for union members to secure employment through agents, and where agents' fees are calculated as a percentage of a member's wage, makes it impossible for the union to defend even the integrity of the minimum wages it has negotiated without regulation of agency fees."

BUT THE COURT struck down a requirement that licensed agents pay the union a franchising fee, even though the fee merely covered the union's cost of administering the program.

Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., joined in part by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice Thurgood Marshall, differed on that point. Brennan said he agreed with the appellate court's conclusion that the approximately $12,000 a year that Equity collects in fees from agents is reasonable in view of the need for a full-time employee to administer the system.

New Pamphlet Details Issues in Last Congress

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation has compressed the record of the 96th Congress on issues affecting labor into a 107-page pamphlet, The People's Lobby, which includes tabulations of the voting records of House and Senate members.

An introduction by Legislative Director Ray Denison stresses the importance of "grass-roots lobbying" by union members.

"Unless workers take the time to write, call or visit their lawmakers, thanking and encouraging them when they are right and criticizing them when they are wrong, the legislative interests of workers will suffer," Denison warns.

The report covers both the 1979 and 1980 sessions of Congress. Copies of The People's Lobby, Publication No. 77U, are $1 each or $90 for 100, from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Information, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Court Ruling Permits Suit Over Fair Representation

The Supreme Court has ruled 5-4 that a worker fired for misconduct can sue both his employer and his union under certain conditions without first seeking redress through the union's internal appeals procedure.

The majority's reasoning, in the case decided by the court, was that since the worker who brought the suit couldn't get his job back through the union appeals system, he could not be required to use that system.

IN THE SPECIFIC case, the UAW represented a worker who had been fired for violating a company rule against indecent behavior and decided that the facts did not justify taking the dismissal to arbitration.

The court majority held that because the 15-day time limit for bringing a grievance to arbitration had run out, the worker had a right to file a suit both against the employer charging wrongful dismissal and against the union charging that it breached its legal obligation to provide him fair representation. It reversed two lower courts in doing so.

However, a footnote to the Supreme Court opinion by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., indicated that a worker could be required to exhaust an internal union appeals procedure if the union's contract with his employer specified that a grievance could be reactivated on the basis of a decision by a union appeals board.

THE AFL-CIO had filed a brief in the case contending that the issue of a union's statutory duty of fair representation could not arise because the union's action could not be considered final so long as there was an opportunity for reversal through union procedures.

Two of the dissenters, Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, said the AFL-CIO brief presented a solution "that is consistent both with national labor policy and relevant precedents."

Social Security Sabotage

IT DIDN'T TAKE long for the Reagan Administration to discover that it had stung grass-roots America out of complacency with the enormity of its proposed cutbacks in social security protection.

A unanimous Senate quickly declared its opposition to the chief ingredients of the Administration plan, differing only on how strongly to word the resolution of rebuke. In the House, even the President's most faithful supporters moved to dissociate themselves from the Administration position and reassure worried constituents.

All this is good news—to a point.

It means that millions of Americans now have experienced first hand the Reagan Administration's approach to social issues. Perhaps they and their representatives in Congress will take a closer, more critical look at the Administration's harsh budget decisions.

IT HAS GIVEN a strong stimulus to the broad-based Save Our Security coalition, whose leaders have the intimate knowledge of the social security system that is needed by advocates in the legislative battles still ahead.

As the coalition realizes, it is far too early to declare victory and fold the tents.

Congress may have made clear that it isn't immediately going to slash benefits of those who retire at age 62 by some 40 percent. But it has made no commitments not to cut back on benefits, not to further toughen eligibility for disability payments, not to change the formula for computing benefits so as to reduce everyone's payments in the future. It has not even committed itself not to wipe out a meager burial expense allowance.

SO WHEN the White House sends word to Capitol Hill that it is ready to talk "compromise" on social security changes, it should be clear that this will not be a message of surrender.

To the Administration, compromise means something between the social security rights that workers and retirees now have and the horrendous reductions the President originally sought.

In any such "compromise," persons counting on social security protection can only lose.

As the SOS coalition has demonstrated in congressional testimony and statements, the social security system is not in imminent danger of financial collapse as the Administration scare tactics would have us believe. If fact, there would not even have been the short-term imbalance the trust funds face if the unemployment rate in recent years had been at normal rather than recession levels, and if wages had kept pace with price advances.

Even with this imbalance, the immediate funding problem can be alleviated with modest changes in the allocation of the social security payroll tax, and the system can be strengthened over the long term by any of a variety of proposals to supplement the payroll tax with general revenue funds.

This, clearly, is what Congress should do.

Troubles Mount for Urbanites

Reagan Cuts Push More Cities Toward Brink of Bankruptcy

By Gus Tyler

IF YOU LIVE in a city of more than 10,000, the chances are that you are in for big trouble. It will be your money or your life and maybe both.

It all starts with what looks like the smart thing to do: cutting the budget in Washington to reduce federal assistance to local governments. The idea is to save money, to cut down borrowing, to reduce taxes.

But nothing of the kind is likely to happen, according to data gathered by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress in the first extensive survey of the financial plight of America's cities.

RIGHT NOW, more than half the cities with populations of 10,000 or more are running in the red, spending more than they are taking in for operating expenses. When President Reagan's proposed budget cut goes through, says the survey, it will put more municipal governments "on the brink of bankruptcy."

Now what are the ways in which these local governments can avoid going broke?

They can cut services; they can ask for money from the states; they can raise your taxes, or they can borrow. Now let's see how each of these will affect you:

Cut services. To balance its budget, New York City—to take one instance—cut its police force. Result: burglary complaints rose last year but arrests fell. Citizens lost $339.6 million and only 6.7 percent of burglary cases were closed. Cutting services is cutting your income and maybe your throat.

Get aid from the state. But the states are "themselves fiscally strained and incapable of providing the necessary revenues," says the survey.

SO THE CITIES will have to increase local taxes to make ends meet. This means that whatever you expect to gain through a reduction in federal taxes—if you really get a reduction—will be lost through an increase in local taxes.

In some cases, you will pay a higher local tax without even knowing it. You will be charged for services that were once free.

The cities might try borrowing. Here there are many pitfalls.

First, if a city is in financial trouble, it does not find it easy to get loans. And when it does, the interest rate is high because the risk is high. As a consequence, a city that borrows when it is in trouble just borrows more trouble.

Second, if a city borrows, that borrowing has the same impact on the nation's finances as when the federal government borrows. If it is unwise for a government to go into debt, then what difference does it make if that government is in Washington or in your backyard?

For the city dweller, things look "grim," says the survey. "Short of imperiling the health and safety of its residents, cities will have to raise taxes, user charges and fees to compensate for diminished federal assistance."

It's your money or your life.

An IMF Salute to the Workers of Poland

We, the representatives of nearly 14 million metalworkers, place on record our deep admiration for the workers of Poland in their historic achievement in forming the independent self-governing union, Solidarity.

We welcome the creation of independent, democratically accountable and democratically controllable trade unionism in Poland as a major development for the working people of Poland and Polish society and a sign of hope to workers all over the world.

We now pledge our continuing support for the workers of Poland. We are ready to help them in whatever manner they deem most appropriate.

We salute the workers of Poland and wish them every success in the historic task they have embarked upon.

—From a resolution adopted by the 25th World Congress of the International Metalworkers' Federation, Washington, D.C., May 26, 1981.

Kirkland Tells IMF

Labor Committed to Advancing Basic Interest of All Workers

The following is from an address by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to the 25th Congress of the International Metalworkers' Federation, Washington, D.C., May 25, 1981.

LIKE THE INTERNATIONAL Metalworkers' Federation, the AFL-CIO has been accused of interfering in the internal affairs of Poland because of our response to Solidarity's appeal for fraternal assistance.

We have been catching it from all directions—both from those in the Soviet bloc who accuse us of seeking to contaminate the purity of Marxist thought in Poland, and from some of our own countrymen who worry that too much freedom among workers may undermine Poland's ability to repay its massive debts to western banks.

Our efforts have nothing to do with political or economic theories. We care very little about who nominally owns the means of production. We care very much about who owns the unions.

IT IS THE mission of the trade union movement to humanize the society in which it finds itself, to seek justice and equity for individual workers from their employers, no matter whether the employer is a corporation or a government, and to obtain for them a fair share of available resources, whether those resources are large or small.

We have not been asked by our brothers and sisters in Poland for political advice or economic guidance, and we have offered none. We have been asked for tangible things—for office equipment, printing and reproduction machines, and even for paper to write on—and we have supplied them.

We have been asked for moral support and that, in concert with the IMF and the rest of the international free trade union movement, we have supplied with enthusiasm. We intend to continue our support as long as our fellow trade unionists in Poland need and desire it.

For the same reasons, we will continue the trade union support that has been asked of us by our brothers and sisters in El Salvador.

THE WORKERS of that country, who have asked for and received our support, are victims caught in a crossfire from both left and right. They are terrorized by upholders of ancient privilege, monopoly ownership and class rule on the one hand, and by doctrinaire revolutionists who thrive on social turmoil and economic chaos on the other.

Both sides are determined to rule or ruin. Both sides use equally brutal and inhuman methods. Both sides look upon a free trade union movement as an obstacle that must be destroyed at any cost.

The gunmen who last December murdered two representatives of the AFL-CIO, Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman, and the president of the Salvadoran farmworkers' union, Jose Rodolfo Viera, proved to be agents of the right. But the distinction is immaterial.

THEY WERE murdered beacuse the land reform on which they were working is designed to improve the lives of hundreds of thousands of farm families and to lay the foundations of a stable, democratic society that can resist any and all slavemasters. And that is why the AFL-CIO will continue to support this program.

Our role in such matters is by no means a new departure for us. From the beginning, we have reached out to our brothers and sisters in other lands.

We are proud of the work of our three overseas arms, the African-American Labor Center, the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, and the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

OUR PRIDE in these activities arises from our conviction that trade unionism, in and of itself, is a positive good in the world, a force for economic and social justice, for individual liberty and self-respect, and ultimately for more peaceful relations both within and among nations.

We are well aware of the shortcomings of our own society and of the need to pursue the fight for justice in the legislative halls and at the bargaining table.

In its one-hundredth year, the American labor movement is challenged to prevent the wholesale destruction of a wide range of vital social programs that have been slowly and painfully developed over the last half-century.

We are told that the forces ranged against us are irresistible, that we may as well save our energy, sit back, and wait for a change in the political weather. We have no intention of doing that.

The AFL-CIO was built for the long haul. The handful of hopeful and determined trade unionists who gathered in Pittsburgh in November 1881 to lay its foundations knew what they were doing. They were crafting an instrument for the assertion of basic human rights and for the defense and enlargement of those rights.

WE ARE NO strangers to adversity. Many times over the last century, we have faced worse odds and more intransigent opposition than we see today. Our instrument has not only survived, it has grown and it is today, in most of the ways that matter, sturdier, more flexible, and more capable than ever before.

Busy as we are defending the interests of workers here at home, we have no intention of turning inward and withdrawing from our obligation to participate in the work of the international free trade union movement.

We intend to make ourselves heard on every issue that affects workers in this country and all countries. And we have every confidence that the IMF and its affiliates will do the same.

Reagan Reneges on Promise

Attack on Social Security Dims Workers' Retirement Outlook

RETIREMENT PLANS of every working American will suffer a sharp setback if the Reagan Administration's drive succeeds in making sweeping changes in the social security program, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman warned on Labor News Conference.

The broad cuts that the President is urging Congress to approve would reduce the benefits of all future retirees with the most drastic slashes zeroed-in on workers who, because of poor health or job displacement, are forced to retire before age 65, Seidman stressed. He pointed out that the pensions of early retirees would be cut nearly in half, "from the present 80 percent of a normal benefit to less than 50 percent."

Reagan "is going back on a promise that he made during the campaign not to touch the social security system," Seidman said. He noted that the abrupt switch has drawn "a violent outcry" from both active workers and retirees as they see the protections they have worked for and paid for threatened by unnecessarily harsh steps to correct financing problems.

Seidman charged that the Administration's assault on social security is part of its attempts to manipulate the federal budget. Social security is intended to "provide protection for people over the long term," he asserted, and major decisions affecting the system "ought not to be made on the basis of short-term budget considerations."

He renewed the call for partial financing of social security from general federal revenues, which would deal with both the immediate and future problems. He said that a measure now before Congress to pay for half of the Medicare program with general revenues and the rest through payroll taxes, which is strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, would be a major step toward that goal.

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR ALL THOSE who might be wondering, the tooth fairy is alive and well and advising the Secretary of Labor.

That's the only explanation for the recent proposal to legalize industrial homework and revive "cottage" industries.

According to the Ladies' Garment Workers, the last decade has seen a resurgence of the sweatshop in cities such as Los Angeles, New York, Chicago and Miami, as well as in New Jersey and along the Mexican border. Hard-won union gains are being eroded and undermined as more and more work moves from the factory into the home.

THIS IS HOW the ILGWU describes the situation:

"Homeworkers receive no benefits or social security. They absorb the costs of electricity and rent. The employer supplies them with work, but not with a sewing machine.

"Homeworkers are alone and isolated, unable to compare their earnings or conditions with those of other workers, powerless to protest against low piece rates of 'bad' (poorly cut) goods, on their own if an accident should occur.

"Employers are in a position to dictate the price to be paid to individual homeworkers, and can hire and fire at will."

What's more, the union points out, homework and child labor go hand in hand. Working long hours, homeworkers often let a child or teenager relieve them while they rest or take care of other chores.

THE ABUSES are the traditional abuses. Homeworkers are cheated on the amount of work done, fake deductions are made from their pay and there is no recourse.

The Jewelry Workers Division of the Service Employees also reports a high incidence of illegal homework, especially in Rhode Island where costume jewelry manufacturing is concentrated.

A full day's work can be transported in a shopping bag and jewelry homeworkers on piece rates make about $1 to $2 an hour while working long hours, the union said.

At the turn of the century, immigrant families were exploited so badly in their sweatshop tenements that several states stepped in to regulate homework.

A FEDERAL ROLE was created with passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, the wage-hour law. Because homework threatened to undermine the minimum wage, in the early 1940s homework was prohibited in seven light industries: women's apparel, knitted outerwear, embroideries, buttons and buckles, gloves and mittens, handkerchiefs, and jewelry. Exceptions were provided for the elderly or disabled, however.

The FLSA amendments adopted by Congress in 1949 incorporated the homework regulatory authority into federal law.

On May 1, Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan suddenly announced he planned to lift the restrictions against homework in the seven industries. Donovan saw this as opening up job opportunities in many "cottage" industries and encouraging homeworkers to report minimum wage violations "without fear of losing their jobs."

THE PROBLEM of sweatshops in the home and their devastating effect on legitimate business operations remain a problem of the cities and the exploitation of immigrants, legal and illegal.

With the Administration cutting back on wage-hour enforcement and with its inability or unwillingness to enforce the law against homework, Donovan is saying that what is now illegal shall be made legal. Problem solved.

To talk about opening up jobs in "cottage" industries is romantic nonsense. To expect exploited and vulnerable homeworkers to turn in their outside employers is naive in the extreme.

The ILGWU believes Donovan is violating federal law in removing the prohibition on homework. Donovan believes he has the authority to do so. And that's where the issue stands.

SWEEPING CHANGES in social security pushed by the Reagan Administration could wreck the retirement plans of every working American, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by William Steif, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Ben Rathbun of Daily Labor Report. The public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

LABOR OF LOVE is presented by its maker, 93-year-old Rose Lapidus, to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland during a celebration honoring labor's 100th anniversary at the Workmen's Circle Home & Infirmary for the Aged. A resident of the home, she is a long-time member of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Joining the presentation are ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin and Clothing & Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman. Ceremonies at the Bronx, N.Y., facility included dedication of a pavilion named in honor of George Meany.

Kirkland Challenges Claim Of Voter Mandate for Cuts

New York—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland took sharp exception to the Reagan Administration's claim of a popular "mandate" that justifies its deep cuts in aid and protections for workers and the needy.

Kirkland, speaking at the Workmen's Circle Home & Infirmary for the Aged, said the signal from the voters in the last election was for change, but change that moves "forward, not backward."

The labor movement respects the past, "but we have no desire to relive it." he told guests at the geriatric care facility's celebration of organized labor's centennial.

THE EVENT included the dedication of a pavilion at the home named in memory of George Meany, who was born in the Bronx near the site of the facility.

Kirkland scored the Reagan Administration's proposed cutbacks in social security. pointing out that at no time during the campaign did Reagan promise the voters that "if he were elected President, millions of Americans and their dependents who have been counting on social security benefits—particularly those forced to take early retirement because of illness or other forces beyond their control—would find their benefits cut, their hopes dashed."

Nor were voters ever given a choice on the Administration's efforts to dismantle the unemployment compensation, system, worker safety and health laws or other protective legislation such as the prohibition against industrial home work, Kirkland stressed.

"I DO NOT believe that the American people voted for this kind of 'change,'" he said. "I do not believe they were rejecting the life's work of George Meany."

Meany was "more than a trade union leader, he was spokesman for American workers whether they carried a union card or not," Kirkland averred, "and he spoke for the poor, the underprivileged, the oppressed and for any people in any nation who were fighting for dignity, justice and freedom."

Chairing the ceremonies, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers pointed to the long history of cooperation between the Workmen's Circle and organized labor and called for a strengthening of that bond.

DESCRIBING THE work of the home in caring for the elderly pioneers of the labor movement, Sheinkman said:

"The problem of the proper care of our aged will not be fully answered by this home. Nor will it, in all probability, be answered fully in our lifetime. We will, in the end, be judged by what physical, cultural, emotional sustenance we provide those who sustained us when we were young. We will be judged by the quality of life we afford those who provided us with life."

President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers reminded the audience that "the labor movement in each generation had added to the well-being of workers and their families. And the Workmen's Circle, a mutual self-help group, has been a willing and eager partner."

Among other speakers were Frank Brown, organizational director of Auto Workers District 65; ACTWU Vice President Murray Goldstein, chairman of the trade union council for the home, and ACTWU Regional Director Jerry Landman, president of the home.

Continued U.S. Share Of Food Cargo Urged

The AFL-CIO has urged members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee to reject an amendment that would abolish the cargo preference provision of the Food for Peace program.

Under present law, half of U.S. food assistance to other nations must be shipped in American-flag vessels. When the House Foreign Affairs Committee takes up legislation to renew the foreign assistance program, Rep. Millicent Fenwick (R-N.J.) is expected to offer an amendment to repeal the cargo preference.

In a letter to committee members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned that such action would further weaken the nation's merchant fleet.

Denison said it would "increase our dependency on foreign nations for U.S. overseas commerce and result in layoffs of thousands of workers at a time of already high domestic unemployment."

He also noted that "similar cargo preference requirements are routinely imposed by most other nations."

Convention Boosts Per Capita

Novelty Workers Shape Membership Program

Miami Beach, Fla.—A program to muster labor's strength to meet the major challenges of the 1980s was given top priority by delegates to the Novelty Production Workers' convention here along with a per capita increase to finance it.

President Julius Isaacson, underscoring the need for legislation to strengthen and protect workers' rights, took the Reagan Administration to task for policies "hell-bent to destroy labor's gains." Isaacson pointed to the recent attacks on job safety and health regulations, wage and hour protections, social security and the rights of women and minorities.

DELEGATES approved a series of resolutions calling for stepped-up bargaining for voluntary COPE contribution checkoffs, tougher successorship agreement laws, improved protections for workers affected by plant closings and imports, all-out efforts against "right-to-work" laws, prohibitions on the use of lie detector tests and strikebreakers, and retention of prevailing wage laws.

Appealing for intensified organizing efforts, Isaacson reported that despite continued problems with imports and runaway shops, 40,000-member union had posted a 20 percent growth in membership and significant contract gains in wages and benefits since its last convention in 1976.

The 335 delegates approved an increase in the monthly per capita payment to the international from $1.85 to $2. Local unions were authorized to increase monthly dues from $8 to $10. Both actions take effect in June.

ISAACSON AND Sec.-Treas. John Serpico were elected by acclamation to their second full five-year terms. The union's five vice presidents and 12 executive board members were also unanimously re-elected.

In his remarks to the delegates, Isaacson called for a comprehensive national policy to combat the damage done to workers and industries by imports and dumping. The union, formerly called the Doll & Toy Workers, was one of the first to be severely hurt by imported products, he pointed out.

"What has happened to baseball," Isaacson said, "dramatizes the effect of imports. Our great American pastime is played with balls from Haiti, shoes from Spain, uniforms from Japan and even under American flags made with textiles from Japan."

Seafarers' President Frank Drozak told the delegates many government officials "seem to have a religious hang-up on the idea of free trade, yet when it is time to protect American workers from foreign imports, we have yet to see our government hold out much of a social safety net."

AMONG THE 48 resolutions adopted during the convention were measures supporting passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, a fair immigration policy, a consistent national energy policy, a reindustrialization program for American industry and congressional investigation of the activities of union-busting consultants.

The delegates called on the Reagan Administration and the Federal Reserve Board to back away from monetary policies that drive up interest rates, and they scored the Administration for tax policies that will "require more sacrifice from those who have little to give more to those who already have much."

Hofstra Law School Chair Dedicated for Carlough

Hempstead, N.Y.—Hofstra University Law School has dedicated the Edward F. Carlough Chair of Labor Law in honor of the Sheet Metal Workers' president-emeritus.

Carlough served as president of the union from 1959 until his retirement in 1970.

Schedule for June Listed By Labor Studies Center

Institutes on plant closings, labor law and public communications highlight activities at the Silver Spring, Md., campus of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in June. The programs are open to officers and staff members of AFL-CIO affiliates.

Plant Closings Institute, May 31-June 3—A three-day session on the union's role when a plant closes, including government programs to help workers, employers and communities.

Labor Law, June 7-12—A review of labor laws governing internal union affairs, organizing, collective bargaining, fair representation and equal opportunity.

Public Communications for Public Employee Unions, June 14-29—A workshop cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. on techniques of using the electronic and print media to build support for public employee programs.

Union leadership development programs include: Graphic Arts International Union, June 7-12; Operating Engineers, June 14-19; Theatrical Stage Employees, June 14-19; Communications Workers, June 25.

The IUD will host a semi-annual meeting of trustees of its National Industrial Group Pension Plan, June 1-2.

The AIFLD and the AALC are cosponsoring a class for 20 labor leaders from French-speaking African and Caribbean countries, May 31-June 12. The AIFLD will graduate classes of 22 English-speaking Caribbean and 20 Portuguese-speaking union officers from Brazil in June 12. They will be succeeded on June 22 by 40 Spanish-speaking women trade unionists from Latin American countries.

The center will sponsor a final conference June 28-30 to provide information for community colleges and unions interested in its Tripartite Program for Apprenticeship & Associate of Arts Degrees.

One off-campus session for union officers and staff members is scheduled June 8-9 at Cleveland on the AFL-CIO pension investment study and recommendations.

More information on these and other labor studies programs can be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Free World Unions Hail Poland's 'Solidarity'

its response to Solidarity's appeal to the West for fraternal assistance.

"We have been catching it from all directions—both from those in the Soviet bloc who accuse us of seeking to contaminate the purity of Marxist thought in Poland, and from some of our own countrymen who worry that too much freedom among workers may undermine Poland's ability to repay its massive debts to Western banks," Kirkland said.

"OUR EFFORTS have nothing to do with political or economic theories. We care very little about who nominally owns the means of production. We care very much about who owns the unions. . . .

"We have not been asked by our brothers and sisters in Poland for political advice or economic guidance, and we have offered none. We have been asked for tangible things—for office equipment, printing and reproduction machines, and even for paper to write on, and we have supplied them.

"We have been asked for moral support and that, in concert with the IMF and the rest of the international free trade-union movement, we have supplied with enthusiasm."

In an opening-day address to the congress, Mieczyslaw Gil, a steelworker who is a Solidarity regional president based in Cracow, told the 500 delegates:

"WE ARE interested in contacts and exchanges of opinions with all trade union movements. Above all, we are interested in examining the best ways of maintaining the independence, the working-class nature, and democratic self-governing of our union."

Taking note that the conference was being held in America, Gil, who is also a member of Solidarity's top governing body, its National Coordinating Commission, thanked the working people of the United States for their support of Solidarity during its building stage, and spoke warmly of Polish-American ties.

"Over many years, Poles have been accepted here, especially in hard times, and have contributed to the development of American industry and civilization," Gil observed. "We also know and appreciate the fact that Polish workers are a very important segment of the American trade-union movement."

DURING AMERICA'S colonial days, he noted, Polish workers at Jamestown, Va., protesting against being denied the right to vote, organized an action that has been labeled the first strike ever in the New World.

Another member of the Solidarity delegation, Szbigniew Przydial, told reporters that he was impressed with the respect and interest shown by the IMF delegates in the new Polish labor federation.

"We will take our impressions back to our fellow members in Poland," said Przydial, a shipyard worker and member of Solidarity's Wroclaw regional executive board. "We saw how representatives of working people in Tunisia, elsewhere in Africa, and in other countries were accepted here, and treated in an equal way regardless of race or color or religion.

"WE ARE very grateful for this lesson in solidarity in the free world."

Other Solidarity representatives at the meeting—the largest international trade union assembly ever held in the United States—were Jacek Kurczewski, a Warsaw University staff member, who serves as an adviser to the labor federation, and Anna Maksyniuk, an interpreter from the organization's press and information bureau in Gdansk. The congress is the IMF's highest policy-making body, and until this year had always been held in a European city. IMF's central and executive committees have met in Asia, the Middle East and North and South America.

While the metalworkers' conference focused on a number of issues under the banner of the overall theme, "Peace, Justice, Jobs," the feat of the Poles in establishing the first genuinely independent free trade unions in the communist world was clearly on the minds of most delegates as well as speakers. Although Solidarity has no formal ties with the IMF, the composition of its larger national unions is in steel, shipbuilding, the electrical industry, and other sectors represented by the trade secretariat.

THE POLISH Workers Aid Fund, launched last September by the AFL-CIO General Board, has raised about a quarter of a million dollars. The funds are channeled to Solidarity in the form of needed equipment and supplies, and constitute the largest single source of support for the Polish labor organization in the West.

The IMF, also an early supporter of the Polish workers' union, will continue to support metalworkers wherever and whenever they are in need of help, IMF Gen. Sec. Herman Rebhan told delegates.

"We will be accused of interference," he pointed out. "When we lend support to strikers in South Africa or in Argentina, those governments say we are meddling in internal affairs. When we send aid to Poland, again there are those who say that this is outside interference.

"WE REJECT these accusations," said the Polish-born Rebhan, who grew up in Germany but fled during the Nazi persecution of the Jews and arrived penniless in the United States in 1938. "We stand for international working-class solidarity that recognizes no frontiers—that sees only workers who need our help.

"As the workers of Poland have shown, the urge for independent trade unions will never die," said Rebhan, a former Detroit auto worker, who worked his way up through the UAW to become the union's international affairs director.

Also saluting the Polish workers were IMF President Eugen Loderer, president of the 2.7-million member West German metalworkers' union, IG Metall; UAW President Douglas A. Fraser, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

"THEIR BRAVE struggle reminds us how precious liberty is," Kennedy observed. "It reaffirms the universal appeal of free trade unions everywhere."

Fraser, speaking on behalf of the 11 North American unions that are affiliated with the IMF, said that the Polish workers "have given us new hope in our own struggles. It is ironic to note that while the Wall Street Journal was praising the right of Polish workers to organize—one of the few correct positions they've ever taken editorially—the leaders of big business in the United States still were spending millions of dollars a year figuring out ways to stop American workers from organizing."

In addition to the UAW, 10 AFL-CIO unions are affiliated with the IMF, the international trade secretariat that links some 170 metalworkers' unions in 70 countries of the non-communist world. They are the Machinists, Steelworkers, Molders, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers, Aluminum Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Operating Engineers, Allied Industrial Workers, and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. IMF's North American membership is about 3.6 million.

Newspaper Guild Asks Study Of Health Risk in VDT Use

The Newspaper Guild has called on Congress to fund a long-term study of workers who operate video display terminals (VDTs) to determine whether they are developing cataracts or other health damage attributable to radiation in numbers significantly higher than other office employees.

The proposal was advanced by Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., as the lead-off witness in two days of hearings on the potential effects on health of VDTs and radio-frequency heaters and scalers by a House Science & Technology subcommittee.

IT IS ESTIMATED that five to seven million of the devices currently are in use by office workers in the United States—more than 23,000 of them in the news, advertising, circulation and business offices of newspapers—and that number is expected to more than double within the next five years. VDTs are television-like screens attached to typewriter-like keyboards that replace typewriters and paper for a variety of office functions.

Perlik told the subcommittee that the Guild feels "attention has been concentrated for too long exclusively on the presence or absence of radiation in relation . . . to standards that are subject to revision and dispute and to health effects whose nature and range are far from being fully explored."

Reports to date by various arms of the government's health establishment repeatedly seek to reassure workers and their unions that there is no radiant-energy hazard at the low levels emitted by the machines according to existing standards, Perlik noted.

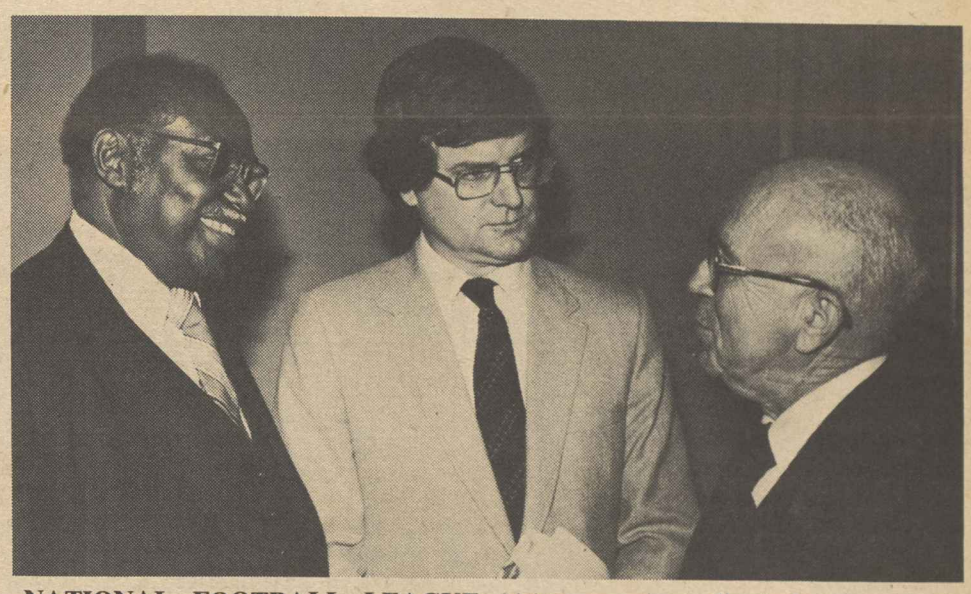
BUT, HE pointed out, a recent report by the Bureau of Radiological Health "states the matter a bit more pointedly, to wit: 'Research information on bioeffects for the frequency range 15 kilohertz to 125 kilohertz is lacking, so empirical estimates of injury are not possible.' "

Within the Guild's own experience, he pointed to reported cases of ten persons developing cataracts within the last five years after going to work on the machines —five of them in the last year alone—and to birth defects in children born within a month to four women working on VDTs at the Toronto Star.

Studies of the cataract and birth defect cases have not established a link between the phenomena and the work environments, but have established no other reason for the occurrences, either, Perlik pointed out.

RESEARCH INTO the possibility of long-range biological effects from exposure to radiation at the low levels emitted by VDTs seems to be in order, Perlik told the panel.

He called on the subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Albert Gore, Jr. (D-Tenn.), himself a former newspaper reporter, to seek such a study "either conducted or funded by the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health" and to do what it can to see that NIOSH gets enough funds to conduct all of the research "so sorely needed to assure the protection of American workers from radiation and other occupational hazards."



Bid to Oust Inspectors On Imports Assailed

Monitoring imports for compliance with U.S. laws is a job for trained specialists, not computers, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Finance subcommittee.

The statement protested Administration budget proposals that would eliminate jobs of import specialists capable of assuring that products brought into the United States comply with U.S. safety, consumer protection, patent, copyright and trademark laws.

Computerized tally of imports cannot substitute for the type of knowledgeable inspection that should be undertaken, the AFL-CIO said.

The federation noted also that customs inspections normally return many times their cost in additional revenues and therefore the claim of savings through reduction of inspections is "unrealistic."

Citizens Panel Presses NFL To Hire More Black Coaches

A citizens' factfinding panel headed by AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard called on the National Football League to eliminate a "pattern of racial discrimination" in its hiring practices that denies coaching position to blacks.

The charges of racial discrimination came in a study commissioned by the NFL Players Association and conducted by Johns Hopkins University sociologist Jomills Braddock. The study found that while more than 50 percent of the league's active players are black, opportunities for them in coaching positions are worsening.

"DESPITE A 28-percent increase in the number of coaching positions in the NFL over the last seven years," the study noted, "there has been a net decline in the proportion of blacks holding assistant coaching positions."

The Panel on Equity in the National Football League includes representatives of labor and civil rights organizations. Representing labor, besides Pollard, are Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner, UAW President Douglas Fraser, NFLPA Executive Director Edward Garvey, and Garvey's assistant, Brig Owens.

POLLARD CALLED ON the league to undertake an affirmative action program in the hiring of coaches by its member clubs. The panel also urged NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle to meet with it for a discussion of the issue.

If the NFL continues to refuse to meet with the group, "it may have to express its views to a committee of the Congress," warned Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), a member of the panel and chairman of the employment opportunities subcommittee of the House Education & Labor Committee. Hawkins's subcommittee has the authority to subpoena witnesses and conduct oversight hearings on institutional discrimination in the NFL, he noted.

Congressional Study Finds

Fund Slashes Worsen Crisis of Nation's Cities

A study prepared for the congressional Joint Economic Committee painted a bleak outlook for the nation's cities as a result of President Reagan's proposed budget cuts.

The budget reductions expected to take effect in the fall will exacerbate the already serious fiscal problems of many municipalities, the study found.

"The number and proportion of cities which reported deficits . . . surpassed even the most pessimistic projections," the report observed. "And it should be noted that cities with deficits are not confined to any one region or size.

"THUS, IN LIGHT of the seemingly intractable high rate of inflation facing the nation and the proposed reductions in federal intergovernmental assistance, the outlook for cities is bleak."

The study is based on a survey of 275 cities around the country. The data used in the report were collected before the announcement of the Reagan budget proposals in February, and "are probably optimistic," the authors of the JEC report said.

Questionnaires were sent to 594 cities. Of the cities that responded, 79 percent indicated that their operating expenditures were expected to exceed revenues during the current fiscal year, compared with 50 percent of those responding to a similar survey last year and 55 percent in 1979.

THE REPORT said the federal government "may have to develop a policy for dealing with municipal default on other than an ad hoc basis," as it did in New York's fiscal crisis of the 1970s.

Other major findings of the study:

- For all cities responding to the survey, the average increase in both revenues and expenditures was below the rate of inflation in 1979-80. For 1981, all cities are anticipating that revenue increases will be significantly below expenditures increases.
- All cities experienced large reductions in their CETA (Comprehensive Education & Training Act) workforces in 1980. For 1981, all cities are predicting additional steep CETA declines.
- Wage and salary increases for police, fire, and sanitation workers were frequently below the rate of inflation. In the largest cities, the shortfall was dramatic. For 1981, the report observed, wage and salary increases proposed in the largest cities are below the increases projected by other size cities for all services.

The eventual way out of the financial crises shaping up for the cities, the report suggested, is to build a new economic bases.

"THE RESULTS of this study strongly support the need for reindustrialization policies, given the severe fiscal consequences to cities of declining middle-class populations and private sector jobs," the report said. "The study also shows the danger of too-heavy reliance on federal assistance.

"Even reindustrialization, which will undoubtedly help many cities, is a long-run solution. In the near term, short of imperiling the health and safety of its residents, cities will have to raise taxes, user charges, and fees to compensate for diminished federal assistance."

Because of the magnitude of the proposed federal budget cuts and the abruptness with which they will likely be implemented, the study concluded, "many economic development initiatives will be reversed, the population of many cities will be forced to forego certain services and to pay more for others, and an increasing number of cities will find themselves on the brink of collapse."

BRISK PACE is set by Rubber Workers' President Peter Bommarito in the March of Dimes fund-raiser in Akron, Ohio. Bommarito, in the white jacket, was joined in leading the march by Jack W. Johnson, chief negotiator for B. F. Goodrich Co.; W. G. Brant, labor program director for the march, and Akron Mayor Roy L. Ray. Bommarito had challenged the chairmen of the major rubber companies to sponsor his walk with contributions so he could make the "long hike" they always wanted him to take. The event raised $60,000.

NLRB Seeks Court Order Against Baseball Owners

Baseball's dispute over unfair labor practice charges against team owners spilled into federal district court in New York, where the National Labor Relations Board sought a temporary restraining order that could keep the 1981 season going for another 30 days at least.

Injunctive relief, sought by NLRB General Counsel William A. Lubbers on behalf of the players' union, the Major League Players Association, would mean the ballplayers would not have to strike on or before June 1 to prevent the club owners from unilaterally imposing their free-agent compensation plan.

THE BOARD authorized Lubbers on May 27 to seek the temporary restraining order and then, if granted, a full injunction. Many observers felt that an injunction would eliminate the possibility of a strike, but the players said they were keeping their options open. The union was to have started the first mid-season strike in baseball history at the conclusion of games scheduled on May 28.

The board's action followed the issuance by Lubbers of an unfair labor practice complaint accusing the owners of refusing to bargain in good faith. The players charged that management had refused to give them the financial data they need to continue good-faith bargaining on the free agent question.

Under the agreement that averted a strike last year, the free agent issue was put aside while the rest of the contract was settled. That contract allowed the owners to put their free agent compensation plan into effect June 1, 1981, unless agreement on the issue was reached. The players would have to strike before that date to prevent the imposition of the plan.

THE OWNERS' plan would allow a team that lost a "ranking" free agent in the re-entry draft to receive compensation from the player's new team in the form of a major-league player.

The players point out that this would severely limit free agency and that the proposal is the same one management put forth when negotiations started 16 months ago. Because a number of owners have claimed that the plan is necessary to avoid heavy financial burdens on their teams, the players have called on the owners to open their books to justify these arguments.

When the owners refused to do so, Lubbers issued the refusal-to-bargain complaint.

THE NLRB SAID it would continue to review the unfair labor practice charge. While the injunctive relief would block the compensation plan at least temporarily, it would not necessarily call for the owners to furnish the financial data to the union.

But the players would be free to continue the season without jeopardizing their position while the board considered the merits of the charge.

Workers Boost Averages With Bat Strike Settlement

Clarksville, Ind.—Big league baseball players have one less thing to worry about these days. They won't be running out of Louisville Sluggers now that the firm that makes their favorite bat has settled on a new contract with its union-represented workers.

The Slugger, manufactured just across the Ohio River here from the bat's Kentucky namesame, is very popular with major league players. About 90 percent of the bats used in the big leagues are Louisville Sluggers.

WHILE MOST clubs already had ordered the bulk of their bats for the season before last month's strike against Hillerich & Bradsby began, the longer the strike continued the greater the likelihood increased that hitters would start swinging the competition's timber—an Adirondack or one of those bats made in Japan.

Members of Steelworkers Local 3931 struck the firm on Apr. 12 just after the start of the baseball season. The main issues were wages and seniority rights. The union members, who also turn out metal golf club shafts, metal bats, softball and little league bats for the company, ended the dispute with ratification of a contract providing hourly wage increases of $1.80 over three years.

THE 340 WORKERS also won improved health insurance and pension benefits and a new dental plan and retained the right of senior employees to choose their secondary job assignments. When one line of the factory shuts down—for example, the line making baseball bats—a senior bat line worker can choose where he wants to work in another area of the plant.

SOCIAL SECURITY CUTS proposed by the Reagan Administration would break "a solemn contractual obligation" to American workers, AFL-CIO Vice President Jerry Wurf charged at a news conference called by the Save Our Security coalition. Organizations representing more than 35 million members are fighting benefit cutbacks.

Coalition Seeks To Bar All Cuts In Social Security benefits related to past earnings and contributions.

"It is not surprising that the country is reacting with outrage to proposals that would violate the compact," he testified.

BALL OUTLINED for the committee a variety of steps that could be taken to shore up the funding of the program, from temporary shifting of income from one trust fund to another as a short-term minimal step to the more "desirable" approach of starting to make general revenue contributions to the program.

"Eventual government contributions to social security were a part of the original design for the program," Ball reminded the committee.

Ball and other coalition representatives noted at the SOS news conference that the social security funding problem would not have arisen under a healthy economy.

If unemployment had been in the 4-to-5 percent range and inflation had not outstripped wages, Ball said in response to a question, there would have been ample money to meet benefit obligations.

OSHA Scraps 'Walkaround Pay' on Inspections

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, June 6, 1981 No. 23

By John R. Oravec

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has revoked its "walkaround pay" rule which unions regard as essential for worker participation in job site inspections and for effective enforcement of OSHA standards.

Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter said the regulation was being rescinded because it was not needed to carry out OSHA's programs. The rule required employers to fully compensate workers for the time they spend accompanying OSHA compliance officers during inspections.

OSHA ALSO announced new delays in implementing a "trigger" provision in the lead exposure standard requiring the transfer of affected workers to less-hazardous jobs and the effective date of a hearing conservation program for workers exposed to high levels of noise. Employer groups have strongly opposed both safeguards.

The original walkaround rule, issued in 1977, was sidetracked by a federal appeals court on a technicality last July after a challenge by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. A new rule was issued in January by the outgoing Carter Administration, but its effective date was postponed under orders of President Reagan.

The Chamber of Commerce also challenged the reissued rule, contending that the time workers spend on inspections does not constitute "time worked" within the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

AUCHTER, who is the director of OSHA, insisted in revoking the rule that "the issue of walkaround pay is best left to voluntary arrangements between employers and employees."

AFL-CIO Safety Director George H. R. Taylor warned that the revocation threatens to lock workers out of the inspection process by creating a closed relationship between OSHA and the employer. He said

THREE FORMER COMMISSIONERS of the Social Security Administration testify at House hearings on the severe impact the Reagan Administration's benefit cuts would have on women. From left, Robert M. Ball, Stanford G. Ross and William Driver.

'Catastrophic' Impact

Women Biggest Losers In Social Security Slash

America's women would be the biggest losers if Congress agreed to the Reagan Administration's social security proposals, a House task force discovered.

The task force, set up by the House Select Committee on Aging, found that women are already clustered at the bottom of the social security benefit structure and are disproportionately vulnerable to the cutbacks the Administration has sought.

REP. MARY ROSE OAKAR (D-Ohio), who heads the task force and presided at its hearings, said the Administration plan would have a "catastrophic" impact on older women especially.

Witnesses at the hearings included former Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball, who testified for the Save Our Security coalition that is fighting the Reagan cuts.

He was on a panel with two other former heads of the Social Security Administration, William Driver and Stanford G. Ross.

Ball cited as an example the effect of the Administration's proposal to eliminate the minimum social security benefit—the floor under benefits that now goes to some 3 million persons. Three-fourths of them are women, Ball pointed out.

He challenged the Administration's claim that the "truly needy" wouldn't be hurt because they could apply for SSI payments—the Supplemental Security Income available to the aged poor.

BUT SSI IS available only to persons over 65, Ball said, and many of the women affected have had to retire at age 62 "because they had no alternative." Further, SSI is available only to those with less than $1,500 in personal assets, and many older people "just do not want to apply for welfare with its test of income and assets."

Cuts in disability benefits and tougher qualification standards would apply to men and women alike. But Ball said the stricter test of recent employment proposed by the Administration would disqualify proportionately more women than men because women workers are more likely to have had gaps in their working years, "particularly because of child rearing."

Ball reminded the panel that disability protection was substantially cut back last year, that 70 percent of all applications for disability insurance are disallowed, and

Davis-Bacon Foes Linked to Revival Of Wage Chiseling

Government contracts shouldn't be a prize to employers who pay the lowest wages and provide the least benefits, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Labor Committee.

The federation stressed that prevailing wage protections are still needed and should be strengthened rather than weakened.

The AFL-CIO statement responded to attacks on the Davis-Bacon Act and other wage protection laws that were made during hearings earlier this spring. Subcommittee Chairman Don Nickles (R-Okla.) had opened the hearings by branding Davis-Bacon "inflationary" and calling for its repeal.

THE DAVIS-BACON ACT, adopted in 1931 during the Hoover Administration, has been the chief target of open-shop employers. It requires payment of local prevailing wages and benefits on federally funded construction contracts.

Also under fire have been the 1936 Walsh-Healey Act which requires industry minimums for government procurement contracts and the 1956 Service Contract Act, which has sought to prevent wage-cutting on service contracts.

The "underlying theory" of the three laws, the AFL-CIO said, "is that competition for government contracts should be based on managerial ability—the ability to perform the contract, manage the workforce and use technological innovations—not on the basis of who can exploit their workers the most."

DAVIS-BACON wage determinations reflect union wage scales only in communities where the union scale is predominant, the AFL-CIO noted. And in those communities, especially, the law "has civil rights implications," it stressed.

Union apprenticeship programs have a much higher percentage of minority participation than non-union programs, the federation testified. "It would be a tremendous disservice to these minority workers if the federal government were to now turn on them and seek to drive down their wages through encouraging wage-busting and chiseling."

The AFL-CIO suggested that "some fine-tuning" could improve the administration of the law and the procedure for determining prevailing wage rates. A sound starting point, the federation said, would be to put into effect the regulations that the Administration has withdrawn while it considers more drastic revisions that have been urged by employer groups.

Senate Cuts Back Public Housing, Ups Rent Charge

The Senate's Republican majority voted to cut public housing programs below even President Reagan's budget request and to make people living in them pay a bigger share of their income for rent.

An earlier budget action had reduced the number of rental units authorized for the current fiscal year from the 250,000 level voted by the previous Congress to 210,000.

THE OUTGOING Carter Administration had proposed 260,000 new units for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, 1981. The AFL-CIO, in Senate testimony last April, had urged that this be raised to 300,000 units because of the slump in unsubsidized

Labor Opposes Tuition Tax Credit

Tuition tax credits for students in private schools would undermine quality public education in America, AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields warned at Senate hearings.

Shields called the proposal to provide a refundable tax credit for students in private colleges, vocational and elementary and secondary schools a "threat to public education" and a "poor, regressive tax policy" that would mean "an open-ended revenue loss for the federal treasury."

TESTIFYING BEFORE the Subcommittee on Taxation of the Senate Finance Committee, Shields stressed that the tax credits would weaken public school systems already hurt by declining enrollments and cutbacks in state and federal aid. She pointed out that the proposal would cost billions of dollars in federal revenues at a time when Congress and the Administration are trying to balance the budget and cut federal programs, "including a huge 30-percent cut in federal aid to education."

Shields reminded the committee that the labor movement had led the fight for free universal public education for American children. The AFL-CIO still supports the idea that public education for workers and their children "is a priority consideration in the improved quality of life to which we all aspire," she said. Shields told the subcommittee, that the tuition tax credit proposal would restructure federal aid to education to give private schools the advantage over the public school system.

THE PROPOSED bill would give taxpayers a credit equal to 50 percent of education expenses up to $250 the first year and $500 per year thereafter.

Shields noted that the benefits would apply not only to dependent children but could be applied to taxpayers and their spouses and a wide range of other dependents as defined under current tax codes. Graduate students and part-time students would eventually be eligible under the terms of the proposed bill.

The result, Shields told the committee, will amount to "another open-ended tax expenditure item that is not subject to normal processes of authorization and appropriations." This could lead to increases in other taxes or to forced reductions in many direct educational aid programs, she warned.

THE ADVANTAGES turned over to the private education system will drain public education in a number of ways, Shields explained. An "educational caste system" would be created as advantaged children shift from the public schools, leaving behind the handicapped, the learning disabled and the poor. A reverse in the that non-union workers who have no contractual protection on job safety matters would be particularly affected by the loss of the walkaround pay provision.

UNIONS HAD been fighting for walkaround coverage since the early 1970s to assure that workers would not be docked for time spent off their regular jobs to take part in the inspections. Extensive inspections of large plants in hazardous industries can take several weeks.

In issuing the original rule in 1977, OSHA directed that employers must pay workers for the walkaround time or be charged with discrimination under Section 11 (c) of the 1970 job safety law. A federal district court upheld the rule, but the appeals court vacated it on the ground that OSHA had not provided for public comment before the rule was put into effect.

Under the lead exposure standard, OSHA has postponed implementation of a new "trigger level" for medical removal of workers for the third time in the primary and secondary smelter industries.

INDUSTRY GROUPS have been pushing for a one-year delay in the regulation, which had been scheduled to take effect Mar. 1.

OSHA delayed until May 15 lowering the trigger level from 70 micrograms of lead per 100 grams of blood to 60 micrograms of lead for all industries except the primary and secondary smelters. At that time it exempted the smelters until June 1. Now, the effective date has been pushed back to July 1.

On the noise regulation, the new hearing conservation program was to have taken effect Apr. 16, but OSHA had ordered a delay until June 1. The effective date has now been postponed to Aug. 1.

Administration Witness Trips Over Own Words

An Administration witness tripped on his own rhetoric at House hearings on President Reagan's proposed social security cutbacks.

Deputy Social Security Commissioner Robert J. Myers told a task force of the House Select Committee on Aging that the cuts are needed because the program "is teetering on the edge of bankruptcy." He insisted that "we are facing the most serious crisis in the 46-year history of the social security system."

Then it was the turn of former Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball to testify on behalf of the Save Our Security coalition which is fighting the cutbacks.

Ball happened to have with him the previous month's issue of OASIS, the Social Security Administration's own magazine, and it featured prominently "An Interview with Deputy Commissioner Myers."

The social security system is "here to stay," Myers stressed in the interview.

As for its financial problems, "they can be solved readily. Many of the headlines of gloom and inevitable bankruptcy just are not valid," he said.

Government Employees Map Protests Over Budget Cuts

A plan for escalating protests against the Reagan Administration's "disastrous budget cuts" was adopted by the American Federation of Government Employees at an emergency strategy conference.

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock said the 400 local and district leaders who came to Washington for the sessions agreed on a summer-long schedule of progressively more militant actions, including demonstrations, marches and other forms of protest.

NEXT SEPTEMBER, he said, AFGE members will be asked to vote on a proposal to authorize the union's officers to call "whatever action is required."

Blaylock said the union's strategy involves efforts to increase public awareness of the impact of budget cuts in such areas as social security, veterans benefits, housing, aid to the poor, the elderly and children, job training, labor standards enforcement and consumer protections among others.

He said the union will work to strengthen its political action capability in each congressional district and will mount public education campaigns on the cuts.

The AFGE will also work with other labor and community organizations, both locally and nationally, to form broad coalitions to oppose Administration proposals that "will penalize America's middle class and poor in favor of the wealthy and powerful," Blaylock said.

HE CHARGED that the "obvious intent" of the Administration is "to systematically dismantle government." The AFGE will work to dispel the Administration's smokescreen and show "an undistorted picture of what is happening," he said.

The union hopes to "forge a bond" with taxpayers to "restore sanity and compassion to America's governmental programs," he said.

The leadership conference delegates proposed that if the measures to be undertaken over the next few months do not bring results, the AFGE should conduct a national membership vote on a proposal to authorize the union's executive council "to call whatever action is required."

A SUBSEQUENT AFGE executive council statement endorsed the leadership conference program and affirmed the union's "total commitment" to its recommendations.

A council statement charged that the Administration's actions, supposedly designed to "get the government off the backs of the people," are destroying "programs which were intended to keep large segments of America on their feet and off their backs."

It noted that government workers involved in these threatened programs "see what the politicians and managers do not see—the infirm, the hungry, the old and the powerless" who are the real victims of the budget cuts.

Court Weighs Injunction Bid Against Major League Clubs

Rochester, N.Y.—A federal judge promised a decision within 48 hours after final arguments here on a National Labor Relations Board request for an injunction against major league baseball club owners blocking their free-agent compensation plan.

U.S. District Judge Henry F. Werker heard closing arguments in the complex case on June 4. If he refuses to grant the injunction, the players could strike 24 to 48 hours after his decision. If the injunction is granted, the status quo would be maintained while hearings are held on the Players' Association's unfair labor practice charge against the owners.

THE COURT hearing followed a May 28 agreement by both sides before Werker in U.S. District Court in Manhattan that extended the deadline by which the players had to strike before the owners' compensation plan would take effect this season.

Under questioning here, Ray Grebey, director of the owners' Player Relations Committtee, acknowledged that the 26 major league clubs had purchased $50 million in strike insurance at a cost of $2 million. That coverage will expire Dec. 31, and Grebey expressed doubt that it could be replaced.

Other witnesses included baseball commissioner Bowie Kuhn and Marvin Miller, exceutive director of the Major League Players Association. Miller was the leadoff witness for the NLRB, and testified on the history of the thorny free-agent issue.

THE NLRB HAS issued a complaint that the owners have failed to bargain in good faith by refusing to provide the Players' Association the financial data it needs to bargain on the issue. An NLRB administrative law judge is scheduled to hear the board's case against the owners beginning June 15 in New York.

If Werker grants the injunction as requested by the NLRB, the owners would not be able to implement their compensation proposal until next year, between Feb. 15 and 20. The players, as they did this year, would have to decide by Mar. 1 whether to accept the proposal or strike. If they decided to strike, they would have to do so by June 1.

The owners' plan would allow a team that lost a "ranking" free agent in the re-entry draft to receive compensation from the players' new team in the form of a major league player.

Postal Workers Choose Holbrook For Key Office

Douglas C. Holbrook has been chosen to succeed Chester W. Parrish as secretary-treasurer of the Postal Workers on the latter's retirement.

Holbrook, president of the APWU local in Detroit since 1966, was confirmed by the union's executive board to complete Parrish's current three-year term to which he was re-elected last fall. Holbrook is 47.

Parrish, 56, retired May 29 to close a 35-year career with the APWU and the Post Office Motor Vehicle Employees, one of five unions that merged in 1971 to form the Postal Workers. Parrish had held a number of key offices with the Motor Vehicle Employees and was president of the union at the time of the merger. He was president of APWU's motor vehicle craft division until his election as secretary-treasurer in 1977.

In addition to heading the APWU Detroit local for 15 years, Holbrook also has served on the executive board of the Detroit AFL-CIO.

Maritime Award To Honor Paul Hall

New York—The late Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers and an AFL-CIO vice president, has been named the 1981 recipient of the Admiral of the Ocean Sea Award, the maritime industry's highest honor.

The award is given annually by the United Seamen's Service to individuals in maritime labor, industry, or government for outstanding contributions to the American merchant marine. Hall's widow, Rose, and Frank Drozak, who succeeded him as SIU president, will accept the award in his behalf at a Sept. 25 dinner here chaired by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Women Face Biggest Loss In Benefit Cut

that "this part of the social security system does not have a financing problem."

Another task force witness, President Eleanor C. Smeal of the National Organization for Women, testified that curtailment of age 62 early retirement benefits would be especially harmful to women.

Because of the earnings gap between men and women, she noted, women are already at the lower benefit levels. The Administration plan would drop the age 62 retirement benefit from the present level of 80 percent of age 65 payments to 55 percent.

But "a higher proportion of women than men retire before age 65, primarily due to ill health and loss of jobs," Sneal testified. Minority women, she said, will be especially penalized.

OTHER WITNESSES cited the high portion of elderly, single women dependent on social security payments as their chief income.

Oakar noted that Congress has already taken a big step to reducing social security benefits by setting budget ceilings that almost compel adoption of some of the Administration cutbacks.

"Those of us in Congress who have been working to make social security more equitable and adequate for women were shocked, dismayed and deeply disturbed by the Administration's proposals," she said. "They will undermine the very concept of social security as a social insurance program for our nation's workers and their families."

AN ADMINISTRATION witness, Deputy Social Security Commissioner Robert J. Myers, argued that the proposed cuts "apply equally to men and women."

Myers acknowledged the point that women might come out worse than men under the Administration proposal. But this reflects "discrimination in the workplace and cultural differences between the life-styles of men and women," he insisted, and these "are not problems which social security can solve."

CWA Tops Vote For New Jersey Units of 32,000

Trenton, N.J.—The Communications Workers won bargaining rights for all 32,000 New Jersey state white-collar workers in the nation's largest union representation election since 1977.

CWA swept the balloting in three runoff elections among 20,700 state workers, the New Jersey Public Employee Relations Commission reported.

In March, CWA won a three-way contest with the State, County & Municipal Employees and the American Federation of Teachers to win representation rights for some 11,500 administrative and clerical workers of the state. At that time, CWA led in voting among professional employees and two units of supervisory workers but lacked a clear majority in the three-way contest.

The tally of mail ballots in the runoff with AFSCME showed CWA with 53 percent of the 10,500-member professional employees unit, 59 percent among the 9,000 first-level supervisors, and 54 percent among the 1,200 higher-level supervisors.

The state white-collar workers at one time were represented by two independent associations, but their joint bargaining relationship crumbled in the fall of 1979.

CWA now represents over 40,000 government employees overall in New Jersey. Besides the state white-collar workers, the union represents about 4,000 case workers and other employees of 22 county welfare boards and about 6,000 county and municipal department workers.

ACTWU Convention

Reagan Scored on Drive To Cancel Worker Gains

Detroit—Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley denounced the Reagan Administration's efforts "to turn back 50 years of government that is concerned with the people."

In his keynote address to some 3,000 delegates and alternates to ACTWU's second constitutional convention, Finley declared that "51 percent is not an overwhelming mandate for anyone . . . and surely not a mandate to impeach former Presidents Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Harry Truman, John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson" by destroying all they stood for and accomplished.

FINLEY REMINDED the delegates that the American people did not—as he said the Reagan Administration would have the nation believe—vote to cut social security benefits, do away with the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act to help workers left jobless by imports, cut unemployment compensation or cut the Occupational Safety & Health Act in the interests of balancing the budget.

He said that the labor movement does not "seek a confrontation" with the Reagan Administration, but it will be "in the forefront of the fight for the concern of all the people of this country."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed in an address to the delegates that the American labor movement currently has "two large jobs . . . to defend social programs and do everything in our power to see that our friends are returned to Capitol Hill." Kirkland pledged that "late or soon, we shall prevail simply because we have not ever, we will never, we do not and will not quit."

IN HIS SPEECH Kirkland outlined the attack by the Reagan Administration on workers that is making "our country into a two-class society with great wealth on one side, enjoying all the largess and blessings of government, and privation and insecurity and neglect on the other.

"Workers must see we are not fighting abstractions," Kirkland said. "It is their hospitals that will close, their schools, their jobs, their families that will suffer. Our job is to bring these facts home to our fellow citizens."

ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, in his report to the convention, said that "the issue between us working men and women and the Reagan Administration was drawn clearly and honestly in the first economic speech of the President. He made a ringing declaration . . . that the taxing power of government must not be used to regulate the economy and bring about social change."

TAKING SHARP issue with that position, Sheinkman recalled that social security, "one of the most profound social and economic changes in American history, was brought about by using the taxing powers of government."

Deploring the Administration's moves to cut social programs and to make OSHA regulations—such as the cotton dust standard to conquer the hazard of brown lung disease in textile mills—more "cost efficient" for big business, Sheinkman declared: "We reject any cost analysis which places a dollar value on our lives . . . and any administration that says cost efficiency is a factor in measuring the worth of our lives. . . . We do not believe that the people who are the worst off should be squeezed the most."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) drew applause from the delegates as he issued a challenge to the "New Right" and pledged that he will run for re-election to the Senate and continue to fight repressive legislation designed to weaken the labor movement's ability to protect the benefits workers have gained over the years.

ACKNOWLEDGING that he is "the number one target of the radical right and the Moral Majority," he pledged to "fight back."

"And with your help and assistance," he said, "I intend to return to the United States Senate and continue to stand with all of you in the fights for the future that we have yet to win."

Blasting "those who came to power in Washington in 1980" as the "most anti-labor administration and the most anti-worker Congress in half a century," Kennedy pledged to do all he can in Congress to prevent any socially repressive measures from ever reaching President Reagan's desk.

ACTWU SENIOR Executive Vice President Sol Stetin castigated the Administration for its OSHA cutbacks that he said will jeopardize the lives of millions of workers. He also scored Reagan's proposals for heavy reductions in social security benefits while leaving untouched the tax write-offs "that put billions into the treasuries of the big oil companies every year."

President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers told the convention that the number one problem on the agenda for both ACTWU and the ILGWU "has to be the evolution of a rational policy of fair trade. Our unions will not be able to survive many years into the future if every year, year after year, we report to our members that the amount of imports of every type and description in the softgoods industry has increased by leaps and bounds."

HE CALLED for a renewed effort to tell labor's story to the people.

"We have failed," he said, "because as we have moved we have failed to take the story with us and to educate our friends and neighbors to the recent history of the trade union movement. And while we fight this rearguard action that we will continue to fight as long as Reagan is in office, we have to think of our own agenda going forward and getting this across."

The convention unanimously adopted a resolution calling on the federal government to set up a federal task force to investigate the unsolved murders of 30 children and young adults in Atlanta and offering full help and support to officials and the people of Atlanta.

STRONG CHALLENGE was thrown down by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to those who introduce legislation in Congress to curb gains made by workers and society. Kennedy told 3,000 delegates to the Clothing & Textile Workers convention he will fight "New Right" efforts to reverse social progress. Also on the dais are ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, left, and President Murray H. Finley.

Economic Index Signals Further Slowdown Ahead

The government's index of leading economic indicators rose a modest four-tenths of 1 percent in April, largely reflecting an increase in the nation's money supply.

The increase in the index—a measure designed to forecast economic trends—was the second straight following three monthly declines. But the lackluster April showing indicated to many economists that the economy was slowing rather than picking up.

NEWLY NOMINATED Council of Economic Advisers member Jerry Jordan said that "a slowdown in real growth" is expected in the current quarter. "We are entering a period where we could see a decline in real gross national product," he said. Real GNP is the value of the nation's total output of goods and services.

Besides an increase in the money supply, other indicators that made positive contributions to the April index included length of the average workweek, new manufacturing orders for consumer goods, vendor performance, building permits, producers' prices, and stock prices. The rise in building permits—an important barometer of future housing construction activity—was the first monthly increase in this indicator since last November.

The layoff rate in manufacturing industries was unchanged from March, and the two remaining April indicators—contractors and orders for plant and equipment and change in total liquid assets—made negative contributions to the index.

In another government report, the Commerce Dept. said the nation's merchandise trade deficit grew to $3.46 billion in April. A $1.4-billion increase in petroleum imports over the month was the largest contributor to the overall worsening of the trade balance.

The report showed the value of imported vehicles declined $28 million to a total of $1.17 billion in April. Auto exports also fell, but by a lesser amount, $11 million, to a total of $63 million.

MEANWHILE, several big banks followed the lead of New York's Chase Manhattan in lowering their prime lending rates to 20 percent from 20.5 percent, but most analysts believed that it was too early to say whether the key interest rate would continue to decline.

Chase, the nation's third largest bank after the Bank of America and Citibank, said it lowered its rate "in response to the recent drop in the cost of our raw material, money." The prime, nominally the rate on short-term loans for banks' best corporate customers, is the base rate that banks use to compute interest charges for everyone, from business customers to consumers.

Rising mortgage interest rates played a major role in the 13.5 percent drop in April home sales reported by the Departments of Commerce and Housing & Urban Development. The decline in sales of new, single-family houses was the biggest in a year.

Robert Sheehan, an economist with the National Association of Home Builders, said that sales may have fallen even more last month because "May is when interest rates really took off."

Union Support Urged For Vietnam Memorial

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has urged federation affiliates and their members to support fund-raising efforts in behalf of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in the nation's capital.

The memorial, planned for a two-acre site near the Lincoln Memorial already authorized by Congress, "will constitute a long overdue expression of appreciation" for the sacrifices of those Americans who served in Vietnam, Kirkland said in a letter to presidents of AFL-CIO unions.

Contributions should be mailed to Vietnam Memorial Fund, P.O. Box 37240, Washington, D.C. 20013. Dedication of the memorial is planned for November 1982.

A Time for Unity

THIS IS A TIME when our movement needs the highest measure of unity, the strongest degree of understanding and support from those for whom we speak, and all the reliable allies that we can possibly find.

We have two broad and very large jobs on our hands.

One is to defend as best we can the social programs that reinforce this comparatively humane society that we have helped to build over the last half-century, and to resist the effort to divide and polarize our country into a two-class society with great wealth on one side, enjoying all of the largess and blessings of government, and privation and insecurity and neglect on the other.

The second, and certainly vital to the first, is to do everything in our power before the next election to see that our friends are returned to Capitol Hill, joined by others, and that our opponents are retired to that private and tranquil life which they so richly deserve.

TO DO THAT, the working people of America must see and they must understand that we are not fighting over abstractions, that it is their health that is being put at hazard by the crippling of OSHA and the rollback and dismantling of protective regulations.

It is their hospitals that will close, and it is their children's schools that will deteriorate. It is their neighbors whose jobs will be destroyed by the strangulation of federal aid to the states and cities and the dismantling of training and job opportunity programs.

It is their neighborhoods that are threatened with decay and blight. They are the consumers who are no longer to have protection from unscrupulous manufacturers who believe that anything goes for a buck.

It is their parents in their retirement years, and themselves in years to come, who are to be sold out in the assault upon the social security system in this Administration's drive to force that vital asset under the general budget chopping block.

OUR JOB IS to bring these facts home in the most human terms to our fellow citizens, those who have not yet seen through the rhetoric.

Our job is to make the law-makers understand that the budgetary knife does not just slice pieces of paper with numbers on them, that it draws blood and impairs the flesh, wounds the flesh of human beings like themselves.

There are some welcome signs that the American people, and at least some of their elected officials, are beginning to become a little bit uneasy about the human costs behind the dollar-savings proposals.

We still have some friends in Congress—timid though they be.

We need them and they need us. And they need all the support that we can muster in their home states and in their districts to put some iron in their backbones.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to the convention of the Clothing & Textile Workers, Detroit, June 2, 1981.

Goof on Social Security

Senate's 96-0 Rebuff of Reagan Is One for the Record Books

By Gus Tyler

A REPUBLICAN PRESIDENT proposed changes in the social security law. A Republican-dominated Senate, by a vote of 96 to 0, adopted a resolution that disavowed the most drastic of the Administration's proposals.

The event belongs in the Ginness Book of Records. It never happened before.

Presidents have lost out in battles with House or Senate or both even when the Congress was controlled by their own party. But for a President to lose the game in a shutout in a contest with a house controlled by his own team is a historic first. Not a single Republican—not one—would stand up for Reagan.

HOW COULD this ever come to pass? Bad politics, worse arithmetic, and incredible incompetence.

Rumor hath it that some Democrat was preparing a bill to cut back on social security. The White House panicked. They did not want the Democrats to get "the credit." They put pressure on their Secretary of Health & Human Resources, Richard Schweiker, to come forward with his long-delayed recommendations on the security system.

So, in the heat of haste, he laid his egg. It was passed from hand to hand and, it is said, even the President had a chance to glance at the product produced in a hurry. They rushed it to the Senate to make sure that the Democrats did not get the "credit."

APPARENTLY nobody stopped to ask: "why not give the Democrats the credit for cutting down on social security?" It might be dirty pool but it would have been damn good politics.

Arithmetically, any member of the Senate who could add and subtract had to know that the President's proposal would add billions to the federal deficit.

If the President's plan resulted in postponing retirement by, let's say, one million workers, that would save the security system about $4 billion. If that meant that one million workers who might have filled the vacancies of the retired remained jobless, that would cost Uncle Sam $20 billion out of the treasury. The net loss would have been at least $16 billion for one year.

More incredible, however, than the poor politics and the messy mathematics is the sheer incompetence of an Administration that is so out of touch with the leadership of its own party that it is unable to muster a single vote for a President's proposal.

THE PRESIDENT could hardly say that he was acting as he did because he had a "mandate" from the electorate. If he had a "mandate" it was quite to the contrary, because Reagan was quite explicit during the election that he would leave social security untouched.

So what happened? Some say that the Administration was drunk with success over its budget victory; others say that the White House was taking the Senate for granted. Still others say that the staff bypassed the boss in these days of Reagan's remarkable recovery.

But whatever the explanation, it is clear that the Republicans at one end of Pennsylvania Avenue did not talk with Republicans at the other end of the same avenue over a major matter. And that's plain incompetence.

Less Coverage, Soaring Costs

California Failure Discredits Reagan Health Plan for Nation

The following article appeared in the New York Times on May 29, 1981. It was written by Philip R. Lee, professor of social medicine at the University of California, San Francisco, and Barry Esminger, a visiting scholar at the university.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S budgetary policies would end 50 years of increasing federal responsibility for health. Before Congress moves precipitously to enact his health program, it should examine California's experience under Ronald Reagan as governor.

Under President Reagan's program, federal Medicaid payments would be capped and cut by $1 billion in fiscal 1982, $5 billion in 1985; 26 public health programs would be cut 25 percent and consolidated into state block grants; regulatory efforts to control spiraling medical costs through health planning, limits on unnecessary services by physicians, and promotion of health-maintenance organizations would be abandoned. Within several years, we are promised, there would be comprehensive health reform based on a newly revitalized private market.

In return for immediate cutbacks, the Administration offers states added "flexibility to target services to the truly needed." But half of America's poor are ineligible for Medicaid, and millions more have little or no private insurance. This year, 25 states have proposed further Medicaid reductions, and strapped municipalities are cutting public hospitals and clinics even as more uninsured patients seek care.

BEFORE 1971, California financed a broad range of medical services to welfare clients. Indigents who failed to qualify were treated in county hospitals and clinics, with the state paying most costs above 1965 county outlays for health. Medicaid and state supplements alleviated the local burden of medical care of indigents. Progressive income taxes replaced regressive property taxes. Counties upgraded old facilities and understaffed programs; access and the quality of care improved.

Then, in 1971 Gov. Reagan proposed, and the legislature passed, far-reaching Medicaid "reform." Like his 1981 proposal, it reversed the trend toward more equitable financing. The local medical cost pass-through was eliminated and replaced with restrictive state eligibility guidelines. In effect, state responsibility was "capped." Suddenly, counties were faced with many sick patients ineligible for state payments.

STATE COSTS were reduced but local health expenditures soared. Counties began painful retrenchment: More than 20 public hospitals closed, basic clinical services were curtailed, strict billing of near-poor families was instituted. A 1978 state health department report concluded: "Medical recipients, medical indigents, and the working poor have often been left with no place at all to go for medical or hospital care."

Still, costs rose. Los Angeles County alone experienced an eight-fold increase over 10 years despite stringent reductions in service.

THE CALIFORNIA EXPERIENCE teaches that the quick fix of federal funding cuts will reduce access to services and shift costs rather than reduce overall government spending. Americans believe in essential medical care, but someone must pay the bill for those who cannot. It can be paid by hard-pressed states and near-bankrupt cities, or it can be shared by all of us. We should follow all other industrialized nations and federalize these expenses.

What of rapidly rising medical costs? In proposing a return to the marketplace, Reagan forgets that Medicaid and Medicare were enacted because of market failure. He forgets that existing controls on costs, beds, and services were instituted after well-documented abuses by private providers.

Yet, we are confidently assured that the Reagan solution, based on large numbers of cost-conscious consumers enrolling in competing prepaid health plans, will work better. Once before, Reagan relied on the rapid, unregulated development of prepaid plans to reduce costs. The results were an unmitigated disaster.

HIS 1971 "REFORM" authorized state Medicaid contracts with prepaid health plans to deliver care for a fixed monthly sum. Little attention was paid to quality, competence, even honesty. Door-to-door solicitors enrolled recipients, often through misrepresentation. Many medical entrepreneurs got rich, but when people were sick doctors were frequently unavailable. Investigations and indictments followed. Reputable health maintenance organizations suffered guilt by association. Complex new regulations were issued to control abuses.

Understandably, the nation is frightened by high inflation and widespread unemployment. Before swallowing the Reagan health prescription for our economic sickness, Congress and the public should consider the past. Hasty action promises fewer services to sick and needy people, a wholesale shift of costs onto state and local taxpayers, and soaring new health bills. The prospects could hardly be worse.

Reagan Budget Impact

Transfer of Federal Programs Adds to Burden on States, Cities

STATE AND LOCAL governments face new financial strains as the Reagan budget shifts the administration and operation of programs now handled by various federal agencies, President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. said.

The quality of essential services will suffer, Blaylock said, not because state and local governments are inept, but because they are already bumping against the limits of their taxing ability. He said the so-called tax rebellion of California's Proposition 13 and Proposition 2½ in Massachusetts is likely to spread as states and cities try to raise the funds to carry out these new responsibilities.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Blaylock stressed that many of the affected programs were consolidated at the federal level to ease the burden of "total administrative capability" for the programs in "several thousand jurisdictions." The Reagan budget cuts now force a return to fragmented responsibility and couple it with a 25-percent funding cutback, he pointed out.

Blaylock, who is president of the American Federation of Government Employees and a vice president of the AFL-CIO, said the Administration's budget-cutters could have saved billions of federal dollars by improving "poorly designed and poorly managed" federal programs rather than making across-the-board funding slashes.

HE SAID he has little faith in the President's call for inspectors general who are "meaner than junkyard dogs," pointing out that they will have "a very close relationship with each agency," and "junkyard dogs protect their own territory."

Reporters questioning Blaylock on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, aired over the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Michael Causey of the Washington Post and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS and voter registration campaigns of the 1950s and 1960s focused national attention on the fact that millions of Americans still were barred from exercising one of their most fundamental rights—the right to vote.

A turning point came in early 1965, when Alabama Gov. George Wallace's state troopers clubbed and tear-gassed peaceful demonstrators led by Martin Luther King, Jr., to halt a march from Selma, Ala., to the state capital.

Ten days later, President Lyndon B. Johnson, in a dramatic address to the nation, proposed the landmark Voting Rights Act of 1965. After a long filibuster, it became law.

OVER THE NEXT seven years, more than a million black citizens were added to the voting rolls. In Mississippi, fewer than 7 percent of the state's eligible black voters had been registered the year before the Voting Rights Act was passed. By 1976, 67.4 percent were registered.

In addition, hundreds of thousands of poor whites were able to register because of the act's abolition of the literacy test and the poll tax, which were widely used in the South.

Congress extended the act in 1970 and again in 1975. Yet, what has been hailed as the most effective civil rights law in recent history is in danger of being lost or crippled by amendments. Most of the act's provisions will expire in August 1982 unless Congress extends the law.

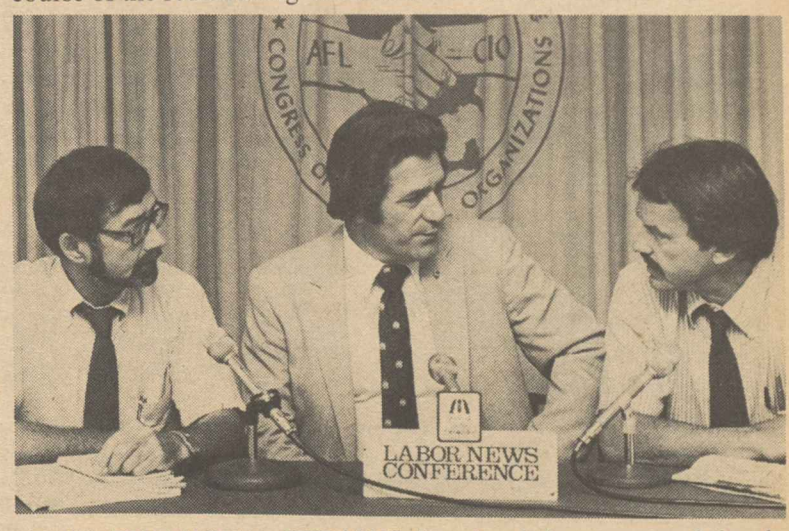
IRONICALLY, the Voting Rights Act could become a victim of its success, since its critics argue that it is no longer needed. These critics also use the standard line about federal "meddling" in state and local matters.

While the Voting Rights Act did away with such blatantly discriminatory voting restrictions as the literacy test and made it a federal crime to intimidate anyone from voting, some local and state officials have been ingenious in devising new methods to accomplish the same objective.

These methods dilute minority voting strength by racial gerrymandering, annexations by a city or county, and switching from ward-type systems to at-large voting.

Under the Voting Rights law's "preclearance" section, the Justice Dept. has disapproved more than 800 local and state voting changes, most of them of the more subtle variety.

EVEN WITH the act, some cities, counties and states, especially in the Deep South, have continued to circumvent preclearance by failing to submit changes or by implementing changes which had been disapproved.



A notable example is Edgefield County, S.C., the home county of Sen. Strom Thurmond, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which handles the Voting Rights Act. No black person has been elected there in this century despite its black majority population.

Thurmond and other legislators, most of them from the South and Southwest, want to eliminate preclearance, the heart of the Voting Rights Act.

A SO-CALLED compromise bill, introduced by Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), ranking Republican on the constitutional rights subcommittee, would abolish preclearance unless a federal judge could be persuaded there had been a current pattern of abuses.

Civil rights advocates pointed out that the Hyde amendment would put the burden of proof on the victims of discrimination and necessitate the tedious, case-by-case litigation which was the practice prior to passage of the Voting Rights Act.

Legislation introduced in the House by Rep. Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) and in the Senate by Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R-Md.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), would extend the Act until 1992. It thus would protect minority voting strength in the course of the redistricting which will follow the 1990 Census.

NEW FINANCIAL STRAINS lie ahead for state and local governments as the Reagan budget shifts the operation and administration of programs now handled by various federal agencies, President Kenneth T. Blaylock, center, of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Michael Causey of the Washington Post.

REAGAN BUDGET CUTBACKS threaten sharp curtailment of federal safety programs to deal with the hazardous jobs in the nation's food processing industries. Grain elevator explosions thus far in 1981 have claimed 10 lives, while meat packing plants average 35 injuries a year per 100 workers.

The Reagan Budget

Cutting Where It Truly Hurts

Hermelinda Delgadillo pleaded with her husband, Pedro, last Apr. 7 to stay home from his job at the Corpus Christi, Tex., public grain elevator.

"He hadn't missed a day of work in 15 years," Mrs. Delgadillo said. "I said, 'Why don't you take Tuesday off?' But he didn't want to."

THE NEXT DAY, his body was found in the rubble left by explosions and fire at the grain elevator. Five of his fellow workers also were killed, and 33 others suffered serious injuries or burns.

So far this year, grain elevator explosions have caused ten deaths; the annual average is 60 fatalities.

The explosions result when the highly combustible mixture of grain dust and air in the elevators is ignited. A small spark can set off the elevator much as a match would a stick of dynamite.

But most explosions could be avoided with the installation of protective equipment. Exhaust systems, for example, would lower the concentration of dust in the air and shields over moving parts on machinery would reduce the risk of sparks.

THESE AND OTHER preventive measures were included last year in proposals for a grain dust standard to be developed by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration. It would have required grain elevator owners to keep dust levels low. Shortly after taking office, however, the Reagan Administration pulled back a number of OSHA standards for "cost-effective" review.

The effect is to put a price tag on human lives and limbs by measuring their loss against the cost to industry of meeting protective standards. OSHA's new administrator, Thorne G. Auchter, said the agency must "demonstrate clear and concise objectivity." He said "an analysis of costs and benefits" will indicate to OSHA what approach should be used in making policy decisions.

But the cost to workers represented by unions in the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. is already too high. They have been and will continue to be hurt, literally, by the reduction in funds for safety and health.

MANY OF THE department's members work in food processing—cutting meat, packaging poultry and canning vegetables and fruits. While on the surface these jobs don't seem hazardous, a Bureau of Labor Statistics study of 1975-77 illness and injury occurrences found 18-food-related occupations with rates above the national average. The injury and fatality statistics show meatpacking to be among the most dangerous occupations.

Funding cuts for OSHA programs will undermine efforts to reduce these injury and illness rates in several ways.

This analysis of the impact of the Reagan Administration economic program was prepared by the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. It is one of a series by the AFL-CIO News as a follow-up to recommendations stemming from AFL-CIO regional conferences.

FIRST, funds for New Directions grants are expected to be cut by $1.6 million. These grants underwrite the effort to alert workers to their job hazards. Through this program, workers are taught how to identify problems (and avoid injuries) as well as how to notify OSHA when employers neglect to correct dangerous workplace conditions. Where labor-management relations are congenial, workers and employers are encouraged to cooperate and correct unsafe situations on the spot without involving OSHA.

The health and safety of workers in the food and beverage trades will also be affected by cutbacks in the number of federal workplace inspectors. The number of trained inspectors is already insufficient. It is estimated, for example, that it would take until the year 2020 before each of the nation's five million workplaces could be inspected once by the present staff. The Reagan Administration's budget cuts are expected to cost OSHA about 130 permanent full-time inspectors through fiscal year 1982.

THE OSHA cutbacks also will have a ripple effect on other safety efforts. The oversight of state enforcement plans, notoriously weak, will be drastically curtailed. And in the face of a weakened OSHA, the "voluntary compliance" touted by the Administration could shrink even faster than the OSHA budget.

In another area affecting FBTD members, the Administration's 25-percent reduction in subsidies for federally funded community medical centers will pose serious problems for both the patients served by the centers and the workers who staff them.

Created in the mid-1960s during the Johnson Administration's "war on poverty," the medical centers are situated in poor inner-city areas or isolated farming communities where many residents cannot afford private physicians or health clinics. These areas have long found it difficult to attract trained personnel or pay for expensive equipment and facilities, and they are thus underserved by conventional medical care. But the federal subsidies have enabled many of them to offer comparable salaries for competent doctors, nurses and laboratory technicians.

THE 960 MEDICAL centers across the United States serve more than four million patients a year and employ nearly 10,000 health care workers. The Administration's 25-percent reduction in the medical center grants would mean that 445 centers would be forced to close, millions would be denied necessary health care and 4,500 workers performing health services would lose their jobs.

Ironically, the Administration's attempt to save money in this area will, in the long run, cost taxpayers as much as five times more in the form of Medicaid payments. Forty-three percent of all community medical center patients are eligible for Medicaid, which pays for most of their health care, such as doctors visits and lab fees, no matter what the cost.

In areas without medical centers, poor residents rely on hospital emergency room service when health care is needed, and the fees for such service run as much as five times the cost of a community medical center visit. The centers cut down on emergency room usage significantly. A 1979-80 government health study showed that in areas served by the centers, hospital admissions dropped by as much as 60 percent.

ANOTHER PROBLEM area for workers represented by FBTD unions is created by the Administration's plan to slash federal funding for Conrail and Amtrak.

Subsidies for Amtrak, the national rail passenger service, would be slashed 38 percent and those for Conrail eliminated altogether. About 72,000 railroad workers would lose their jobs on both systems. Remaining employees would be forced to make concessions in wages, benefits and job protections. Contributions to the already underfunded Railroad Retirement System will be diminished, threatening the ability to pay the one million senior citizens who are current recipients.

Ironically, these cutbacks are coming at a time when both Amtrak and Conrail are making strong efforts to attract more business. Amtrak has replaced its original fleet of aging cars with 1,600 new or completely refurbished electric cars. Stations have been upgraded and 650 miles of right-of-way purchased. Ridership has increased steadily over the last several years.

IN THE FIVE years since Congress created Conrail from the remains of bankrupt carriers, the railroad has made dramatic improvements. Track and equipment have been repaired and labor costs reduced. Operating losses have declined steadily.

Studies indicate that if Amtrak service is cut, more than half the passengers would resort to travel by automobile. Thus the demand for gasoline and other petroleum products would be heightened at a time when this country is trying to decrease its dependence on foreign oil. A comparison of energy consumption rates indicates that trains can operate 125 passenger miles per gallon of fuel against only 52 for automobiles.

Senate Votes to Slash Housing Aid Programs

housing construction and the growing number of moderate-income households displaced by condominium conversion.

The Reagan Administration budget sought a reduction to 175,000 units, but the Senate bill dropped the authorization to 150,000 to hold down budget costs.

The Senate did, however, approve an Administration proposal that would make public housing tenants pay up to 30 percent of their income for rent instead of the present 25 percent limit. The step-up would be phased in over five years.

IN ANOTHER move opposed by the AFL-CIO, the Senate bill would compel communities that now have rent control laws to repeal or modify them in order to qualify for federal housing funds. The restriction would affect an estimated 200 communities, including New York City and Washington, D.C.

The Senate bill also cut back on some other housing-related programs and follows the Administration doctrine of lumping together various programs into a "block grant" to states and then slashing the total amount available.

Democrats were unable to improve the housing bill through Senate amendments, but they did successfully put pressure on the Republican leadership to head off a threatened amendment to exclude federally-funded housing from prevailing wage requirements of the Davis-Bacon Act.

SEVERAL REPUBLICAN senators had indicated they might push for such an amendment, even though the Administration is in the process of using its regulatory authority to shrink the law's protection.

But the Republican leadership was anxious to move the housing bill through and a hint of a filibuster proved effective. The Democratic leadership passed the word that there could be no agreement on a time limit for debate if a Davis-Bacon amendment were proposed. The GOP leadership got the message, and no attempt was made to tie a Davis-Bacon repealer to the bill, which then passed 65-24.

In the House, a subcommittee has approved a bill that would provide 250,000 units of assisted housing. But the full committee has held up action on it pending completion of the budget reconciliation.

In other congressional developments:

● A House-Senate conference stripped two labor-opposed amendments from a supplemental appropriations bill.

It dropped a House-passed provision that would have banned a government contribution to any future health insurance plan for federal or postal employees that covered abortions. The fight against the restriction was led by Sen. Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.), who is a strong foe of abortions but told the Senate that Congress would be injecting itself into labor-management relations by dictating the form of health plan workers could negotiate.

It also deleted a House provision barring federal funds in connection with affirmative action programs involving numerical guidelines or goals.

● The House unanimously passed a Vietnam veterans bill that was opposed by the Reagan Administration. It directs the Veterans Administration to expand a study of health hazards associated with exposure to Agent Orange and other toxic chemicals used to defoliate Vietnamese jungles. And it extended for three years the program of store-front readjustment counseling centers for Vietnam veterans that the Administration sought to abolish.

● Political skirmishing over the nature of tax cut legislation continued with the White House alternating between carrot and stick tactics to pressure Democrats to agree to a "compromise" that would closely resemble the President's three-year package of business tax credits and a percentage cut in individual taxs heavily weighted toward the highest income brackets.

AFSCME Wins 23,000-Member Group in Florida

Tallahassee, Fla.—The State, County & Municipal Employees won representation rights for some 23,000 Florida state clerical and administrative employees in an election that gave the union 77 percent of the vote. No other union was involved.

AFSCME's Florida Council 79, which the state employees now join, is the largest union in the state and already represents some 90,000 state, county, city, and school employees.

Council 79 President Tom Fitzpatrick said the AFSCME victory "will strengthen the union's clout at the bargaining table and in the legislature where important public employee issues are voted upon."

In coming weeks, Fitzpatrick said, state clerical and administrative workers will begin holding meetings throughout the state to draw up contract proposals and elect a negotiating committee. That committee will then begin negotiating with the state on a variety of workplace issues, cost-of-living issues, and career opportunities, he said.

GE Ordered to Pay Union For Costs of Sex Bias Suit

Cleveland—A federal judge has ruled that General Electric Co. must pay the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers more than $80,000 in legal expenses incurred by the union while it was representing its members in a sex discrimination suit settled in 1979.

The ruling by U.S. District Court Judge John M. Manos is the first to make clear a union's right to ask for reimbursement of legal fees under provisions of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Pay Act when the union wins a discrimination case for workers, according to Winn Newman, who handled the case as IUE's general counsel.

THE COURT ordered GE to pay $80,641 for IUE's legal costs and lawyers' fees accumulated during the course of a sex discrimination suit first filed in 1972 by IUE, its Local 707 and individual union members at GE's Cleveland lamp-making facility.

In 1979, a settlement was worked out between the company and the union which was approved by the same district court. In the settlement, GE agreed to provide $130,500 in back pay to male and female workers harmed by discrimination, to end discriminatory practices against women workers and to improve wage rates.

Although IUE attorneys had initially represented all the plaintiffs, Newman explained, the court had ordered separate counsel for each individual in the suit, and GE did agree to pay those legal fees under the provisions of the rights laws that allow payment of "a reasonable attorney's fee" at the discretion of the court to the party that wins.

The company refused to reimburse IUE's own expenses, claiming that that union had not shown it was representing its members in the suits, that it was not in itself harmed, that reimbursing a union would violate congressional intent, and that because unions are parties to collective bargaining agreements, they could be involved in the conditions that lead to such suits.

The court rejected the company's arguments, agreeing that IUE did show that it was representing the interests of its members through a wide variety of actions.

Mine Workers Balloting on New Coal Agreement

Striking miners are voting on a new contract with the soft-coal industry that would boost their hourly earings $3.60 over the life of the agreement.

If ratified, the 40-month accord would end a walkout that has closed bituminous mines in eastern and midwestern states since Mar. 27, when the old agreement expired. The contract covers some 160,000 members of the unaffiliated United Mine Workers.

UMW PRESIDENT Sam Church, Jr., told newsmen the settlement with the Bituminous Coal Operators' Association was "a very good contract." He expressed optimism that members of the union, who voted 2 to 1 against an earlier agreement, would approve it. Ratification would end the strike on June 8—73 days after it began.

The latest settlement, on May 29, removes most of the points of objection in the initial pact.

The new contract provides a 37.5-percent increase in wages and fringe-benefit improvements over the next three and one-half years. Wages for most top-scale miners would rise to $14.16 an hour from the current $10.56.

AMONG THE agreement's key provisions is a clause restoring welfare-fund royalties on non-union coal purchases by union-operated mines. Elimination of the old $1.90 per-ton fee in the initial agreement had been cited as a principal cause of its rejection by rank-and-file members. The contract also drops a 45-day probationary period for new employees and tightens rules governing the use of non-UMW subcontractors at mine sites.

The agreement had the strong endorsement of the union's 39-member bargaining council, which with only two dissenting votes cleared the proposed contract for ratification by the miners.

Pilots Stress Safety Factor in Crew Size

New jet aircraft technology increases pilot workload substantially and makes a three-member crew a vital margin for safety, Air Line Pilots President J. J. O'Donnell told a presidential task force. The independent panel is investigating whether new high technology passenger airliners require a two or three-member cockpit crew for maximum safety.

In his opening statement, O'Donnell stressed that the union's main concern in the issue is air passenger safety. He said technological improvements are welcomed by pilots, but they have so far been designed to increase the efficiency and usability of the equipment rather than add to human capabilities.

"NEW TECHNOLOGY should not be given credit for a particular advantage such as workload reduction if its actual use in operations does not produce workload reduction," O'Donnell said, rejecting industry claims that new aircraft such as the McDonnell Douglas Super 80 and the Boeing 757 and 767 are so advanced they can be safely flown by only two pilots.

O'Donnell called for a "revamping" of the Federal Aviation Administration's certification procedure for new aircraft. He told the panel that the union's attempts in the past to participate in the certification process "received superficial treatment and then were ignored" by the FAA which dealt only with the manufacturers and air carriers.

In addition to increased cockpit workload, O'Donnell pointed out, the growth in air traffic expected to take place in the next 10 to 15 years will complicate the "hostile environment" in which airline pilots must operate.

THE FACT THAT airport safety facilities, air traffic control equipment and collision avoidance systems are not likely to keep up with increased demands on flight crews underscores the need for the third crew member in "Monitoring, cross-checking, visual surveillance and pilot redundancy," O'Donnell testified.

O'Donnell, whose union represents 33,000 pilots, pointed to studies of reported near-accidents and other safety hazards which show that "flight crew distraction is the most frequently reported human factor" in the documented records.

He said the data prove the value of the third crew member in "screening distractions, reducing task overloads, and monitoring the actions of other crew members" in the vast matrix of communications and demands that pilots face routinely on the flight deck.

"FLYING THE line in commercial transportation demands a professionalism which is unremitting," O'Connell emphasized. "There is no room for missed items in a checklist," he said." There is no place for inattention at any point in our hostile environment."

The panel was named by President Reagan in late February in response to a nationwide air safety publicity campaign mounted by the ALPA which had scheduled a work stoppage to dramatize the crew complement safety issue.

The panel is to report its findings by early July. It is chaired by former FAA Administrator John McLucas and includes Fred J. Drinkwater, a physicist and former Marine pilot, and Lt. Gen. Howard W. Leaf, inspector general of the Air Force.

Metalworker Delegates Stress Solidarity as Key To Peace, Justice, Jobs

By James M. Shevis

The International Metalworkers' Federation, at its 25th World Congress in Washington, renewed its commitment to international labor solidarity as the primary instrument for achieving peace, justice, and jobs.

"Workers and their unions want peace because this is the prerequisite for social welfare and progress," declared IMF President Eugen Loderer. "We want social justice. That means the promotion and realization everywhere in the world of human and trade union rights.

"WE SEE OUR most important political task, however, in combating unemployment and creating jobs for the millions of unemployed and underemployed people."

The 500 delegates from 70 countries adopted a wide-ranging series of resolutions pledging themselves to economic, social, and political programs to attain their goals, thereby improving the lot of the nearly 14 million workers represented by the federation. The Geneva-based organization functions as a coordinating body for 170 unions representing auto workers, steelworkers, aerospace, shipbuilding, and other metal trades employees in the non-communist world. Eleven of the unions, representing about 3.6 million workers, are AFL-CIO affiliates.

In a report on world economic development, the IMF warned that the world economy is at a crossroads "with disquieting indications of settling into a long, deep, and disastrous recession."

The report said that sharp attacks on socially progressive forces are underway in several nations. "Some economists and politicians in western industrialized countries are returning to theories which were discredited during the world crisis of the Twenties and the Thirties through monetarism, wage cuts, and general deflation policies," the report said, adding:

"This reactionary wave is challenging the concept that governments can and should seek to guide economic forces for the benefit of society as a whole."

THE SUREST signs of the world's poor economic health are rapidly increasing joblessness generally and a new surge of unemployment in industrialized countries to a level unprecedented in the past 40 years, the IMF said.

Unemployment in the less developed countries is virtually impossible to measure, but estimates of between 20 and 40 percent for many individual nations are common, and underemployment often affects another 25 to 30 percent of the labor force, the federation said.

In the 23 industrialized nations that make up the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development, total registered unemployment is likely to exceed 23.5 million in 1981, the IMF pointed out. By mid-1982, another 2.5 million unemployed workers are anticipated so that joblessness will reach 26 million. This will mean an increase in the average unemployment rate in the industrialized countries from 6.5 to 7 percent, the IMF observed.

As one means of creating jobs, the IMF reiterated its call for a substantial reduction in working time without reduction in income. It set a goal of a maximum 40-hour workweek worldwide and a 35-hour week in the more advanced nations.

IMF GEN. SEC. Herman Rebhan reported to the congress that the federation's campaign for a reduction in working time —launched two years ago at a world conference in Geneva—had already achieved positive results. In Britain, 2 million engineers won a 39-hour week. In Australia, there has been a move toward the 35-hour week and a "nine-day fortnight." And, he noted, many IMF affiliates in the United States have secured more holidays and personal time off for their members.

Rebhan and other speakers at the week-long conference laid heavy emphasis on the need for unions to increase their international roles to cope with developments in the world economy and trade.

"THE SPIRIT of trade unionism must be more than ever based on internationalism," said Rebhan. "The lives and prosperity of all our members are now based on an international economic interdependence that makes a mockery of national frontiers."

In every case of plant closure reported to the IMF in the past year, he said, a key factor involved a corporation or a raw material or an equivalent but lower-priced product that was based or originated outside the country of the closed plant.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told delegates that the problems of working people are too vast for any nation or national labor movement to deal with alone.

"Labor must internationalize to the extent that industry has done so," he said. "In today's world, if the IMF did not already exist, it would be a matter of the greatest urgency to invent it."

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, whose union is one of IMF's largest affiliates, noted that the labor secretariat "espouses the cause of universal brotherhood" and "confronts injustice by all the means" at its disposal.

AMONG THE 19 resolutions approved by the congress were a pledge of solidarity with black metalworkers' unions in South Africa and a condemnation of the Soviet Union for its invasion of Afghanistan and its war of nerves with the Polish free labor federation, Solidarity. Another resolution deplored the "growing attacks on trade union rights, even in the advanced countries."

The delegates, holding their first congress outside Europe since the IMF's founding in 1893, voted to hold the next congress in Tokyo in 1985.

POLISH STEELWORKER Mieczyslaw Gil expresses gratitude for the moral and material support given Poland's new, independent labor federation, Solidarity, by western unions. Gil was part of a Solidarity delegation attending the 25th World Congress of the International Metalworkers' Federation in Washington. With him above are Szbigniew Przydial, center, and Jacek Kurczewski.

Stronger Standby Authority Sought to Remedy Oil Crises

Congress was urged by the AFL-CIO to renew and strengthen the President's standby powers to control oil prices, allocate scarce petroleum supplies and impose gasoline rationing.

Most of the President's existing standby authority will end when the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act expires on Sept. 30. The emergency powers should be preserved through permanent law rather than a stop-gap extension, AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe said.

MARLOWE TOLD the Senate Energy & Natural Resources Committee that leaving allocation of petroleum products to the marketplace during periods of shortages "is to invite economic chaos."

Without government allocation powers, he warned, prices would soar and people who need cars to go to work or who rely on oil to heat their homes would be hardest hit. He cited estimates that a 20-percent shortfall of crude oil supply in a free market would push the price of a gallon of gasoline to over $7.

Marlowe urged the committee not to assume that the present "worldwide glut of oil" will continue. "When the United States and other industrial countries restore their economies to a condition of sustained growth, petroleum shortages will again become the prevailing condition," he said.

"THE UNITED STATES should not wait for a catastrophe," he urged. And it should have in place a program for rationing gasoline that could be implemented when needed. Present law authorizes gasoline rationing when supplies are at least 20 percent less than demand. Rationing should be allowed at even a 10 percent shortfall, Marlowe urged.

He recommended a two-tier plan that the AFL-CIO has proposed.

The first tier would provide for free ration coupons, half based on the number of registered vehicles and half on the number of licensed drivers. Consumers could sell or trade these coupons without penalty.

IF THERE ARE additional supplies of gasoline, the government would sell coupons on the open market at a fixed price.

Marlowe stressed that the AFL-CIO's support for gasoline rationing "stems from our conviction that rationing is an equitable alternative to price increases as a means of dealing with emergency shortages as well as longer term conservation goals."

The AFL-CIO's assumption, he said, is that a rationing program would operate "in tandem with controls on gasoline prices." That link should be made "an explicit part" of whatever standby rationing program is submitted to Congress.

Healey Elected New President of Plate Printers

Delegates to the 79th convention of the Plate Printers, Die Stampers & Engravers in Washington elected Neil Healey of Local 58, New York, to a two-year term as the union's president.

Healey succeeds Angelo LoVecchio, 69, who retired after serving two terms as president.

Sec.-Treas. James Donegan, Jr., of Philadelphia was re-elected to his sixth term.

Elected to their first terms were Harold Ryan of Local 29, New York, who will be first vice president, and Ed Majors of Local 6, Ottawa, who will serve as second vice president.

Also re-elected to the union's executive council were William Hoyt of Local 1, New York, and Robert Vass of Local 2, Washington. They will be joined on the council by Frank Leone, Local 24, Washington; Al Merkh, Local 25, New Jersey; Ben DeCaito, Local 26, New Jersey; Mike Ryan, Local 28, New York; and Marty F. Freda, Local 58, New York.

The convention voiced the union's firm opposition to proposals in the printing industry to introduce a variety of flexible time schedules so as to keep presses operating seven days a week. Such arrangements could force unwanted weekend work and irregular schedules on many workers in their industry, the delegates agreed.

The union's members in the United States and Canada specialize in the printing of U.S., Canadian and foreign currencies, stock certificates, bonds, bank notes, food coupons and other types of high-quality printed material.

Tuition Tax Credit Protested As Blow to Public Education

gains made toward school integration is another likely result, Shields testified.

Taxpayers would be hit twice, she pointed out, once to finance public schools "and the second time to subsidize a tax credit for non-public schools."

Shields argued that the tax credits would provide four times as much aid per pupil for private school education as now goes to public education. About 59 percent of the credits would go to families with incomes over $25,000 with the share of benefits at both elementary and secondary levels increasing as family incomes grow higher, she said.

THE AFL-CIO is not opposed to federal aid to private schools such as that provided under the Elementary & Secondary Education Act and other federal programs, Shields emphasized.

Federal aid that helps buy books and instructional materials, provides library resources, guidance and testing and specialized education programs should continue, Shields told the committee.

Tuition tax credits, however, would be "a wide departure" from the concept of the federal government's role in education as spelled out in ESEA which targets federal aid, she asserted.

Shields also noted that because the majority of students in private schools attend church-affiliated institutions, giving tuition tax credits to those students could raise constitutional questions involving the separation of church and state.

The tuition tax proposal, she said, could lead to the undermining "of one of the greatest achievements of American democracy: a school system for all children which will provide them with the education to realize their maximum potential."

Unemployment Rate Climbs to 7.6%

8.2 Million Seek Chance For Work

By James M. Shevis

Unemployment in the United States—now at nearly 8.2 million—shot to its highest level since last October, the result of slower job creation and layoffs in construction and in some manufacturing industries, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

After holding steady for several months, the nation's jobless rate rose three-tenths of 1 percent to 7.6 percent in May, the largest one-month jump since May 1980. The sharpest increase occurred among adult men. Their jobless rate climbed to 6.3 percent, from 5.8 percent the month before.

CONSTRUCTION WORKERS were particularly hard hit. Their jobless rate rose from 14.4 to 16.3 percent last month. The construction industry is suffering from high mortgage interest rates, which are choking demand and making it more expensive to finance new homes and buildings.

There was also a high number of layoffs in the auto manufacturing and related industries as car sales turned down after surging early in the year.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood, appearing before the congressional Joint Economic Committee, said that the size of the May increase in joblessness was "significant," but added that employment is still growing although at a relatively weak pace.

"The labor force, which increased very little in 1980, has grown rapidly over the last few months," she said. "Employment in May did not keep up with the pace of labor force growth, and unemployment rose."

TOTAL EMPLOYMENT in May "grew more than expected at this time of year," Norwood said. The number of jobs in the economy increased by 259,000 to 99.2 million. At the same time, however, the work force expanded by 684,000 to 107.4 million, thus increasing unemployment by 425,000. The figures were adjusted to eliminate the effects of seasonal economic fluctuations.

Unemployment increased among all worker groups in May. For women, the rate went to 6.8 percent, from 6.6 percent. The rates for full-time workers, teenagers, and blacks each rose by four-tenths of 1 percent, to 7.3, 19.5, and 13.6 percent, respectively. White unemployment increased to 6.8 percent from 6.6 percent, and joblessness among Hispanics increased to 10.2 percent, from 9.1 percent.

The labor force participation rate, which is the civilian labor force as a percentage of the total population, climbed to 64.6 percent in May, its highest rate ever. Last month's 64.3 percent participation rate was the previous all-time high.

Senate Food Stamp Cut Bars Strikers' Families

NEWSPAPER GUILD members seeking a fair settlement on a new contract with the Associated Press were joined on an informational picket line in Los Angeles by actor Ed Asner, a television series newspaper editor, and "Cheap Chicken," the Guild's symbol for AP's wage proposal.

Changes Hit Low-Income Households

By David L. Perlman

The Senate voted to cut back food stamp assistance to low-income households and prohibit food assistance to the family of a worker who goes on strike, regardless of need.

Its actions will reduce the food allotment to most of the 22 million persons now being helped and drop an estimated 1 million from the rolls entirely. Households of strikers normally make up only a fraction of 1 percent of food stamp recipients. The chief losers from the Senate bill will be low-paid workers whose paychecks aren't enough to meet family needs.

ANTI-STRIKER amendments have been regularly proposed over the years, even though increasingly tight eligibility standards for all food stamp recipients meant that a striker's family would have to exhaust virtually all its resources before qualifying for assistance.

In the Carter Administration, the Senate voted down an anti-striker amendment to a food stamp bill by a decisive 48-26 margin. But this time around, in the Republican-controlled Senate, a ban on food stamps to strikers or their families was included in the bill sent to the floor by the Agriculture Committee and routinely approved without a separate vote.

The only fights, in fact, were over right-wing attempts to slash the food stamp program still further. The Agriculture Committee had already cut the program's costs below the Reagan Administration budget, so the committee bill survived intact.

37 Groups Assail Blow To Affirmative Action

By Susan Dunlop

Labor Dept. proposals to water down affirmative action obligations tied to federal contracts will set back the progress of women and minorities toward equal employment goals, the AFL-CIO, civil rights and women's groups warned the Reagan Administration.

Thirty-seven organizations endorsed a letter signed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and sent to David Stockman, director of the Office of Management & Budget, urging the Administration to reconsider its proposed "drastic changes" in contract compliance.

THE GROUPS charged that if the federal government backs away from making affirmative action a firm requirement for letting its contracts, it could mean "the death knell for the federal contract compliance program, for 40 years a vital element in the national effort to provide equal employment opportunity."

Kirkland's letter stressed that women and minorities continue to experience discrimination in employment, and that "more vigorous equal employment opportunity enforcement" is needed.

The Labor Dept.'s proposed changes in its rules include substituting "self-monitoring" by contractors for much of the enforcement. Such a policy, Kirkland said, would be taken as a "signal for backsliding" by contractors.

"Discrimination cannot be remedied by depending on voluntary efforts by the very contractors whose unlawful discriminatory practices continue to bring them unjust enrichment," the letter charged. Compliance rules assure that the government does not reward or participate in discrimination, Kirkland pointed out.

UAW Executive Board Vote Unanimous for Reaffiliation

Detroit—The executive board of the Auto Workers has voted unanimously for reaffiliation with the AFL-CIO, a move that both UAW President Douglas A. Fraser and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said will strengthen the labor movement in a critical period.

The unity move had been authorized by UAW convention delegates earlier this year and Fraser said the UAW officers had "a successful exchange of views" with Kirkland and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at a recent meeting. They then recommended that the UAW board "move promptly on reaffiliation."

The final formality after the UAW reaffiliation letter is received will be approval by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which will be sought in a telegraph poll. The UAW's 1.2 million member in the United States will be affiliated with the AFL-CIO and its Canadian membership continues to be affiliated with the Canadian Labor Congress.

Fraser said the UAW, as part of the AFL-CIO, will work with the federation and other affiliates in resisting President Reagan's proposed cuts in social security benefits, pressing for lower interest rates and for an end to "recessionary economic policies."

Supreme Court Upholds Suit on Sex Bias Claim

The Supreme Court ruled that women may sue under the Civil Rights Act to remedy illegal pay discrimination without basing their claim on an employer's refusal to pay equal wages to men and women doing substantially equal work.

Its 5-4 decision concluded that Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act gave women workers more grounds to challenge pay discrimination than they already had under the Equal Pay Act of 1963. That's the conclusion the AFL-CIO and other labor groups had urged in a brief to the Supreme Court earlier this year.

Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., writing for the majority, stressed that the issue before the court did not involve what he

ILO Delegates Applaud Spirit of Polish Labor

Geneva—Lech Walesa, leader of Poland's independent labor federation Solidarity, gave his fight for free trade unionism in a country living under the shadow of the Soviet Union a global dimension in an address that electrified the annual assembly of the 145-nation International Labor Organization.

"I want to stress our solidarity with workers everywhere," he proclaimed as the first free trade unionist from a country trapped in the Soviet orbit to address the ILO conference as an official worker delegate.

THE SOVIET delegation remained frozen as applause exploded in the huge assembly hall, packed with some 1,800 trade unionists, government officials and business executives, when Walesa finished speaking.

Before the former Polish shipyard worker could leave the platform the conference's president, Senegal's labor minister Alioune Diagne, interrupted the waves of applause.

He told Walesa:

"The religious silence with which you were heard and the loud and prolonged applause that greeted your address prove, if such proof was still needed, the intense interest with which the world is following your efforts and those of your union Solidarity."

Shunning oratorical flourishes, Walesa had told the assembly that the social and political reform movement that Solidarity had triggered by the use of labor's "traditional weapons of strikes and demonstrations" was irreversible. And in a clear allusion to the Soviet Union to keep hands off he warned that "no outside interference should attempt to halt the process" of democratic change under way in his country.

WHEN PROCLAIMING the solidarity of his union with workers everywhere, Walesa said it joined in the fight of all real trade unions for the "protection of the social interests of workers, for the dignity of labor and for the defense of human rights wherever they are violated."

AFL-CIO International Rep. Irving Brown observed that Walesa, in his simple and direct approach before the ILO, "has identified the struggle for free trade unionism in Poland with the international struggle for free trade unionism everywhere."

"What is particularly important about Walesa," the U.S. worker delegate continued, "is that he has demonstrated in a country where no one believed it could be done that free trade unionism is the aspiration of all workers."

Brown joined other free workers in sponsoring a resolution outlining action the ILO should take to assist the Third World to meet the ILO standards on living and working conditions.

Other resolutions proposed by the free workers call for an intensification of training programs and of planning to ensure that workers benefit rather than suffer from the introduction of new technologies into the economy.

The ILO is a unique tripartite organization with each member nation represented by worker, employer and government delegates.

Firemen-Oilers Convention Elects Francisco President

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Firemen & Oilers' 30th convention here elected Sec.-Treas. George J. Francisco by acclamation to assume the union's presidency for the next five years.

Francisco, who has held a wide variety of positions in the Firemen & Oilers, succeeds John J. McNamara, who announced his retirement. McNamara became president in 1975 and will serve as president-emeritus.

FRANCISCO HAS served as president of the union's Local 520 in Buffalo, N.Y., as vice chairman of New York State Council, and as international representative of the union's commercial division in the Buffalo area.

In 1975, he was appointed to the secretary-treasurer's post and a year later elected to a full five-year term. During his career, he has represented the Firemen & Oilers in negotiations with the railroad industry.

Elected to succeed Francisco as secretary-treasurer was First Vice President Michael Matz of Philadelphia Local 473.

An executive board member of the international the past 12 years, Matz is also vice president of the Philadelphia Council of the AFL-CIO and of the Philadelphia Maritime Port Council.

THE 400 DELEGATES re-elected five vice presidents and elected a new vice president, William McDevitt of Philadelphia, to fill the vacancy created by Matz's elevation.

Delegates also adopted a number of constitutional changes, including a per capita increase to strengthen the union's financial position for the struggles ahead.

Current per capita for members of the Firemen & Oilers division is $3 a month and $3.50 a month for members of the union's commercial division. As of Aug. 1, the per capita for both divisions will go up $1 a month. Another 50-cent increase takes effect on Aug. 1, 1983, and an additional 50-cent boost on Aug. 1, 1984.

THE CONVENTION approved salary increases from $44,000 to $50,000 for the president and from $38,000 to $44,600 for the secretary-treasurer.

In his opening remarks to the delegates, McNamara warned of the difficult times facing organized labor today.

"Everywhere we turn, it seems, we face relentless pressures—the elimination of jobs, loss of membership, and a renewed barrage of attacks by anti-union forces," he said, urging that labor begin now to prevent gains by conservatives in Congress next year.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas Donahue charged that the Reagan Administration seeks to sweep away 50 years of social progress with its budget cuts.

Under the budget reductions, "we're the ones who will pay the price of social security cuts, and at the gas pumps," he said. "The brazen attempts to cripple the Occupational Safety & Health Act and turn back the clock on worker protections clearly endanger human lives and challenge human dignity.

"WE FOUGHT too hard and have come too far to let anyone take that away from us now."

President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens told delegates of the massive mail and telephone protests that greeted the Administration's announcement on proposed changes in the social security system. "These protests led to a unanimous, 96-0, bipartisan vote in the Senate to disapprove the recommendations," he said.

Resolutions adopted by the convention included a call on Congress to stand up to the threat to hard-won, social reforms and defend programs of proven value. Delegates called for the mandatory use of coal as a primary fuel in all commercial power plants, and supported Poland's independent labor federation, Solidarity.

Sal Hoffmann Dies At 82, President Of Upholsterers

Philadelphia—Sal B. Hoffmann, president of the Upholsterers for the past 44 years, died June 9 at his home here. He was 82.

Hoffmann began his trade union career as a member of UIU Local 77 in Philadelphia in 1920. He held a number of key elected positions with the local during the '20s and '30s and as an international organizer.

Hoffmann was first elected UIU president in 1937 and was re-elected at each subsequent union convention. His most recent four-year term began in 1978.

In a letter to Hoffmann's family, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue praised his "distinguished career" as a leader of the union. They added that "his long and productive life was dedicated to serving working men and women, and his long tenure as president is proof enough of the members' respect and affection."

Under Hoffmann's leadership, the UIU established a health and welfare fund in 1944 and a national pension plan in 1953. He served as chairman of both funds at the time of his death.

Survivors include three children and 10 grandchildren. His wife Frances died last year. Services were held at Assumption Church in Philadelphia June 11 and interment was at Whitemarsh Memorial Park in Prospectville, Pa.

Wholesale Index Increase Slows As Prices Ease

Steady food prices and the first drop in fuel prices in over three years combined to hold producer-level inflation to four-tenths of 1 percent in May, the smallest monthly rise this year.

Last month's rise in prices of finished consumer goods was only half as large as that of April, and compared with a 1.3 percent increase in March. The finished consumer-goods component of the government's producer price index excludes capital goods, and is the one that economists find most useful in projecting retail price changes.

The finished goods index now stands at 268.9 percent of its 1967 base, which means that goods that cost $10 then now cost $26.89.

THE BUREAU of Labor Statistics, which reported the price changes, said that the index for intermediate goods such as flour and cloth rose five-tenths of 1 percent following a 1.1 percent increase in April.

The index for crude goods such as wheat and cotton, fell by that amount after rising 1.5 percent in April.

BLS said that the five-tenths of 1 percent decline in finished energy prices was the first decrease since February 1978.

Consumer food prices were unchanged for the second month in a row.

Everything besides food and energy went up six-tenths of 1 percent at the dealer's level.

Prices of gasoline, which is now in significant over-supply, fell 1.8 percent during May while home-heating oil prices fell 1.2 percent. Natural gas, however, rose in price.

AT SENATE HEARINGS, AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields warned that tuition tax credits for students in private schools and colleges would weaken the nation's public education system and drain needed federal revenues. Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor and Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan joined in presenting the AFL-CIO's position.

Illinois Unions Rally Against Anti-Labor Bills

20,000 March In Protest at State Capitol

Springfield, Ill.—Some 20,000 union members from throughout the state jammed the capitol grounds here to protest attempts to enact anti-labor legislation.

The Labor Lobby Day rally was called by the Illinois AFL-CIO and other labor groups around the state after the Republican-controlled House Labor Committee had approved a so-called "right-to-work" bill.

Labor's campaign against the measure was so intense that it was defeated overwhelmingly when it came up on the House floor for a vote, 138 to 25.

"'RIGHT-TO-WORK' was defeated here, and do you know why?" State AFL-CIO President Robert G. Gibson asked. "That union-busting measure went down because they knew you were coming.

"We are here to say to those who voted for the phony 'right-to-work-for-less' bill that they should be ashamed. They and others who scorn labor, who vote against the poor and the defenseless, these are the people we'll be meeting at the ballot box in 1982."

Gov. James R. Thompson, the only Republican to address the rally, pledged not to let any anti-union bills get past his desk. He praised the labor movement for its unified effort, and declared: "Right-to-work is dead in Illinois, and it will never be alive in this state again."

Jerry Hawkins, Mine Workers legislative director in Illinois, told the anti-union members of the General Assembly: "We are keeping score, and we have long memories. Business may have the money, but we have the numbers."

SINCE THE November elections, Republican members of the House—now a majority of the membership with 91 representatives, compared to 85 Democrats—have espoused a series of anti-labor measures.

Such bills have provided for a reduction in jobless benefits, a virtual destruction of workers' compensation benefits, and repeal of the prevailing wage act and the safe scaffolding law. Another bill calls for a year's notice before a union can strike.

ILLINOIS TRADE UNIONISTS rally at the state capitol in Springfield to protest attempts by the legislature to enact anti-labor measures. The turnout of 20,000 union members was the largest demonstration ever held at the capitol.

New Coal Pact Approved by 2-to-1 Margin

Soft-coal miners in eastern and midwestern states ended their 10-week strike after voting overwhelmingly to ratify a new agreement, but stalled contract talks between mine construction workers and the industry delayed the reopening of some mines.

Members of the unaffiliated United Mine Workers approved the pact by the same 2-to-1 ratio that they rejected an earlier proposal. The new contract raises wages and benefits for about 160,000 miners by 38 percent over 40 months.

THE MINERS' contract with the Bituminous Coal Operators' Association ended a walkout that began Mar. 27 when the old agreement expired. Nearly 11,000 UMW construction workers who bargain separately with the Association of Bituminous Coal Contractors left their jobs on the same date to honor the underground workers' picket lines, even though their contract did not expire until Apr. 6.

Over the contract's 40-month life, hourly wages are to rise by $3.60, to $14.30, for miners at top scale. The pact also restores a pension fund royalty that the coal companies must pay on coal they buy from non-union mines.

Loss of the royalty was one of the major issues cited by the miners when they turned down the initial agreement.

Decision in Pay Discrimination Case Provides New Legal Tools for Women

termed "the controversial concept of comparable worth." The comparable worth theory would test for sex discrimination by matching the pay of jobs that are comparable in skill, effort and responsibility.

THE CASE that reached the Supreme Court was brought by a group of matrons at a county jail in Oregon who charged that sex discrimination was largely responsible for the big gap between their pay and the pay of male employees with a number of the same duties.

A federal district judge ruled against the matrons, holding that their claim did not meet the equal work test of the Equal Pay Act. He interpreted an amendment that the Senate added to the Civil Rights Act as barring pay claims that would not be upheld under the Equal Pay Act.

The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals agreed that the suit could not be sustained on the basis of the Equal Pay Act. But it said that the women employees should have an opportunity in court to prove their contention that their lower pay is the result of sex discrimination and therefore violates the Civil Rights Act.

BRENNAN NOTED that the matrons claim in their lawsuit that the county had concluded after a job evaluation study that the women were entitled to a pay rate only 5 percent below that of the male officers, but nevertheless paid them 30 percent less than male employees.

He agreed with the appellate court conclusion that the case should be sent back to the district court to hear further evidence on whether the wage disparity was the result of sex discrimination.

Joining in the majority decision were Justices Byron R. White, Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun and John Paul Stevens.

A dissent by Justice William H. Rehnquist contended that there is no evidence Congress intended to go beyond the "equal pay for equal work" criterion when it passed the Civil Rights Act. He complained that the narrow grounds of the majority decision will have little application to other cases.

IN ANOTHER decision, the Supreme Court ruled that employers are not required to pay unemployment and social security payroll taxes on the value of food and lodging they provide workers on remote job sites, such as offshore oil rigs. Employees are not taxed on these fringe benefits because they are provided "for the convenience of the employer."

The Supreme Court declined to review and thus made final a ruling by the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals that the National Labor Relations Board erred in not counting a ballot cast in a union representation election in which the voter wrote the word "No" on the back of the ballot instead of marking an "X" in the box on the face of the ballot. The appellate court reasoned that since the election was a simple choice between one union or no union, the employee's intent was clear.

Melvin Roots Picked To Head Plasterers

Melvin H. Roots, executive vice president of the Plasterers & Cement Masons since 1970, has been chosen president of the union, succeeding the late Joseph T. Power.

Roots, 57, was named by the union's executive board and will serve until the convention in 1984. The board named Vice President James J. Boyle of Washington, D.C., to succeed Roots as executive vice president.

An Oakland, Calif., native, Roots joined the OPCM in 1945, served as president of OPCM Local 112 in Oakland and as head of the union's California state conference. He was an organizer before his election as a vice president of the international in 1956.

High Court Asked to Uphold Confidential Employee Rights

The AFL-CIO asked the Supreme Court to take a fresh look at the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act and reverse two appellate court decisions that would lead to the exclusion of thousands of workers from the protection of federal labor law.

At issue is whether the National Labor Relations Act covers employees whose work gives them access to business information their employer considers confidential.

UNDER LONGSTANDING National Labor Relations Board policy, otherwise eligible employees dealing with confidential data are excluded from a bargaining unit only if their work involves sensitive labor-management matters. Thus, the NLRB would exclude the secretary to a company's industrial relations director but not the secretary of the firm's sales manager.

In the cases being reviewed by the Supreme Court, the 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals adopted a much broader exclusion policy:

- One case involved a rural electric cooperative in Hendricks County, Ind. The general manager fired his secretary after she had joined other employees in signing a petition asking for the reinstatement of a worker who had suffered the loss of an arm in an on-the-job accident and was denied re-employment after his recovery.

The NLRB found that the secretary, Mary Weatherman, was not involved in labor relations matters and therefore was protected when she joined with other employees in a lawful "concerted activity." But the appellate court refused to enforce the NLRB's reinstatement and back pay order.

- The other case involved employees of the Malleable Iron Range Co. in Beaver Dam, Wis., who had voted for representation by Local 39 of the Office & Professional Employees.

The company refused to bargain, claiming that 18 of the 64 employees in the unit should have been excluded because they had access to confidential business information. Those the company wanted excluded included a $3.50 an hour shipping clerk and a $6,400-a-year clerk who handled correspondence dealing with defective merchandise. The appellate court refused to enforce the NLRB's order to bargain with the union.

In both cases, the appellate court relied on language in a 1974 Supreme Court decision involving the status of managerial employees of the Bell Aerospace Co. The Supreme Court's assumption, in the section quoted, appeared to be that Congress had intended a broad exclusion of "confidential" employees when it enacted the Taft-Hartley amendments to the National Labor Relations Act in 1947.

THE AFL-CIO brief urged the Supreme Court to correct its "dictum" in the 1974 case, stressing that this can be done without affecting the Bell Aerospace outcome or the reasoning that led to it.

The legislative intent issue bearing on confidential employees had never been fully presented to the court, the AFL-CIO contended, and therefore should not be controlling as a decided point of law.

The brief notes that the House passed a bill that excluded confidential employees generally, but the Senate version did not, and the House language was deleted in conference.

AS FOR THE statements made by the conferees when the final version was before the House and Senate, the AFL-CIO brief notes that the most that can be read on the issue was that Congress was in accord with the still-prevailing NLRB policy.

To come to a different conclusion, the AFL-CIO contended, the courts would have to assume that Congress misunderstood an NLRB policy that had been consistently applied in dozens of cases and that it intended to freeze its misunderstanding into law. But the facts indicate otherwise, the federation maintained.

Butchering the Constitution

AN UNWISE and clearly unworkable constitutional amendment has been endorsed by the Senate Judiciary Committee. It would compel Congress to balance the federal budget each year, except in a national emergency.

Just last year, an almost identical proposal was defeated in committee. But so far has the political pendulum swung that the present Judiciary Committee voted 11-5 to clear the proposed amendment for the Senate floor.

Congress already has the ability to control the federal budget, as has become painfully apparent in recent weeks. But the deep cuts made to conform to the Reagan Administration's concept of the role of government would have been a bloodbath if such an amendment had been written into the U.S. Constitution.

IN PRACTICE, of course, budget deficit and surpluses are the more often result of economic conditions rather than spending levels.

Even while the present budget resolution was moving through the House and Senate, projections of budget deficits continued to change because of changed expectations of tax revenues and inflation's effect on interest rates and cost-of-living adjustments.

The constitutional amendment cleared by the Judiciary Committee would allow an exception to the balanced budget requirement by a three-fifths vote of the House and the Senate.

But this "concession" undermines the concept of majority rule. It would give a minority of Congress effective control over the appropriations process.

Budget deficits normally are unavoidable—and properly so—during recessions. But if Congress were to unwisely put itself into a constitutional straitjacket, unemployment would feed on unemployment and recessions would grow into depressions. A study by the congressional Joint Economic Committee several years ago pointed to such a conclusion.

Another study, by the Council of Economic Advisers in the last Administration, concluded that a balanced budget in the 1975 recession would have pushed total production 12 percent below pre-recession levels and pushed up unemployment by 50 percent.

AND IN HISTORIC terms, there is a compelling argument against changing the U.S. Constitution from a framework for democratic government into a repository of economic and social theories quickly outdated by shifting political trends.

There are, certainly, enough members of Congress who are aware of the pitfalls to prevent adoption of a balanced budget amendment.
